

BS
1565
.B972

AN

E X P O S I T I O N

OF

THE PROPHECY OF HOSEA.

BY THE

REV. JEREMIAH BURROUGHS,

RECTOR OF TIVETSHALL, NORFOLK.

1643.

COMPLETED BY THE

REV. THOMAS HALL, B. D. RECTOR OF KING'S NORTON,

AND THE RIGHT REV. EDWARD REYNOLDS, D. D., BISHOP OF NORWICH.

REVISED AND CORRECTED

BY THE REV. JAMES SHERMAN, MINISTER OF SURREY CHAPEL.

EDINBURGH: JAMES NICHOL.

LONDON: JAMES NISBET & CO.

M.DCCC.LXIII.

EDINBURGH: PRINTED BY BALLANTYNE AND COMPANY,
PAUL'S WALK.

BRIEF NOTICE

OF

THE REV. JEREMIAH BURROUGHS, A. M.

It is deeply to be lamented that no life was given to the church of this excellent minister of Christ; concerning whom Mr. Baxter says, "If all the Episcopalians had been like Archbishop Usher, all the Presbyterians like Mr. Stephen Marshall, and all the Independents like Mr. Jeremiah Burroughs, the breaches of the church would soon have been healed." From the few scattered notices of him in different authors, and chiefly from those of his enemies, we learn that he was born in 1599. He studied and took his degree at Emmanuel College, Cambridge; after which he became colleague with the Rev. Edmund Calamy, at Bury St. Edmund's. In the year 1631 he became rector of Tivetshall, in the county of Norfolk; but upon the publication of Bishop Wren's Articles and Injunctions, in 1636, he was suspended and deprived of his living.

The Earl of Warwick, who was the friend and patron of the persecuted ministers, and one of their constant hearers, gave him an asylum in his house, till the fire of persecution, which raged so strongly against him, obliged him to fly to Holland. He was chosen assistant minister to the church at Rotterdam, of which the Rev. William Bridge was pastor. The violence of party strife at that period raised against him many accusations for leaving his country, but his vindication of himself and his conduct in retiring to Rotterdam is so ample and circumstantial, and withal written in so meek and humble a spirit, as to raise in the reader a high estimation of his veracity and piety.

The church at Rotterdam gave him a most hearty welcome, and he laboured among them, in conjunction with Mr. Bridge, with great acceptance and usefulness for several years. After the commencement of the civil war he returned to England: "Not," says Granger, "to preach sedition, but peace; for which he earnestly prayed and laboured." The renown which he had acquired at Rotterdam accompanied him to his native land. His popular talents as a preacher, his peaceable spirit, and his exemplary character, soon excited great attention; and as a proof of it, he was chosen lecturer to the congregations of Stepney and Cripplegate, then accounted the largest and wealthiest in England. At Stepney he preached at seven o'clock in the morning, and Mr. Greenhill at three in the afternoon: one was called the morning star, and the other the evening star, of Stepney. He was chosen one of the Assembly of Divines, and united with his brethren, the Revds. Thomas Goodwin, Philip Nye, William Bridge, and Sydrach Simpson, in publishing their "Apologetic Narration" in defence of their own distinguishing sentiments, which contain the general principles by which congregational churches are governed in the present day. In the year 1645 he was elected one of the committee of accommodation, and was of great service in all their important deliberations.

Though, after his exile, he never accepted a parochial benefice, or became pastor of a separate church, he laboured extensively in preaching at various and distant places, and in rendering other important services to the church of Christ. But his incessant labours, and grief for the distractions of the times, brought on consumption, of which he died in the forty-seventh year of his age.

In the spirit of union among all Christians, which he so powerfully advocated, he was far before the opinions of his day. The following sentiment, in reply to one of his bitterest enemies, does equal credit to his piety and discernment: "I profess, as in the presence of God, that upon the most serious examination of my heart, I find in it, that were my judgment presbyterial, yet I should plead and preach as much for the forbearance of brethren differing from me, not only in their judgment, but in their practice, as I have ever done. Therefore, if I should turn Presbyterian, I fear I should trouble Mr. Edwards, and some others, more than I do now; perhaps my preaching and pleading for forbearance of dissenting brethren would be of more force than it is now." The last subject on which he preached, and the last treatise he published, was his "Irenicum," or an attempt to heal the divisions among Christians. Oh that we had more of his spirit among all who take the lead in the Christian church! The estimation in which he was held by unprejudiced persons who were capable of forming a judgment of his spirit and character, was very high. Granger says, "he was a man of learning, candour, and modesty, and of an exemplary and irreproachable life." And Fuller has classed him among the learned writers of Emmanuel College, Cambridge.

The following Exposition was delivered in lectures to the wealthy citizens of London, at St. Michael's, Cornhill, where crowds constantly attended to hear his luminous exhibitions of truth, and forcible appeals to the conscience. The first volume* only was published during his life, in the preface to which he remarks, the expositions "were taken from me in preaching. I perused the notes, but I could not bring the style to the succinctness that I desired, except I had written all over again, for which I had no time." Both this volume, and those published after his death, were most imperfectly printed; unimportant sentences were reprinted over and over again; and the supervisors had literally, as they say, done little more than usher the books into the world with the sanction of their names. Mr. Burroughs lived to carry on the Exposition as far only as chap. xiii. ver. 11. The remaining verses of that chapter were expounded by the Rev. Thomas Hall, who published his Exposition as a supplement to that of Mr. Burroughs, and will be found exceedingly valuable. The fourteenth chapter had been previously treated in a very able manner by Bishop Reynolds, who must ever rank high as an expositor of God's word. The whole are united in this volume, and form a most useful comment on this difficult book of Scripture, to aid the minister of Christ and the private Christian in rightly interpreting the sacred text. Dr. Williams, in his "Christian Preacher," observes, that the Exposition of Mr. Burroughs on Hosea, is a pleasing specimen, to show how the popular preachers of his time applied the Scriptures in their expository discourses to the various cases of their hearers.

The editor has only to remark, that the present volume is produced at great labour and expense; that the most scrupulous regard has been paid to accuracy, and in no single instance has a sentiment of the writer undergone any change to adapt it to the editor's mind. He commits it to the blessing of the great Head of the church with much prayer and hope that it may prove equally useful with the other Expositions which he has ventured to publish.

Surrey Parsonage, Jan. 14, 1843.

THE ORIGINAL PREFACES.

---

TO THE EXPOSITION

ON

THE FIRST THREE CHAPTERS.

---

TO THE READER.

YOU have these lectures as they were taken from me in preaching. I perused the notes, but I could not bring the style to the succinctness that I desired, except I had written all over again, for which I had no time; my perusal was but cursory, therefore many things have slipped me: you have them as I preached them, without any considerable alteration. I had thought to have been far briefer, but meeting with so many things almost in every lecture so nearly concerning present times, caused me to go something beyond an expository way. In the remaining part of the prophecy, if God gives life to go through it, I shall keep myself more closely to exposition. What here you have, take it as you find it; what good you meet with, receive it in. This will be the encouragement of

Thy friend in Christ,

J. B.

---

TO THE EXPOSITION

ON THE

FOURTH, FIFTH, SIXTH, AND SEVENTH CHAPTERS.

---

TO THE READER.

READER,

WE here present thee with a continuation of Expositions and Observations upon other four chapters of the prophet Hosea, delivered by that worthy man, now with God. Himself in his life-time published the three first chapters: these, now made public, were compiled out of the manuscripts which himself under his own hand left, which, being short, have been filled up and enlarged out of the best copies of sermon notes taken from his own mouth. We must not undertake for all imperfections or mistakes that haply may be found, though a diligent and a skilful hand had the collecting of them. We only give letters of credence to them, that they are genuinely the author's, and that they are singularly worthy of all acceptation, especially by such readers as have their thoughts exercised in observing the ways of God's proceedings in and towards the nations of the world where his name is called. One great piece of his dispensations under the Old Testament, was that towards the ten tribes, who remain in captivity to this day, and who were set up (as their predecessors in the wilderness) as types of God's dealing in like cases with us under the New Testament, 1 Cor. x.; Rev. vii.; as we may see in the instance of the Eastern and Grecian churches that have groaned under the Mahometan tyrannies and oppressions, of whom the ten tribes may seem to be the liveliest pattern, as the condition of the saints in the Western European churches under the pope was exemplified in the captivity of Babylon, which befell the other two tribes. Yet so as, both in sins and punishment, the one and the other are general examples unto us, "upon whom the ends of the world are come," in which God acts over with a quick and swift motion, as being the last act, what was done more slowly under the Old. The worthy author was one of the most accurate spectators in his time, that with a curious and searching eye beheld what God was a doing in the world. He was as one of those "wise men that knew the times," (as it is said of Ahasuerus's seven counsellors, Esth. i. 13,) and skilled therein not, as they, in a human or political way, but as the transactions in the world do relate unto God, who governs this world by the rules and precedents in his word. He was one of those who, as the psalmist speaks, Psal. cxi., had pleasure to seek out the great works of the Lord, and to parallel those in these times with those of old under the Old Testament; and unto that end, in the entrance to these alterations in our times, he pitched upon the explication of this prophecy, which the studious reader will with much delight read over, when he shall observe how he made application all along to the dispensations of that time in which he preached them. The Lord bless them to them of this nation, for which they were principally intended.

THOMAS GOODWIN,	WILLIAM BRIDGE,
SYDRACH SIMPSON,	JOHN YATES,
WILLIAM GREENHILL,	WILLIAM ADDERLY.

---

TO THE EXPOSITION

ON THE

EIGHTH, NINTH, AND TENTH CHAPTERS.

---

TO THE READER.

WHAT we have by way of preface set before the edition of the fourth, fifth, sixth, and seventh chapters, may sufficiently serve for a premise to these eighth, ninth, and tenth chapters, as holding forth the use and scope of the whole prophecy, and the author's intentions in his comment thereon: so as we shall only need now to give letters of credence before the world, to the passing of these, as the best and most authentic notes that could any way be obtained, both as the extracts of the best notes of sermons taken from his mouth, and chiefly his own writings, which were more brief. Expect shortly the eleventh, twelfth, and thirteenth chapters from the same hand. We commit them, and the reader, to the blessing of God.

THOMAS GOODWIN,	WILLIAM BRIDGE,
SYDRACH SIMPSON,	JOHN YATES,
WILLIAM GREENHILL,	WILLIAM ADDERLY.

---

TO THE EXPOSITION

ON THE

ELEVENTH, TWELFTH, AND THIRTEENTH CHAPTERS.

---

TO THE READER.

GOD, who alone is perfect in himself, has retained this prerogative to himself, that his work should be perfect (as Moses speaks); and, as another holy one hath it, doth all his pleasure. Paul, though in whatever he was to commit to writing (in matters sacred) had infallibility of assistance, yet perfected not all he intended: "These things we will do, if God permit," said he to the Hebrews, Heb. vi. But we no where find extant any evidence, that he accomplished what he there intended, namely, a full, methodical discourse upon those first principles and foundations of religion, which that speech had reference unto. It is no wonder then, that if such a kind of imperfection accompanied the works of so great a master-builder, it attend those who build on this foundation, and are not privileged (as yet he was) from building hay and stubble.

This sort of incompleteness hath befallen the works of this worthy author, in respect to the finishing of this prophecy, which he intended, and had performed; wherein yet to the church of God there shall be no loss, there being no thoughts nor notions suggested to any man, which, though for the present they die with him, but the same Spirit who is the inspirer of all, doth bring to light in some one or other servant of God, in his own time.

What a treasury of thoughts seemed to be lost and to die with the Saviour of the world, which he had not, could not then utter! which yet the Spirit, that filled him without measure, distributed amongst the apostles that came after him, according to the measure of the gift of Christ in each. There is no beam of Divine light has shone into any man's heart, that shall finally and for ever be put under a bushel, but in the end shall be set up, to give light to the whole house.

The purpose of this preface is, to consign the passport through the world of these last notes of the author upon this prophecy, namely, the eleventh, twelfth, and thirteenth chapters; and to assure the reader, that they are the best and most genuine that can be expected, being collected out of those under his hand, all along, and the best copies of those that took them from his mouth; and to subjoin this hearty prayer, for a blessing from Heaven on these, and the rest of these our brother's labours that are published, that his works may follow him, and he receive (at the latter day) a full reward, even according to the fruit of his doings.

THOMAS GOODWIN,
WILLIAM GREENHILL, SYDRACH SIMPSON,

WILLIAM BRIDGE,
JOHN YATES,
WILLIAM ADDERLY.

---

POSTSCRIPT BY THE SUPERVISOR

OF

THE LAST SERMON BY BURROUGHS.

THE author was prevented by several providences from preaching the foregoing sermon for some months together, insomuch as himself wondered what purpose God had in it; till at last God visited him by sickness, whereof he fell asleep in the Lord: his disease was thought to be infection, but without any sore, yea, and (as the gentlewoman his wife has related) without any spots or tokens of the plague; there was only a black settling of blood on one side of his back, which she supposed might have arisen from a fall from a horse, which he had met with not long before. This is mentioned by occasion of some contrary reports concerning his death. About the time of his immediate dissolution, he lifted up his eyes, and was heard to speak these words, "I come, I come, I come:" and so gave up the ghost.

It had been much to be wished that the author had been more concise and brief in some amplifications, which, though all exceedingly useful, yet have deprived us of his preaching and completing both the former sermon, and the rest of the prophecy. But God was pleased (for our sin no doubt) to deprive us of that mediator-like instrument between the divided godly parties of this nation, and of the further mind of the Holy Ghost which he had revealed to this his servant, touching the scope and use of this prophecy in these days.

God took him away in the strength of his parts and graces, that he might not lose in the reputation of his ministry or piety, as some have before their death.

Also, though we cannot affirm, as one of Josiah, that he was taken away lest the evil of the time should have wrought upon his temper; yet we may say, as another doth, he was "taken away from the evil to come," Isa. lvii. 1.

Moreover, it is not an unuseful note, that the Preface to the Tigurine Bible hath, whereof the inference is, That whilst in some weighty point we labour for great exactness and preparation, we are either disabled by our diligence, or prevented by our tardiness and delay; whereas moderate preparation seasonably applied might be more useful to the church, than such exactness so deferred. Which is not spoken to reflect any thing on our reverend author, but to admonish others.

Now among other arguments (good reader) to commend this excellent picce, this is one, That it has been brought to thy hand through several elements, having been in danger, part of it to be rotted in the earth where it was buried; part of it to be consumed in the fire wherewith much of the town where it was flamed; * part of it to be lost in by-holes where it was hidden in the midst of enemies. Make special use therefore of what is come (as it were) through fire unto thee for that end. And if thou find that fruit the supervisor did in preparing it for thee, thou wilt not repent thy pains or penny. Farewell.

* The original was with the supervisor in Colchester when besieged, and much of the town burnt.

TO THE EXPOSITION BY BISHOP REYNOLDS,

ON

THE FOURTEENTH CHAPTER.

---

 TO THE READER.

CHRISTIAN reader, understanding that my sermon, which was preached three years since before the Honourable House of Commons, on the day of their solemn humiliation, was to be reprinted, I thought fit to peruse, transcribe, and enlarge six other sermons, in which I had, at mine own charge in the country, on the ensuing fast days, briefly explained and applied that whole chapter, (a portion only whereof was in the first handled,) and to send them forth together with it to the public: which I was the rather induced to do for these two reasons: 1. Because it has pleased God in his righteous and holy providence to make me, by a long infirmity, unserviceable to his church in the principal work of the ministry, the preaching of the gospel (which is no small grief unto me). So that there remained no other means whereby my life might, in regard of my function, be useful to the church, and comfortable to myself, than by inverting the words of the psalmist, and as he made his "tongue the pen of a ready writer," Psal. xlv. 1, so to make my pen the tongue of an unready speaker. 2. I considered the seasonableness and suitableness of these meditations to the condition of the sad and disconsolate times wherein we live, very like those which our prophet threatened the ten tribes withal throughout this whole prophecy, unto which this last chapter is a kind of use, and a most solemn exhortation, pressing upon all wise and prudent men such duties of humiliation and repentance, as might turn threats into promises, and recover again the mercies which by their sins they had forfeited and forsaken: which being restored to them according to their petition, they are here likewise further instructed in what manner to return unto God the praises due to his great name. And these two duties of humiliation and thanksgiving, are the most solemn duties to which in these times of judgments and mercies, so variously interwoven together, the Lord so frequently calls us.

Places of Scripture I have, for brevity sake, for the most part, only quoted and referred thee to, without transcribing all the words, and have usually put many parallel places together, because by that means they do not only strengthen the doctrine whereto they belong, but mutually give light one to another.

The Lord make us all in this our day so wise and prudent, as to understand the righteous ways of our God towards us; that we may not stumble at them, but walk in them, and be taught by them to wait upon him in the way of his judgments, and to fix the desires of our soul upon his name as our great refuge, and upon his righteousness as our great business, Isa. xxvi. 8, 9: till he shall be pleased, by the dew of his grace, to revive us as the corn, to make us grow as the vine, and to let the scent of all his ordinances be over all our land, as the smell and as the wine of Lebanon.

It will be an abundant return to my poor and weak endeavours, if I may have that room in thy prayers which the apostle Paul desired to have in the prayers of the Ephesians, "That utterance may be given unto me, that I may open my mouth boldly, to make known the mystery of the gospel," Eph. vi. 19.

The Lord sanctify all the ways of his providence towards us, that when we are chastened we may be taught, and may be greater gainers by the voice of his rod than we are sufferers by the stripes.

AN EXPOSITION

OF

THE PROPHECY OF HOSEA.

CHAPTER I.

VERSE 1.

The word of the Lord that came unto Hosea, the son of Beeri, in the days of Uzziah, Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah, kings of Judah, and in the days of Jeroboam the son of Joash, king of Israel.

THIS day we begin a Scripture exposition, an exercise which has lost much of its honour by its disuse. The best apology for it is to begin it immediately. It is an ancient practice in the church of God, old enough to speak for itself. In Neh. viii. 8, we read that Ezra, Jeshua, Bani, and the rest read in the book of the law, and gave the sense, and caused the people to understand the reading.

I have determined to expound first the books of the minor prophets, of which Jerome remarks, * I know not which to wonder at most, the brevity of speech, or the greatness and abundance of sense. And the prophet Hosea in this respect is most excellent, of whom the same author says he is † exceedingly concise, and speaks by sentences. Why I chose rather to begin with Hosea than with Isaiah, I shall afterward inform you. If God continue life and this exercise, we may go through all the prophetic books, both small and great. In these prophets we have most admirable truths revealed to us; and it is a pity that the mind of God contained in them should be so little known, even unto his children; that such treasures of heavenly truths should lie hid from so many for so long a time.

We might preface our work by labouring to raise your hearts to the consideration of the excellency of the Scriptures in general. Luther uses a high expression about them; he calls them ‡ the highest genus, that contains in it all good whatever. Take away the Scripture, and you even take away the sun from the world. What is the world without the Scriptures, but hell itself? We have had indeed the word of God as the sun in the world, but oh how many mists have been before this sun! Seldom the sun shines clearly to us. Seeing there is such a glorious sun risen, it is distressing that there should be a misty day. Now the work to which we are called is, to dispel the mists and fogs from before this sun, that it may shine more brightly before your eyes, and into your hearts.

Chrysostom§ in his twenty-ninth sermon upon Genesis, exhorting his auditors to get the Scriptures into their houses, and diligently to exercise themselves in them, tells them that by them the soul is raised, elevated, and brightened, as with the beam of the Sun of righteousness, and delivered from the snares of unclean thoughts. In the Scripture the great God of heaven has sent his mind to the children of men; he has made known the counsel of his will, and opened his very heart unto mankind. The Bible is the epistle that God has sent into the world. Did we but hear of a book dictated immediately by God himself, to show the children of men what the eternal counsels of his will were for conducting them to eternal happiness, and his thoughts and intentions concerning their everlasting condition; did we, I say, but hear that there was such a book in the farthest part of the Indies, should we not rejoice that the world was blest with such a mercy? What strong and vehement desires should we have to enjoy but one sight of it before we died! We should be willing to venture upon any hazard, to pass through any difficulty, to be at any expense, that we might have but a glance at such a book as this. My brethren, you need not say, Who shall go to the farthest part of the Indies to fetch us this book? who shall descend into the depth, or go to the uttermost part of the earth, to gain us a sight of this book of Scripture? for, behold, the word is nigh unto you, it is in your houses, and we hope in your hearts, and in this exercise it is to be in our mouths, not only to tell you what it saith, but to explain to you the mind of God in it.

To exercise ourselves in this book is sweet indeed.

* Nescio utrum brevitatem sermonum, an magnitudinem sensuum admirari debeas.

† Commaticum et quasi per sententias loquentem.

‡ Genus generalissimum omnium bonorum. Si hoc au-feras, solem e mundo sustulisti: quid mundus, sublato verbo, quam infernus?

§ Ἄλλα καὶ οὐκ αἰδᾷ μετὰ χεῖρας λαμβάνειν τὰ ἅγια βιβλία ἢ ψυχὴ πτεροῦται καὶ μετὰ σοῦ ζῆναι, τῷ φωτὶ τῷ τῆς δικαιοσύνης ἡλίου καταναζομένη, &c.

Ego odii libros mē, et serpe opto eos iterire, quod mētē ne morientur lectores et abducatur lectione ipsius Scripturę, que sola omnia sapientie fons
est. Act. Luther in
Gen. c. 19.

Luther professes himself out of love with his own books, and wished them burnt, lest men, spending time in them, should be hindered from reading the Scriptures, which are the only fountain of all wisdom: I tremble, said he, at the former age, which was so much busied in reading Aristotle and Averroes. We read in Neh. viii. 5, 6, when Ezra opened the book of the law to expound it to the people, he "blessed the Lord, the great God: and all the people answered, Amen, Amen." And now blessed be the Lord, the great and gracious God, for stirring your hearts up to such a work as this, and blessed be his name for those liberties we have thus freely to exercise ourselves in this service. Oh praised be the name of the great God for this day's entrance into so good a work as this. Yea, they not only blessed God, but "they lifted up their hands, and bowed their heads, and worshipped the Lord with their faces to the ground." Why? Because the book of the law was read to them and expounded. How came it to pass that their hearts were so ready to hear the book of the law expounded to them? Surely it was because they were newly returned out of captivity. When they came into their own land, and heard the law of God opened to them, they blessed his great name, and bowed their faces to the ground, worshipping him. This day, my brethren, witnesses our great deliverance and return from bondage. Not long since we could not have either ordinances, truths, or religious exercises, but according to the humours of vile men. But now, through God's mercy, a great deliverance is granted to us, that we may come and have free liberty to exercise ourselves in the law of our God. O bless the Lord, and bow your faces to the ground, worshipping him!

In the 12th verse of that chapter we read, that after they had heard the law read and expounded to them, they "went their way to eat, and to drink, and to send portions, and to make great mirth." Why? "Because they had understood the words that were declared unto them." I hope, if God shall please to give assistance in this work, many of you shall go away from this assembly rejoicing, because you know more of God's mind revealed in his word than formerly; and this will be the comfort of your meat and drink, and of your trading, and the very spirit of all the joys of your lives. As the sweetness of the fruit comes from the graft, rather than from the stock; so your comforts and the blessing of grace must come from the word ingrafted in your souls, rather than from any thing you have in yourselves.

In the 1st verse, Nehemiah saith, "All the people gathered themselves together as one man into the street that was before the water gate," to desire Ezra to bring the book of the law, and to read it and to open it unto them. Behold, it is thus this day in this place; here is a great company met together, some to know what the business will be, some for novelty, and some for other ends; but we hope many have come that they may have the book of the law read and opened unto them. Now we expect that from you which is said of them, ver. 3, "And the ears of all the people were attentive unto the book of the law," when it was read and expounded. And truly that attention which now you show promises that we shall have an attentive auditory. But yet that is not all; let us have further a reverential demeanour and carriage in the hearing of the law, as it becomes those who are to deal with God. It is said, ver. 5, that when Ezra opened the book of the law, "all the people stood up." We do not expect the same gesture from you, but by way of analogy we expect a reverential demeanour in your carriage during the whole work, as knowing we are to sanctify God's name in it. Those people after the first day's exercise were so encouraged, that they came again the second day; ver. 13, "On the second day were gathered together the chief of the fathers of all the people, the priests, and the Levites, unto Ezra, to understand the words of the law." And I hope God will so carry on this work, that you shall find encouragement too to come again and again, that you may know more of the mind of God; and that this work shall be profitable not only to the younger and weaker class, but to the fathers, to the priests and Levites also.

Let it be with you as it was with them; according as you have any truth made known unto you, submit to it, yield to it, obey it immediately, and then you shall know more of God's mind: "If any man will do his will, he shall know of the doctrine whether it be of God," John vii. 17. Thus did they; for, ver. 14, when they found it written in the book of the law, that the children of Israel should dwell in booths in the feast of the seventh month, (this was one passage of the law which was expounded, how they should keep the feast of tabernacles, and what booths they should make,) the people immediately went forth to the mount, and fetched olive branches, and palm branches, and branches of thick trees, and made themselves booths, every one upon the roof of his house. In this prophecy of Hosea you will find many truths suitable to the times wherein we live; the Lord grant you obedient hearts to what shall be delivered.

I must not retard the work, nor your expectations, any longer with a larger preface, only somewhat might have been said about the rules for the interpretation of Scripture; I will only observe that, to the interpretation of Scripture, a Scripture frame of heart is necessary, a heart holy and heavenly, suitable to the holiness and heavenliness which are in the word. As it was said of Tully's eloquence, that nothing but the eloquence of Tully could describe its excellency; so it may be said of the spirituality of Scripture, nothing but a heart filled with Scripture spiritualness can set forth its excellencies. And because the authority of Scripture is supreme, we desire the prayers of you all to God for us that his fear may fall upon our hearts, that seeing we are men full of error and evil, yet we may not bring any scripture to maintain any erroneous conceit of our own heads, nor any evil of our own hearts: this we know to be a dreadful evil. It was a fearful evil for Lucifer to say, "I will ascend into heaven, I will exalt my throne above the stars of God: I will sit also upon the mount of the congregation, in the sides of the north; I will ascend above the heights of the clouds; I will be like the most High," Isa. xiv. 13, 14. It is as great an evil for any to seek to make the Highest appear like Lucifer; for they who make the Scripture justify any erroneous opinion, or any way of evil, go about to make the blessed God and the Holy Ghost to be the fathers of lies. It is counted a great evil in a commonwealth to put the king's stamp upon false coin; and to put the stamp of the Spirit of God upon an error, upon a conceit of a man's own, is certainly a great evil before the Lord. God made the priests vile and contemptible before the people, because they were partial in the law, Mal. ii. 9. And for you, my brethren, our prayer shall be, that the fear of God may fall upon you likewise, that you may come to these exercises with Scripture frames of heart.

What frame of heart is a Scripture frame? The Holy Ghost tells you, Isa. lxvi. 2, God looks at him that trembleth at his word: come with hearts trembling at the word of God; come not to be judges of the law, but doers of it. You may judge of your profiting in grace by the delight you find in Scripture; as Quintilian was wont to say of profiting in eloquence, a man may know that by the delight he finds in reading Cicero. It is a true sign of profiting in religion, when

Tom debere utire se
aliquid profiteri, cum Ciceroniu lectio
est valde jucunda.

the Scriptures are sweeter to us than the honey and the honeycomb.

And now the work we have to do is, to open the difficulties and to show you the Divine truths contained in this portion of Scripture. May they spring up from the fountain of life itself, and be presented to your minds with freshness and power.

These five things are to be inquired concerning the prophet whose prophecy I am now to open, which are contained either in the 1st verse or in the chapter :

- I. Who he was.
- II. To whom he was sent.
- III. What his errand was.
- IV. His commission.
- V. The time of his prophecy.

I. Who this prophet was.

I will explain only what you have of him in the 1st verse, "Hosea the son of Beeri." His name signifies a saviour, one that brings salvation; it is the same root from which Joshua is derived; and many saving and savoury truths we shall find this prophet bringing to us.

He was the son of Beeri. We do not find who this Beeri was in Scripture, only that he is here named as the father of the prophet. Surely it is honoris gratia to the prophet, and hence

Obs. That parents should so live and walk, that it may be an honour to their children to be called by their names, that their children may neither be afraid nor ashamed to be named with them.

The Jews have a tradition which is generally received among them, that whenever a prophet's father is named, that father was a prophet as well as the son. If that were so, then surely it is no dishonour for any man to be the son of a prophet. Let the children of godly, gracious ministers be no dishonour to their parents, their parents are an honour unto them. But we find by experience that many of their children are far from being an honour to their godly parents. How many sons of ancient godly ministers, who heretofore hated superstitious vanities, have of late been the greatest zealots for such things. It reminds me of what the Scripture says concerning Jehoiakim, the son of Josiah, and of the difference between his father and him. When Josiah heard the law read, his heart melted, and he humbled himself before the Lord, 2 Kings xxii. 19. But when Jehoiakim his son heard the law of God read, he took a pen-knife, and cut the roll in which it was written in pieces, and threw "it into the fire that was on the hearth, until all the roll was consumed," Jer. xxxvi. 23. There was much difference between the son and the father: and thus it is between the sons of many ancient godly ministers and them; their fathers indeed might be an honour unto them, but they are a dishonour to their fathers.

"The son of Beeri." The word Beeri is derived from באר puteus, a well that has springing water in it, freely and clearly running. So ministers should be the children of Beeri; that which they have should be springing water, and not the mud, and dirt, and filth of their own conceits mingled with the word. This only by way of allusion.

II. To whom was this prophet Hosea sent?

He was sent especially to the ten tribes. I suppose you all know the division of the people of Israel which took place in Rehoboam's time; ten of the tribes went from the house of David, only Judah and Benjamin remained with it. Now these ten tribes, rending themselves from the house of David, separated themselves also from the true worship of God, and horrible wickedness and all manner of abominations grew up amongst them. To these ten tribes God sent this prophet. He sent Isaiah and Micah to Judah, Amos and Hosea to Israel; all these were contemporary. If you would know the state of Israel in Hosea's time, read but 2 Kings xv. 24, "Jeroboam did that which was evil in the sight of the Lord, he departed not from all the sins of Jeroboam the son of Nebat, who made Israel to sin." But notwithstanding Israel was thus notoriously wicked, and given up to all idolatry, yet the Lord sent his prophets Hosea and Amos to prophesy to them even at this time. Oh the goodness of the Lord, to follow an apostatizing people, an apostatizing soul! Mercy yet pleaded while God was speaking in anger; but woe to that people, to that soul, concerning whom the Lord shall give in charge to his prophets, Prophecy no more to them!

III. What was Hosea's errand to Israel?

His errand was to convince them clearly of their abominable idolatry, and those other wickednesses in which they lived, and to denounce severe threatenings, yea, most fearful destruction. This was not done before by the other prophets, as we shall afterward make appear; but it was Hosea's errand specially to threaten an utter desolation to Israel more than ever was before, and yet withal to promise mercy to a remnant to draw them to repentance; and to prophesy of the great things that God intended to do for his church and children in the latter days.

IV. What was his commission?

The words tell us plainly, "The word of the Lord came to Hosea." It was the word of Jehovah. It is a great argument to obedience to know that it is the word of the Lord which is spoken. When men set reason against reason, and judgment against judgment, and opinion against opinion, it prevails not; but when they see the authority of God in the word, then the heart and conscience yield. Therefore however you may look upon the instruments that bring it or open it to you, as your equals or inferiors, yet know there is an authority in the word that is above you all; it is "the word of the Lord."

And this word of the Lord "came to Hosea." Mark the phrase: Hosea did not go for the word of the Lord, but the word of the Lord came to him; he sought it not, but it came to him, אשר היה אל-הושע that is, the word of the Lord came or was made into him, was put into him. Such a kind of phrase you have in the New Testament, John x. 35, "If he called them gods, unto whom the word of God came," προς ος ες ο λογος του Θεου εβλεπετο, that is, to whom the commission came to place them where they were. So the word of the Lord came to Hosea. The knowledge of a call to a work will help a man through the difficulties of the work. One of the most notable texts of Scripture to encourage a man to the work to which he sees he is clearly called, is that which is spoken of Christ himself, Isa.

xlii. 6, "I the Lord have called thee in righteousness." What follows then? "I will hold thy hand, and will keep thee, and give thee for a covenant to the people, for a light to the Gentiles." If we know God's call to a work, (as for the present this of ours is exceeding clear unto us,) though the work be difficult and liable to much censure, yet the Lord will hold our hands, and will be with our minds, and our tongues, and our hearts, and make us instruments to give some light to others.

V. What was the time when Hosea prophesied?

You have it in the text, "In the days of Uzziah, Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah, kings of Judah, and in the days of Jeroboam the son of Joash, king of Israel." It is computed by chronologers that Hosea lived about 814 years before Christ. In his time the city of Rome was built. It was the beginning of the Olympiads. Eusebius tells us that there was no Grecian history, and if no Greek learning, then not any that was of any author-

באר in Hiphil
הושע Salvavit.

Magna semper fecerunt, qui, Deo vocante, docuerunt.
Luther.

Ab hoc tempore Greeca de temporibus historia vera creditur. Euseb. de Prepar. Esau. l. 29.

c. ult.

ity, extant before the time of Hosea. He prophesied in the reigns of Uzziah, Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah. We have much more of God's mind revealed in this than at first view we apprehend. Hosea prophesied a very long time, probably fourscore years; but it is certain he was in the work of his ministry above seventy years. I make that clear thus: He prophesied in the days of Jeroboam, who though he is here named last, yet was the first of these kings that took up some of his time. But suppose you reckon from the end of Jeroboam's reign, from that to the beginning of Hezekiah were seventy years, and yet the text declares he prophesied both in Jeroboam's time and in Hezekiah's time. After the death of Jeroboam, Uzziah lived thirty-eight years. He reigned fifty-two in all. He began his reign in the twenty-seventh year of Jeroboam, 2 Kings xv. 1. Now Jeroboam lived after that fourteen years, for he reigned forty-one in all. Take fourteen out of fifty-two, and there remains thirty-eight. After him Jotham reigned sixteen years, and then Ahaz succeeded him, and reigned sixteen years more. So that between these two kings, Jeroboam and Hezekiah, were seventy years, in which Hosea prophesied, besides the forty-one years of Jeroboam, and twenty-nine years of Hezekiah, in both whose reigns too you see he lived; and therefore it is probable that Hosea continued in the work of his prophecy at least fourscore years. See what of God's mind will spring from this.

Obs. 1. It pleases God sometimes that some men's labours shall abide more full to posterity than others, though the labours of those others are greater and as excellent as theirs. Hosea continued so long, and yet there is not much of his prophecy extant, only fourteen short chapters. This is according to the diversity of God's administrations. Let the ministers of God learn to be faithful in their work, and let God alone to make them eminent by having their labours extant.

Obs. 2. It appears from hence that Hosea must needs begin to prophesy very young. If he were a prophet fourscore years, certainly he was very young when he began to prophesy; and yet he was called to as great an employment as any of the prophets. It pleases God sometimes to stir up the hearts of young ones to do him great service. He sends such sometimes about great works and employments; so he did Samuel, and Jeremiah, and Timothy. Therefore let no man despise their youth.

Obs. 3. Hosea prophesying thus long, it appears he lived to be old in his work. When God has any work for men to do, he lengthens out their days. So he did the days of John the disciple, who lived a hundred years, if not more; for the time of writing his Gospel was in the ninety-ninth year of Christ, sixty-six after the ascension. Let us not be too solicitously careful about our lives, to maintain our health and strength; let us be careful to do our work, for according as the Lord hath work for us to do, so he will continue to us our health, and strength, and life. When you come to die, you may die comfortably, having this thought in you: Well, the work that the Lord appointed me to do is done, and why should I seek to live longer in the world? God has others enough to do his work. It was a sweet expression of Jacob, "Behold, I die: but God shall be with you, and bring you again unto the land of your fathers," Gen. xlviii. 21. So may a prophet of God say, who has been faithful in his work, Behold, I die, but the Lord shall be with you; my work is finished, but God has others who are young to carry on his work.

Obs. 4. You may see by Hosea's continuance in so many several kings' reigns, that he went through a variety of conditions. Sometimes he lived under wicked kings, sometimes under moderate kings, sometimes he had encouragement from godly and gracious kings, though they were kings of Judah. Not only the people of God, but especially God's ministers, must expect a variety of conditions in the world; they must not promise to themselves always the same state.

Yet further, Hosea prophesied in all these kings' reigns. Here appears the constancy of his spirit, notwithstanding the many difficulties he met with in his work; for, prophesying in the time of Jeroboam, Jotham, and Ahaz, who were wicked princes, he must surely have met with many discouragements: and though he continued fourscore years, yet he saw but little success of his labour; for the truth is, the people were not converted to God by his ministry. Nay, it is apparent they grew worse and worse; for it is said of that Jeroboam in whose time Hosea began his prophecy, that he did evil in the sight of the Lord, and continued in the ways of Jeroboam the son of Nebat, 2 Kings xv. 24; but after we read most horrible things of which Israel was guilty. In 2 Kings xvii. 17, it is said, "They caused their sons and their daughters to pass through the fire, and used divination and enchantments, and sold themselves to do evil in the sight of the Lord, to provoke him to anger;" besides many other dreadful things you may read in that chapter. This was in king Hoshea's time, which was towards the end of Hosea's prophecy.

Obs. 5. God may continue a prophet a long time amongst a people, and yet they may never be converted. It is a distemper in ministers' hearts to incline to abandon their work because they see not desired success. Latimer, in one of his sermons, speaks of a minister who was asked why he left off preaching, who replied, because he saw he did no good: this, says Latimer, is a very naughty answer. What we have here may be a great stay to those who have laboured many years in the work of the ministry, and yet think they have done little or no good; Hosea was fourscore years a prophet to Israel, and yet did not convert them. But notwithstanding all these discouragements, he continued constant, and that with abundance of freshness and liveliness, even to the end of his prophesying.

Obs. 6. It is an honour to the ministers of God, who meet with many difficulties and discouragements in their way, yet continue fresh and lively to the very end. Many young ministers are fresh and lively when they begin first: oh how full of zeal and activity are they then! but after they have been a while in their work, or when they have gained what they aimed at, they grow cold, and that former vigour, freshness, and zeal which appeared to be in them become much flatter. Like soldiers, who at the first are forward and active in service, but afterward come to live upon their pay, and can do no service at all; or rather, as vessels when they are first tapped, the wine is very quick and nimble, but at last grows exceeding flat. As we commend that vessel of wine that draws quick to the very last, so it is an excellent thing for a minister of God to continue fresh, and quick, and lively to the last end. It is true, nature and natural abilities may decay, but a spiritual freshness may appear when natural abilities are decayed. To see an old prophet of God, who has gone through many difficulties and sufferings, and yet continues fresh and lively in the work of the ministry, and has spiritual excellencies sparkling in him then, this is a most honourable sight, and calls for abundance of reverence.

Obs. 7. It pleases God many times to let his prophets see the fulfilling of their threatenings upon the people against whom they have denounced them. Hosea prophesied so long, that he most probably saw the fulfilling of his prophecy; for he continued prophesying till Hezekiah's time, and in the sixth year of Hezekiah's reign came the destruction of Israel. Hosea had threatened an utter taking of them away, but it was not done till then. Perhaps the people go away, and scorn and contemn the prophets, and their words are but wind with them; but God often lets his ministers live to see their words fulfilled upon them. For it is common with individuals, when upon their beds of sickness or death, to say, Ah, the word of the Lord is true that I heard at such a time, it is now come upon me! So God dealt with the people in Jeremiah's time; they laughed and contemned him, but Jeremiah lived to see the fulfilling of those threatenings. And if they live not to see the fulfilling of their words, yet soon after their death they are fulfilled, as it was at Hippo, where Austin threatened judgments against the people; they were not executed in his time, but soon after he was taken away they came.

Hosea not only prophesied in these kings' days, but in the days of Jeroboam king of Israel. Here are three questions:

1. What is the reason that Jeroboam, who in truth was the first of these kings, is named last?

2. Why only one king of Israel is named, and three kings of Judah? for in the time of Hosea's prophecy there were six other kings of Israel, Zachariah, Shallum, Menahem, Pekahiah, Pekah, Hoshea.

3. Why Jeroboam is named at all?

One answer will be sufficient for the first two questions, why Jeroboam is named last, and why there is but one king of Israel named. The answer is this, God took no great delight in the kings of Israel, for they had forsaken the true worship of God. Though there was much corruption in Judah, yet because they kept to the true worship of God, God took more delight in Judah than in Israel. Therefore he names Jeroboam in the last place, though he was first, and only him.

But why was Jeroboam named at all?

It was that you might understand the state of the people of Israel at the time of Hosea's prophecy. Much is to be learned from hence. The state of the people of Israel in the time of Jeroboam's reign was very prosperous, though their wickedness was very great. 2 Kings xiv. shows you, that a little before this they had been in very great distress, and under sore afflictions; but in Jeroboam's time they had the greatest prosperity they had ever known. For this Jeroboam was not the first Jeroboam, the son of Nebat, that caused Israel to sin, and occasioned the rent of the ten tribes from the house of David; that occurred above a hundred and forty years before this; but the Jeroboam in whose time God sent Hosea to prophesy this great wrath against the house of Israel, was the son of Joash. Now in all this time the kingdom was never in a more prosperous condition than in the days of this Jeroboam.

Two things are to be observed concerning the condition of the people at this time.

First, That they were a little before this in great adversity, and then afterwards they grew up to great prosperity. That 14th chapter of the Second of the Kings informs you that they were under sore affliction, ver. 26. "There was not any shut up, nor any left, nor any helper for Israel." It is a comparison taken from shepherds, that shut up their flocks when they would keep them safe from danger; but now here was such a general desolation and woeful affliction upon Israel, that there was none shut up, nor any helper left. But then comes this Jeroboam, and it is said, ver. 25, that "he restored the coast of Israel from the entering of Hamath unto the sea of the plain." And, ver. 28, "He recovered Damascus and Hamath, which belonged to Judah, for Israel." This Hamath of which he speaks was of great use, it was the inlet of the Assyrians; and for Jeroboam to conquer that place, to recover Damascus, and to add that to the crown of Israel which belonged to Judah, shows that after their bitter affliction

God granted a great mercy by Jeroboam's means, and that now Israel flourished greatly, and grew exceedingly prosperous. There is much of God's mind held out to us in this: as, in that the people of Israel had been under sore affliction, and delivered, yet God sent Hosea to them to show them their horrible wickedness, and to threaten destruction.

Obs. 1. Hence see the perverseness of the children of men, that after great deliverances granted them from bitter and sore afflictions, yet they will continue in their wickedness and rebellion. The Lord grant this may not be true concerning us. God has delivered us in great measure from those sore and bitter afflictions and heavy oppressions under which we lately groaned, and has restored to us many gracious liberties; now have we not need of an Hosea to be sent unto us to rebuke us, and to threaten judgment for the evil of our ways? This is a sad thing.

Obs. 2. God may let a sinner continue a long time in the way of his sin; and when he has flourished many years, and thinks surely the bitterness of death is past, God may threaten judgment. Jeroboam reigned one and forty years, and Hosea must have prophesied in the latter end of Jeroboam's time. Jeroboam might think, Why does he come to contend with me, and to tell me of my sin and wickedness, and to threaten judgment? have not I continued these forty years king, and have prospered? and surely God hath been with me. Well, a sinner may hold out long, and yet afterward judgment may come.

Obs. 3. A people in a flourishing condition, when they prosper most, and overcome their enemies, and have all according to their hearts' desire, even that may be the time for God to appear in his wrath against them. So it was here; therefore we must not judge our enemies to be happy, nor fear them, because of their present flourishing state, nor be secure ourselves because of the mercies we enjoy. God does not always act thus, but sometimes he is pleased, as here, to stay till sinners are at the height of their prosperity, and then to come upon them. Sometimes God is more sudden. Zachariah the son of this Jeroboam thought he might venture as well as his father: My father prospered in such ways forty-one years, and why may not I? No, God came upon him in six months, 2 Kings xv. 8.

Secondly, When Hosea came to prophesy against Israel, he saw them in their prosperity, and yet continued to threaten judgment against them. It was a further argument of the Spirit of God that taught him, and of the special insight which he had into the mind of God, that he should thus prophesy destruction to them, when they were in the height of their prosperity. It is true, if Hosea had prophesied in Zachariah's days, when the kingdom was declining, or in Shallum's time, and others after him, then he might have seen by the working of second causes that the kingdom was going down. But he comes in Jeroboam's time, when there was no appearance from second causes of their destruction, and then prophesied destruction unto them.

Obs. 1. It is a sign of the special insight the soul has in the ways of God, that can see misery under the greatest prosperity. The prophet did not think Israel in a better condition because of their outward prosperity; a sign his prophecy was from God. Yet further, this being in the reign of Jeroboam, when they were in great prosperity, their hearts were exceedingly hardened against the prophet; and it cannot be imagined but that they entertained his prophecy with scorn and contempt; for it is a usual thing, when men are in the height of their pride, like the wild ass's colt, to scorn and contemn all that comes against them.

Obs. 2. It is easy for a minister of God to deal plainly with people in the time of adversity, but when men are in their pride and jollity, to deal faithfully with them then is very difficult. That their great prosperity raised up and hardened their hearts with pride against the prophet appears plainly, if you will read Amos vii. 10; (for we must find God's mind by comparing one place with another;) there you see the fruit of Jeroboam's prosperity, for Amos and Hosea were contemporary. When Amos was prophesying, "Amaziah the priest of Beth-el sent to Jeroboam king of Israel, saying, Amos hath conspired against thee in the midst of the house of Israel: the land is not able to bear his words." This was said of Amos, and it is likely that Hosea did not meet with better treatment. Amaziah the priest of Beth-el did this. If there be any enemies against faithful ministers, they are the priests of Beth-el, idolatrous and superstitious ministers. And what course do they take? They send to the king, to the governors; O they have conspired against the king, they are seditious persons, factious men, who stir up the kingdom, and break the peace of the church, the land cannot bear their words. Such a message as this you see Amaziah sent to the king concerning Amos; he turns off all from himself to the king, and all the punishment that must be inflicted upon Amos must be in the name of the king. And mark the 12th verse of that chapter, "Also Amaziah said unto Amos, O thou seer, go, flee away into the land of Judea, and prophesy there." We are not holy enough for you, forsooth we are idolaters, we do not worship God aright, we are no true church; get you to Judah among your brethren, and prophesy not any more here at Beth-el. Why? Because "it is the king's chapel, and it is the king's court." It seems then in those times that the king's chapel and the king's court could not bear with a faithful prophet. And what was the ground of it, but because at this time Jeroboam prospered in his way, and the kingdom was in a more flourishing condition than it ever was before. Here then was the trial of the faithfulness of Hosea's spirit yet to go on in the work of his prophecy.

Yet further; in that Hosea prophesied in the time of Jeroboam, it will appear that he was the first prophet that ever brought these hard tidings to them of the utter destruction of Israel. "The Lord said not that he would blot out the name of Israel from under heaven: but he saved them by the hand of Jeroboam the son of Joash," 2 Kings xiv. 27. Mark, there is given the reason why the Lord saved them by the hand of Jeroboam, because he had not yet said he would blot out the name of Israel from under heaven; that is, the Lord never before sent any of his prophets thus plainly and fully to declare his intention to them, to blot out the name of Israel, upon their going on in their sins. So that it is clear that Hosea was the first that was sent about this message. And certainly it was so much the harder, he being the first of all. For they might have said, Why do you come with these new things, and in so great severity? who ever did so before you? We know if a minister come with any thing that seems to be new, if he presents any truth to you that has but a show of novelty, though it be never so good and comfortable, he finds little encouragement. Nay, if he but comes in a new way, as this very exercise, because it is likely to be pursued in a way that has been disused, it will meet with many discouragements. What then will the threatenings of hard things, of judgments and destruction, do when they come with novelty? Surely Hosea had a hard task of this, and yet he went on faithfully with it. Thus much for the time wherein Hosea prophesied.

Ver. 2. The beginning of the word of the Lord by Hosea. And the Lord said to Hosea, Go, take unto thee a wife of whoredoms and children of whoredoms: for the land hath committed great whoredoms, departing from the Lord.

Some from these words gather, that Hosea was the first of the prophets whose writings have come down to us. Though it is true we cannot gather it directly from hence, yet it is apparent that notwithstanding Isaiah is set first, yet Hosea was before him; for if you look into Isa. i. you find that his beginning was in the days of Uzziah. Now Hosea was in the days of Jeroboam, and Jeroboam was before Uzziah. And this may be one reason why, though I intend the whole prophetic books, yet I rather begin with Hosea, because indeed he was the first prophet: it is clear you see from the Scripture, though we cannot gather it from these words in this 2nd verse.

But yet thus much we may gather from these words, "The beginning of the word of the Lord by Hosea," that this was the beginning of his prophecy. And what was this beginning? what did God set him about first? Mark the next words, "And the Lord said to Hosea, Go, take unto thee a wife of whoredoms and children of whoredoms;" and so declare to the people of Israel that they had "committed great whoredom, departing from the Lord:" the most grievous charge and most severe and terrible expression of God's wrath against that people that you meet with in all the book of God. This is Hosea's work, and he was very young when first he went about it. Now, as I told you before, God sometimes calls young ones to great services; but to call a young man to go to this people with such a message, in the midst of all their pride and flourish to contest with them thus, and to tell them that they are children of whoredoms, and no longer the people of God, for a young man to do this! Why, men grown old and soddin in their sins might reason, If this indeed came from the mouth of some old prophet, reverend for his years and experience, it had been somewhat; but to come from a green-head, for an upstart to upbraid us with such vile things! But let us know, my brethren, if God send any message unto us, though by young persons, he expects our entertainment of it. When God would destroy Eli's house, he sends the message by young Samuel; but Eli did not reason thus, What, this young boy to come and speak thus malapertly to me! No, he stoops to it, and saith, "Good is the word of the Lord."

Again, Hosea must tell them that they are children of whoredoms, and not the people of God. What, for a minister when he comes first among a people to begin so harshly and severely! is it not better to comply with the people, to come with gentle and fair means, to seek to win them with love? if you begin with harsh truths, surely you will make them fly off immediately. Thus many reason. Now I beseech you take heed to your own hearts in reasoning thus. Many have done so, and have sought to comply with the people so long, till they have complied away all their faithfulness, and conscience, and vigour. When they come to great men, rich men, men in place and eminence, they will comply with such; but let them have any of God's people in their parish who are of a mean rank and poor, they comply little enough with them, but are harsh and bitter to them, and regard not the tenderness of their consciences at all.

It is true, if ministers have the testimony of their own consciences that they would take no other way but what shall be for the greatest profit of their people, maintaining such a disposition as to be willing to undergo any sufferings to which God shall call them, they may say first when they come to a house, Peace be to this house, especially when they come to a place that has not had the means before. But if it be to a people who act directly against the light of their consciences, a superstitious people, that cannot but be convinced, and have had many evidences, that their conduct is against the mind of God, and yet for their own base ends will go on and not amend: in such a case we may come with harshness at the very first. So Paul gives a charge to Titus in dealing with the Cretians, who were evil beasts and slow bellies, that he should "rebuke them sharply" (so we translate it); the word is, ἀπορώμω, cuttingly, Tit. i. 13.

"The beginning of the word of the Lord by Hosea." The particle which is translated by signifies in as well as by; it is not El, but Beth, and so it is read by some, The word of the Lord came in Hosea. This expression notes the inward and intimate converse that the Lord had with the spirit of Hosea in the work of his ministry. The Lord spake first in Hosea, and then Hosea speaks out unto the people. Some such expression we have concerning Paul, Gal. i. 16, That Christ may be revealed in me; not only to me, but in me. The more inwardly God speaks and converses with the hearts of his ministers, the more inwardly and efficaciously they are able to speak to the people. This is deep preaching, when it is from the heart to the heart.

Quanto profundius
quidem aequitur, tanto operosius pre-sentatur. August.
de Hosea, l. 1. de
Civ. c. 25.

And so Augustine says of Hosea, because that which he spake was so deep, it wrought more strongly. Hosea's prophecy must needs be deep, for God spake in him before he spake out to the people. We say that which comes from the heart will go to the heart; surely that which comes from the voice of God in the heart, will go beyond the ears to the hearts of people. And blessed are the people that have such ministers who will speak nothing to them, but what has first been spoken by God in them.

Again in this 2nd verse he twice uses the same expression: "The beginning of the word of the Lord by Hosea;" and again, "The Lord said to Hosea;" and yet in the beginning of the 1st verse, "The word of the Lord came to Hosea." Why all this three times? With good reason; for Hosea was to come with a terrible message to the people, and to reprehend them with much sharpness, to tell them that they were the children of whoredoms, and that they had departed from the Lord, and he would have no more mercy upon them, but would utterly take them away. He had need therefore have an express command for what he did, and to have much evidence of the Spirit, that what he said was from God, and not any thing of his own spirit. When a minister of God shall come and reprehend a people severely for their sins, and threaten God's judgment, let him then, if ever, look to it that he has a good warrant for what he saith, that what he shall deliver may be nothing but the word of God in him, the sheer word of God, without any mixture of his own. It is an ordinary thing for ministers in reprehending sin, and denouncing threatenings, to mingle much of their own spirit and wrath. But if at any time ministers should take heed of mixing their own wrath, then especially when they denounce God's wrath, then they should bring nothing but the word of the Lord; for it being a hard message, the spirits of men will rise up against it. If they once see the spirit of the minister in it, they will be ready to say as the devil in the possessed man, "Jesus I know, and Paul I know; but who are ye?" So they, The word of the Lord I know, but what are you? here is your own passion, your own humour. O let not any think to oppose sin with sin; "the wrath of man worketh not the righteousness of God," James i. 20. You that are ministers, would you have a sentence? I will give you one: When you are called to reveal God's wrath, conceal your own.

The scope of the prophecy is the very same as the scope of this chapter, to declare, first, The evil condition in which the ten tribes were, both in regard of their sins, and the punishment that was to be executed for their sins. Secondly, Gracious promises of mercy to a remnant; to Judah, in the 7th verse; and to Judah and Israel both, from the 10th verse to the end of the chapter.

First, God begins with conviction, to show them their sin, and the dreadfulfulness of it. Conviction should go before correction. You must not presently fly in the faces of those who are under you when they cross you; first instruct them, and then correct them. God would first convince them of the greatness of their sins, not by verbal, but by real expressions. Things that assail the ear slowly stir and work upon the heart, but things that are presented before the eye are more operative; and therefore Hosea must not tell them only that they had committed whoredom, but must tell them in this way; he must go and take a wife of whoredoms, and beget children of whoredoms.

Segnius irritant
animos demissa per aures, quam
quæ sunt oculis subjecta fidelibus, et quæ ipse ubi
trahit spectat.
Horat. de Arte Post.

In the entrance of the prophecy you see we meet with a great difficulty. First, a command from God, from the holy God, to a prophet, a holy prophet, to go and take "a wife of whoredoms;" not an ordinary harlot, but a most prostitute woman, "a wife of whoredoms;" as, in the Scripture phrase, a man of bloods, is a man who has shed much blood; and a man of sorrows, is a man who has been exercised with many sorrows; so "a wife of whoredoms," is one who has committed vile, notorious lewdness. Yet such a wife must the prophet take to himself, and his children must be children of whoredoms too. How can this be?

St. Austin, who had been a Manichee, having to deal much with Manichees, met with this objection against the Old Testament from one Faustus, a Manichee: That Old Testament of yours, Moses and the prophets, said Faustus, is that of God? do you not find there a command to take a wife of whoredoms, and can this be from God?

Austin answers it thus: Though she had been a prostitute before, yet she might be reclaimed; and so she might be called a wife of whoredoms, from that whoredom of which she was heretofore guilty. And so he thinks that it was a reality that Hosea did take to himself a wife of whoredoms.

Quid adversum dicimus veritatem, quid dicit Christiane si meretrix, relicta fornicatione,
in castum conjugi-um commutatur?
S. Aug. cont.
Faust. l. 22. c. 60.

Theodoret is somewhat angry with those who think it was not really done, but only in a way of vision. I find many of our later men are of the same mind: so Arias Montanus, Piscator, Pareus, Tarnovius, and others think, and they explain it thus; that it is a command of God, and therefore though it had not been lawful for Hosea to have done it, yet, God commanding it, he might do it. As they instance in other cases that seem to be somewhat of the like nature, as the children of Israel's borrowing of the Egyptians, Abraham's killing his son, and the like.

Eorum audaciam
mirari satis nequeo, qui non verentur
dicere verba hanc
esse rebus destituta.
Theod. in Hos.
enar. c. 1.

If this should be so, (and as many interpreters so explain it, it appears a thing not impossible,) we might learn thus much from it.

Obs. 1. That God's command takes away all matter of offence. It would be a notorious, offensive thing for a prophet, a minister of God, to marry a wicked harlot; yet so far as the offence is, God's command is enough to take it away. For the subject of offence is not duty, but indifference: any thing that is a duty to be done, we must perform it, though it be never so offensive to others; but if it be a thing of indifference, then we may stop. God's command takes away all plea of offence. I speak not thus of man's command, for men, even magistrates themselves, are bound not to offend their brethren, as well as others.

But then it may be said they should command nothing at all, for some or other would be offended. And shall not they command because some weak ones may be offended? It is true, that which they believe in their consciences to be their duty, they are bound to command, and they would sin against God if they did not command it, and require obedience to it: they must do it, though never so many be offended. But in matters which they themselves acknowledge to be neither for God's service or for the good of a commonwealth, the rule binds them as well as others in regard of offences to forbear.

Obs. 2. That the prophet must suffer much in his credit before men, only to be serviceable to God for a further expression of his mind. Our credit, our names, and all we are or have, must lie down at God's feet to be serviceable to him in the least thing, if but in a way of expression of his mind, much more in bearing witness to his truth.

Obs. 3. We see the wisdom of God in putting the prophet in the very first service upon a very difficult work. It could not but be a thing exceedingly irksome to his spirit to marry such a one, yet God commands him to do it. It is the usual way of God, when he calls any to great services, at the beginning to put them to such difficult works as shall try them, that if they go through them, then they may be confided in, that they will go through more afterward.

But we shall rather understand this in a way of vision, as others do; not that Hosea did really marry such a wife, but it appeared to him in a vision, as if such a thing were really done, only to declare what the condition of the people of Israel was at this time in respect of God: as if God should say, Hosea, this people of Israel is to me no other than as if thou shouldst have a wife that were the most notorious harlot in the world, and all their children are to me as if thy children were the children of whoredom and fornication. And this I conceive to be more directly the mind of God. I will not give you my mere conception of it, but reasons why it must be so.

First, Because we find in Scripture that which is historically related was sometimes done in a way of vision. It is a usual way of Scripture to express that which is done in vision as if it were a history, as if it were really done. I will show you two examples for this: one of Jeremiah, when he was at Jerusalem, yet the Scripture speaks as if he had been at Babylon; and the other of Ezekiel, when he was at Babylon, it speaks as if he had been at Jerusalem. It is as fully related as this is here, and both must therefore needs be understood as in a way of vision. First, for Jeremiah, you have it chap. xiii. 4. God requires there that he should "go to Euphrates, and hide his girdle there in a hole of the rock:" but this river was a river in Babylon, and Jeremiah was not in Babylon at that time, nor in all the time of the siege, nor in the time of the captivity; neither could he go to Babylon, for the city was now besieged, and when he did but essay to go a little way to Anathoth, his own town, he was seized as if he had been a traitor to his country. Therefore that which is declared as a history was only done in a vision. So Ezekiel was at Babylon (for he was the prophet that prophesied to the people who were carried captive to Babylon; God sent a prophet to them to help them there in their captivity); yet, chap. viii. of his prophecy, Ezekiel seems to be brought to Jeremiah, and he is bidden there to dig a hole in the wall to see the wicked abominations that the ancients of Israel did there. Now Ezekiel was not there, he was at Babylon; but it is declared as if the thing had been done really. So we are to understand Isaiah's going naked twenty days, and Ezekiel's lying three hundred and ninety days on the one side, and forty-three on the other, Ezek. iv.

Secondly, That it was a vision, and not really done. We observe, it was God's command, Lev. xxi. 7, that the priest must not marry with a whore. Of all men's wives, God is most careful of the wives of those who are in the work of the ministry, and who are church officers;

therefore when, in 1 Tim. iii. 11, but a deacon is described, his wife is described also, that she should be "grave, no slanderer, sober, and faithful in all things." You never read that when God appoints what a magistrate's office should be in a commonwealth, that he takes such care to set down what his wife should be; but when he appoints the lowest officer in a church, a deacon, he appoints what his wife should be too. Therefore the wives of ministers should go away with a lesson from hence, and know that God has a more special eye to them than to the wives of all the men in the world besides. God is tender of the credit of the officers of his church, and so should man be, for their discredit is a hinderance to their work.

Yea further, we read, Amos vii. 16, that it was threatened as a curse to Amaziah the priest of Beth-el, that his wife should be a harlot, for resisting the prophet: shall then the wife of Hosea be a whore? for Amos and Hosea prophesied both at the same time. And the Scripture saith, 1 Cor. xi. 7, that "the woman is the glory of the man." What a glory would Hosea have had in such a match as this! The woman is the glory of the man; how? In two respects she is so. 1. Because it is a glory to a man that he has such an image, for she is from the man; and as the man, being the image of God, shows the glory of God, because he is the image of God and from him; so the woman, being from the man, and as it were his image, she is the glory of the man. 2. Because man has such an excellent creature brought under subjection to him. Man is not only made glorious by God, in that God has put all other creatures under him; but especially in this, that God has put such an excellent creature under him as the woman, for the woman is the glory of the man. This could not be here in such a match as this.

Thirdly, It could not be that it was a real thing, but a vision, from the prophecy itself. If real, Hosea must have stayed almost a whole year before he could have gone on in his prophecy. For, first, he must take to him a wife of whoredoms, and beget a child of whoredoms; then he must have stayed till the child had been born, before he could have come to the people and said, My child is born, and his name is Jezreel, and it is upon this ground that I have named him thus; and then he must have stayed almost a year more before he could have had Lo-ruhamah; and then after that he must stay almost another year longer before Lo-ammi could be born.

Fourthly, The expression used here is, that God spake in Hosea; speaking and appearing to him by an inward vision, as it were in an ecstasy, saith Polanus; therefore we must understand that this wife of whoredoms whom Hosea was to marry was in a way of vision. It was to signify that Israel was to God as a wife of whoredoms, and as children of whoredoms should have been to the prophet if he had been married to her.

From all these reasons there is this result, that the people of Israel were gone a whoring from God. Idolatry is as the sin of whoredom; and I cannot open this scripture, except I show you wherein idolatry is like the sin of whoredom. The idolatry of the church, not the idolatry of heathens, is whoredom. One that commits adultery gives herself to another. The heathens, because they were never married to God, their idolatry is not adultery; but the people of God, being married to the Lord, their idolatry is adultery.

1. Adultery breaks the marriage bond. There is nothing breaks the marriage bond between God and his people but the sin of idolatry. Though a wife may be guilty of many failings, and be a grievous trouble and burden to her husband, yet these do not break the marriage knot except she defile the marriage bed. So though a people may be guilty of notorious and vile sins, yet if they keep the worship of God pure, they are not guilty of whoredom, but still God is married to them.

2. Whoredom is a loathsome thing. Though delightful to men, yet loathsome to God. Idolatry is the same; therefore the Scripture describes the idols that men set up by a גלילי a word which signifies the very excrement that comes from creatures, Ezek. xxii. 3. Idolaters think their way of idol worship to be very delightful, but that which they call delectable God calls detestable, if you compare these two scriptures: Isa. xlv. 9, they call their idols "delectable things;" but in Ezek. v. 11, God calls them "detestable things." Idolatry is a detestable, loathsome thing.

3. There is nothing canse so irreconcilable a breach between a man and his wife as defiling the marriage bed by adultery: Jealousy is the rage of a man, and he will take no ransom. There is nothing wherein God is so irreconcilable to a people as in the point of false worship.

4. Adultery is a besotting sin. "Whoredom and new wine take away the heart," saith the prophet, chap. iv. 11; and in Isa. xlv. 19, saith God, He hath no understanding to say, "I have burned part of it in the fire; yea, also I have baked bread upon the coals thereof; I have roasted flesh, and eaten it: and shall I make the residue thereof an abomination? shall I fall down to the stock of a tree?" He hath no understanding to consider this. Idolatry is a besotting sin, as well as adultery. And therefore we need not marvel, though men of great parts and abilities continue in their superstitious way of worship, for nothing besots men's hearts so much as that.

5. Whoredom is a most dangerous sin. "The mouth of strange women is as a deep pit: he that is abhorred of the Lord shall fall therein," Prov. xxii. 14. Oh most dreadful place to an adulterer! If there be any adulterer in this place this day, when thou goest home turn to that scripture, and let it be as a dart to thy heart, "The mouth of strange women is as a deep pit: he that is abhorred of the Lord shall fall therein:" a sign of a man abhorred of God. And so is idolatry; for in 2 Thess. ii. 11, 12, God gave them over to believe a lie, that they might be damned. Those that follow the idolatry of antichrist are given over by God to believe a lie. That lie of popery altogether is one lie. Hence it is that the popish party invent so many such strange lies, all to uphold that great lie. Why is this? That they might be damned. Idolatry is a dreadful, dangerous sin. Though idolaters think they please God in and by such ways of worship, yet they are given over by God that they may be damned. If this prove to be a place that concerns those who follow antichrist, and if Rome proves to be as that scripture describes her, it is a dreadful text to all papists.

6. Harlots are accustomed to deck themselves in pompous attire and gaudy raiment. So idolaters deck up their idols in bravery, and lavish gold (as the Scripture speaks) upon their idols; whereas "the King's daughter is all glorions within," and the simplicity of the gospel will not permit such things.

7. Though women go a whoring from their husbands, yet still they retain (before the divorce) the name of wives, and their children (though bastards) retain the name of children, and bear the father's name. So idolaters retain the name of the church, and those that they beget must still be called the only sons of the church.

But how are his children said to be children of whoredoms? for snopse his wife were a wife of whoredoms, yet, being married to her, wherefore should the children be called children of whoredoms?

To that is answered, 1. Some think upon this ground, because the children when they grow up would follow the way of the mother, as is usual for children to do.

Therefore you need take heed how you enter into the estate of marriage for your children's sake, for they will follow the way of the mother. Or rather, 2. Because, though they were begotten after marriage, yet they will lie under suspicion as those that are illegitimate. The children of one that has been a harlot are always suspected, and so in repute they are the children of fornication: so says God, These people are to me as if their children were accounted children of fornication.

"For the land hath committed great whoredom." Or, as Arins Montanus reads it, In going a whoring it will go a whoring. They Fornicando fornicato: ut, as Arins Montanus, Fornicando fornicabitur. not only have, but will; they are set upon it, they are stout-hearted in the way of idolatry. It is the land that has done it, the people of the land.

But why the land? It is a secret check to them, and an upbraiding them for their unthankfulness, that when God gave them so good a land, the land of Canaan, that flowed with milk and honey, the land of promise, and gave it to them to nourish up the true worship of God, yet they made this land of God, this land of promise, to be a land to nourish up most vile idolaters.

"Departing from the Lord," from Jehovah. The more worthy the husband is, the more vile and odious the adultery of the wife. What! to go a whoring from God, the blessed God, in whom is all beauty and excellency, and turn to blind idols? What! change the glory of the invisible God into the similitude of an ox that eateth grass? With what indignation doth God speak it! O you that go a whoring after your sinful lusts, this will lie most dreadfully upon your consciences one day, that it was from the Lord that you departed, from that infinite, glorious, eternal Deity, the fountain of all good, to cleave to base, sinful, and unclean lusts.

Who is this whore? and what are the children that are begotten to Hosca by her?

Ver. 3. So he went and took Gomer the daughter of Diblaim; which conceived, and bare him a son.

We must obey God in things that seem to be never so much against our reason and sense.

"He took Gomer the daughter of Diblaim." The word Gomer, גומר comes from a word which signifies both perfection and defection; and so it may be applied both ways. Some apply it to perfection; that is, a harlot that was perfect and complete, both in her beauty and in her fornication. The word likewise signifies rottenness, corruption, and consumption: so indeed are all things in the world; as soon as they grow to any perfection, they begin to decline quickly to corruption. All but spiritual things do so; they indeed grow still higher and higher.

This Gomer we will take rather in the second acceptance of it, as it signifies rottenness and consumption. Who was this Gomer? She was גומר בנות דבלים "the daughter of Diblaim." The signification is, according to some, "one that dwells in the desert," in reference to that famous desert Diblath, of which we read Ezek. vi. 14, noting the way of idolaters, that they were wont to go into woods and deserts, and there to sacrifice to their idols. But rather, according to most, Diblaim signifies bunches of dried figs, which were the delicacies of those times; so Ceolampadius, from which he observes, that rottenness and corruption proceed from voluptuous pleasures and delicacies. Though the pleasures of the flesh are very contentful to you, yet destruction is the fruit of them; destruction is the daughter of sensual pleasures and delights: so saith the Scripture: "If ye live after the flesh, ye shall die," Rom. viii. 13. "Whose end is destruction, whose God is their belly, whose glory is in their shame," Phil. iii. 19.

But to apply it to Israel. Israel was as "Gomer the daughter of Diblaim;" that is, the people of Israel were now near to destruction, and were the daughters of sensual delights, they gave themselves over to sensual pleasures.

It is the usual way of those idolaters who forsake the true worship of God, to give themselves up to the pleasures of the flesh. Sensuality and idolatry usually go together. When the people of Israel sacrificed to the calves, what did they? They ate and drank, and rose up to play; that was all their work, and good enough for the worshipping of such a god, a calf. You know the more we began to decline in the worship of God, we began to be more sensual; there must be proclamation to people to take their sports and delights upon the Lord's day; and indeed it usually accompanies defection in the way of God's worship. False worship lays not such bonds upon men's consciences for the mortifying the lusts of the flesh as the worship of God does. Therefore those men who love to give liberty to the flesh are soonest enticed to ways of superstitious worship. Jeremiah, in chap. xxiv. 9, sets forth the state of those naughty Jews that were in captivity by the similitude of a basket of rotten figs; which is agreeable to this, and the more confirms this interpretation, that Israel was as Gomer the daughter of Diblaim, that is, rottenness, the daughter of sensuality.

Thus for the mother. But now the son that is begotten of this mother is Jezreel.

Ver. 4. And the Lord said unto him, Call his name Jezreel; for yet a little while, and I will avenge the blood of Jezreel upon the house of Jehu, and will cause to cease the kingdom of the house of Israel.

"Call his name Jezreel." The prophet must give a name to his son. It belongs to parents to give names to their children. Godfathers and godmothers (as they call them) are of no use for this, or for any thing else that I know; and, in such holy things as sacraments are, we must take heed of bringing in any useless, any idle things.

But here we are to inquire, First, The signification of this name; Jezreel signifies the scattered of the Lord. Secondly, The reasons why the son of Hosea must be called by this name, יִזְרְעֵל Jezreel. Five reasons may be given.

First, That hereby God might show that he intended to avenge that blood which was shed in Jezreel.

Secondly, To show that Israel had lost the honour of his name, and was no more Israel, but Jezreel. There seems to be much similarity between the name Israel and Jezreel, but there is a great deal of difference in the signification: for Israel is one that prevails with God, "the strength of the Lord;" Jezreel is one that is "scattered by the Lord." Many outlive the honour of their name and reputation. These ten tribes are no more worthy to be called by the name of Israel, their famous progenitor; but now Jezreel, the scattered of the Lord.

Thirdly, Jezreel, to show the way that God intended to bring judgment upon these ten tribes. And what was it? God would scatter them.

God brings judgment specially upon a kingdom when he scatters the people. We read, 1 Kings xxii. 17, that when Micaiah saw the destruction of Ahab and his people he had this vision; "I saw all Israel scattered upon the hills, as sheep that have not a shepherd." There is a twofold scattering; a scattering among ourselves by divisions, and a scattering by the enemy one from another to flee for our lives. The one part of this judgment (the Lord be merciful to us) is upon us already, and in this sense we may be called Jezreel. Oh how is our kingdom divided! how is it scattered! The Lord keep us from the other scattering, that we be not scattered one from another by being forced to flee for our lives before the enemy. It is just with God, that if we scatter ourselves sinfully by way of division, that God should scatter us in his wrath to our destruction by giving us up to our enemies. If we love scattering, if we delight in division, we may soon have scattering enough, there may soon be divisions enough one from another.

Fourthly, Call his name Jezreel, to note that the Lord would scatter them even in that very place where in they most gloried, as they did in the valley and city of Jezreel. But God would scatter them even in that place in which they so much boasted.

Fifthly, Jezreel, because the Lord would hereby show that he would turn these conceits and apprehensions that they might have of themselves quite the contrary way. As thus; Jezreel signifies indeed scattered of the Lord, but it signifies also the seed of the Lord, or sown of the Lord; and so the Jews were ready to take the name Jezreel, and would be content to own it, because it signified the seed of God; and hence it comes to signify scattered too, because that seed is to be scattered when it is sown; and hence it was that they might glory so much in that name. O, they were the seed of the Lord, in an abiding condition, as being sown by the hand of God himself. No, saith God, you are mistaken, I do not call you Jezreel upon any such terms, because you are sown of me; but quite the other way, because you shall be scattered and eventually destroyed by me. It is usual with God to turn those things which men take as arguments for their comfort to their confusion. Haman made a false interpretation of the action of Esther's inviting him to the banquet alone with the king, the right interpretation of it had been that it was to his destruction. And so here; whereas they might make such interpretation of Jezreel, as that they were the seed, the sown of the Lord, the true interpretation is that they are the scattered of the Lord.

All these five reasons you have either in the nearness of the name Israel with Jezreel, or otherwise in the words that follow after.

"For yet a little while, and I will avenge the blood of Jezreel upon the house of Jehu." Here now we come to that which is the main part of this scripture; and these four questions are of great use, and will tend much to edification.

I. What is this "blood of Jezreel" that God will avenge?

II. Why God "will avenge the blood of Jezreel upon the house of Jehu?"

III. Why is it called "the house of Jehu," and Jehu alone, without the addition of the name king, as it is usual in others, as Hezekiah king of Judah, and such a one king of Israel; but here only the house of Jehu?

IV. What is this "little while" God speaks of? "yet a little while."

The words are read and passed over ordinarily, as if there was little in them; but you will find that they contain much of the mind of God.

I. What was the "blood of Jezreel" that here God threatens to avenge? You may read the history of it in 2 Kings ix. 10, 11. It was the blood of the house of Ahab, the blood of Jezebel, the blood of the seventy sons of Ahab, whose heads the elders of Jezreel sent to Jehu in baskets. This was the blood that was shed in this place, which God saith he will avenge. God will certainly avenge blood; and if God will avenge the blood of Ahab, he will surely avenge the blood of Abel; if the blood of Jezebel, then surely the blood of Sarah; if the blood of idolaters, then the blood of his saints. What vengeance then hangs over antichrist for all the blood of the saints that has been spilt by him! The scarlet whore has dyed herself with this blood; yea, and vengeance will come for that blood of our brethren which hath been shed in Ireland, upon those who have been instrumental in it, great or small: certainly the righteous God will not suffer that wicked and horrid work to go unavenged, even here upon the earth. Let us wait a while, and we may live to see that time wherein it shall not only be said by the voice of faith, but by the voice of sense itself, "Verily there is a God that judgeth the earth."

II. Why will God "avenge the blood of Jezreel upon the house of Jehu?"

Indeed this at first sight is one of the strangest things we have in all the book of God. Compare it with other scriptures, and nothing appears more singular than that it should be said that the Lord would avenge the blood of Jezreel upon the house of Jehu. For in 2 Kings ix. 7 you find that Jehu was anointed by the Lord on purpose to shed that blood. He had a command from God, he was bidden to go and shed it, and the holy oil was poured upon him for that end, that he might shed that blood; yet now it must be avenged, and avenged upon the house of Jehu. Yea, chap. x. 30, God said, because he had shed the blood of the house of Ahab in Jezreel, he would reward him for it, and that his children to the fourth generation should sit upon the throne of Israel and govern that kingdom. But that which Jehu was anointed and commanded to do, that for which God afterward rewarded him for doing, now God says he will avenge, and avenge it upon his house. What are the reasons of this? There are three reasons why God would avenge this blood upon the house of Jehu.

1. Because though Jehu did it, yet he looked at himself and his own ends rather than at God in it; his aim was to get the kingdom to himself, but he never aimed at God in the work, therefore God says he will avenge it upon his house.

2. Because though he did that which God set him about, yet he did it but by halves. Indeed he destroyed Ahab's house, but he should have destroyed Ahab's idolatry too; but he omitted that, and therefore now God comes upon him.

3. Yea, though he was made Ahab's executioner for his idolatry, yet he proved Ahab's successor in his idolatry. He was God's rod in punishing Ahab, but he continued in the sins that Ahab committed; therefore now God saith he "will avenge the blood of Jezreel upon the house of Jehu."

From hence we have most excellent observations that spring naturally, as a fountain bubbles up fresh and springing water. I will only show them to you, and so pass them over.

Obs. 1. That a man may do that which God commands, and yet not obey God. He may do that which God would have done, and yet not please God. He may do what God requires, and yet serve himself therein, and not God.

Obs. 2. A carnal heart is contented to go so far in God's commands as will serve his own turn, but there he stops. So far as might serve the elevation of Jehu to the crown of Israel, to setting him on the throne, so far he goes in the way of God's command, but no farther. Such a heart is like the hand of a rusty dial: suppose the hand of a rusty dial stand (as now) at ten o'clock; look upon it, and it seems to go right, but it is not from any inward right state of the clock it does so, but by accident; for stay till after ten, and come again at eleven or twelve, and it stands still as before at ten. So let God command any thing that may hit with a man's own ends, and be suitable to him, and he seems to be very obedient to God; but let God go on further, and require something that will not serve his turn, that will not agree with his own ends; and here God may seek for a servant; as for him, he will go no farther.

Obs. 3. God knows how to make use of men's parts and abilities, and yet to punish them for their wickedness notwithstanding. Jehu was a man of a brave and valiant spirit, full of activity and courage, and God would make use of this for the destruction of the house of Ahab; yet Jehu must not escape. Many men have excellent parts of learning and state policy, which God may use for pulling down his proud adversaries; yet God may punish them afterward notwithstanding. Many that have but weak parts, and can do but little, shall be accepted of God; and others that have strong parts, and can do much, shall be punished by God. We read, Rev. xii. 16, "the earth helped the woman;" yet, chap. xvi. 1, the vials of God's wrath were poured forth upon the earth: men may be useful for the public, and yet not freed from the wrath of God.

Obs. 4. The Lord knows how to make use of the sins of wicked men to further his own counsels; yet no excuse to them, but his curse will come upon them at last for those sins. God knows how to make use of the proud heart and ambitious spirit of Jehu to fulfil his purpose against the house of Ahab; and yet afterward, when God has done with him, he comes against Jehu with a judgment. There are many whose strong lusts God overrules for himself, and overpowers for the furtherance of his own ends. Many a scholar who, through the mere pride of his heart, will study hard and preach very often and well, God makes use of for the good of others, and yet the minister may be damned himself.

Obs. 5. God may sometimes reward a work in this world, yet may curse a man for the work afterward. Many there are who perform some outward service for God, and perhaps rejoice in it, and think that God must needs accept them: they have been excellent men in the commonwealth, they have stood for ministers, they have been forward in a good cause. Well, thou hast done these: has not God rewarded thee? Hast thou not health and strength of body. Look upon thy estate; art not thou blessed there? Look upon thy table, thy wife and children; art not thou blessed there? Thou hast thy penny for what thou hast done. But yet, after thou hast had thy pay here in this world for what thou hast done, God may curse thee hereafter even for the sinfulness of thy heart in that work which for the matter of it was good. God may reward thee for the matter, but curse thee for the manner of thy work.

Obs. 6. It is a most dangerous thing for men to subject the works of God, especially the public works of God, to their own base ends; God will be sure to be even with them for that. The more excellent any work is, the more dangerous it is to subject it to a lust. It is an evil thing to make meat, and drink, and clothes serviceable to our lusts; but to make public services to God stoop and be serviceable to your base lusts must needs be grievous indeed. It is accounted burden enough for the basest servant to be serviceable to some base lust of his master; but if the master should make his wife serviceable to his filthy uncleanness, oh what a villany were that! So I say, the greater the thing is any man makes serviceable to his lust, the more vile and the more dangerous is the sin. Hearken to this, you that are professors of religion. The drunkard makes beer serviceable to his lust, and he shall be damned for that; but you make the worship of God, prayer, and hearing, and fasting, serviceable to your lusts; oh what shall become of you! A base wretch, that sits tipping in an alehouse, you account vile, but it is a poor creature that he subjects to his base lust. A minister or a magistrate subjects things of a higher nature to their lusts: oh this is exceeding vile. We had need, my brethren, all pray earnestly for those whom God employs in public works, that they may not only have strength to assist them, and success in them, but that they may have hearts to give God all the glory of them; for though they may do never so worthily for God in the church or in the commonwealth, yet if they be not careful to give God all the glory, God will curse them at last notwithstanding.

Obs. 7. When but half the work is done, God curses the whole for our neglect of the other half. Jehu does somewhat which God commanded him, but not all. I remember Calvin upon this place likens Jehu to king Henry the Eighth: Henry, saith he, cast off some degree of popery so far as would serve his own turn, but there were the five articles in force still, for which many suffered at that time; and so he was like Jehu in that. God will be served with the whole heart; for all our good is in God, and therefore all our hearts must make out after God. God must have perfect obedience in the desire and endeavour, or else he will have none. Certainly that which must make any man acceptable, is not so much that there is somewhat done, but that that which God commands is done, or done in regard of the endeavour; for that indeed will be acceptable: though we cannot do all at once, if we bring somewhat to God as a part, and acknowledging the whole debt, work for the remainder, it will be accepted. As suppose a man owes you one hundred pounds, and brings you but fifty in part of payment, yet if he acknowledge the rest, and promise the payment of it, if you know he will be faithful in the payment of the other, you will accept it; but if a man bring you fourscore pounds in lieu of all, you will not accept it. So it is here; hypocrites say they cannot be perfect in this world, and so think to put off God with a little. It is true, if thou hadst an upright heart, and didst bring God but part and labour after the whole, he would accept it; but if thou bringest him ten times more than a sincere heart can bring him, it will not be acceptable, no, not ninety-nine pounds will be accepted, if brought instead of the whole. God must have a man according to his own heart, such a one as David: you know what was said of David, "I have found a man after my own heart, that shall fulfil all my wills;" for the word is plural in the original, not all my will, but all my wills.

Obs. 8. Jehu did but half, and the worst half too, and therefore God comes upon him. For the great care of Jehu was only to reform things in the state and kingdom, and therefore that indeed he did thoroughly; he transferred the government from the house of Ahab, and set up another government. But for the matter of the worship of God, he cared not what became of that. Still the calves continued in Dan and Bethel. He took no care that the people of Israel should go up to Jerusalem, the place that God had appointed to worship him in a right way. This is that for which God thus cursed him and his house. It is a very evil thing in reformers, who have power in their hands, to be more careful of the state than of the church; to be more solicitous about affairs in civil policy than in religion; to be so afraid to meddle with religion, because of hinderances and disturbances in civil policy, that they sacrifice religion for it: this is an evil thing and a bitter. Or if they reform the church, yet to reform only that which is notoriously evil and vile: so far Jehu went; he destroyed the priests of Baal, but not the priests of Dan and Bethel; the idols of Baal were destroyed, but the idols of Dan and Bethel were retained.

It is the speech of the philosopher in his politics, when he gives a rule of policy, The care of divine things must be first; and that is the best policy. Politicians must trust God in the way of policy, and take care of divine things first. Yea, and go to a thorough reformation too; for Jehu did something in religion, but left other things, therefore God cursed him. Men must take heed of betraying the cause of God for the maintenance of state policy; let them be never so excellent in their way, yet if they do thus, God will blast them.

Obs. 9. Men can see the evil of sin in others, rather than in themselves. Jehu saw the danger of that wicked and abominable sin of idolatry in others, but he could not see it in himself. "What peace," said he to Joram, "so long as the whoredoms of thy mother Jezebel" continue? "What peace? Then what peace, Jehu, so long as the whoredoms of Israel continue afterwards? This is common, my brethren, for men to see evil and danger in the sins of others; but when they come to themselves, to be blind there: to inveigh against the sins of other men, when they seem to be far off from them, or that they cannot make use of them; but when they can make use of them, then to embrace them. Thus it was with Saul; he was exceedingly severe against witchcraft, all the witches in Israel must be put to death; but in his hour of need Saul himself goes to the witch of Endor.

Obs. 10. Those ways of sinful policy, by which many think to raise their houses or themselves, are the means to ruin them. Jehu thought, by retaining the calves in Dan and Bethel, to preserve the kingdom to his posterity, and this proved the ruin of his posterity. He that walks uprightly walks surely.

Obs. 11. Let them who punish the sins of others take heed what they do, lest they be found guilty themselves; for if they be found guilty, God will plague them, as if they did the greatest act of injustice. God punishes Jehu because he continues in the same sin that Ahab was punished for. This is of excellent use, especially to magistrates; and indeed it is a dreadful place to magistrates, if considered. As for instance, suppose a magistrate should take away the life of a man lawfully for that for which God would have him take it away; yet if this magistrate should be guilty of the same sin, or that which amounts to the same sin, God will avenge himself upon this magistrate as upon a murderer: as here, God avenges himself upon the house of Jehu as for murder, yet Jehu was a magistrate, and this was commanded Jehu by God himself. So suppose a magistrate fine a man for any evil, and that justly; yet if he be guilty of the same himself, God will deal with this magistrate as if he robbed by the highway-side, and took away a man's money by violence. It is apparent out of the text. Certainly, my brethren, great wrath and vengeance hangs over the head of wicked magistrates. All this you learn from what is here said, that God "will avenge the blood of Jezebel upon the house of Jehu."

III. Why is it called "the house of Jehu?"

The house of Jehu is his posterity, or family who were to succeed. Though it was to the fourth generation till God came against them, yet the posterity of the ungodly, especially idolaters, shall suffer for their fathers' sin. It is very observable, that God in no other commandment but the second threatens the sin of the fathers upon the children. The reason is this:

That commandment forbids images, and superstitious worshippers, above all men, are strengthened by the tradition of their fathers. Our fathers did thus and thus, and what shall we be wiser than our forefathers? We have now a company of upstart men, and they will be wiser than their ancestors. Because superstitious worshippers harden themselves so much from the example of their fathers, therefore in that very commandment against making and worshipping of images God threatens to visit the sin of the fathers upon the children, and in no other.

What, the house of Jehu, after Jehu was dead! how can that be? Yes, as a prince that has to punish two traitors, both of whom have deserved death, but the prince is inclined to show mercy. Against the one there πρώτου περι

βιβλιου ἡ Πρωτης Αετ.
Αναλ. Τολ. 1. 7. c. 8.

comes this accusation, This man's father was a traitor, and his grandfather and his great grandfather were traitors. Then let him die, saith the prince. But of the other, that is guilty of as much as this man was, it is told the king, Sir, this man's father performed excellent service for the commonwealth, not one of his house but was a loyal person. This man is spared, though he deserveth death equally with the other for the same treason; and the king is just in this. The first man may be said to die for his fathers' sin; that is, he would not have been executed if his forefathers had not been in the fault. Take heed what you do in the course of your lives; if you regard not yourselves, yet, for your children's sake, leave not a curse behind you upon your offspring; look upon them, pity them. Though you yourselves may escape in this world, yet you may leave the inheritance of your sins unto your children. Pity your children, that they may not have cause to curse the time that they were born of such parents, and wish that they had rather been the offspring of dragons, and a generation of vipers, than to be born of such parents that have left them a curse for an inheritance. It had been better if you had not left them a penny, than to leave them to inherit the curse of your wickedness.

"Upon the house of Jehu." The house of Jehu fares the worse for Jehu. Those who desire to raise and continue the honour of their houses, let them take heed of ways of wickedness; for wickedness will bring down any family whatsoever. But why is it "the house of Jehu," without any addition of Jehu the king, as in other cases it is usual? Hereby God would give a check to Jehu, and bid him look back to the meanness of his birth, for Jehu was not of the kingly race: yet how unthankful was he, who was raised from the dung-hill, thus unworthily to depart from the Lord! You whom God has raised up on high to great honours and estates, look back to the meanness of your beginning, from which God has raised you, and labour to give him an answerable return of obedience. Those who will not give God the glory of their honours and estates, it is just that their honours and estates should be taken from them.

IV. What is this "little while" God speaks of?

"Yet a little while." This is to be understood either in reference to Jehu, or in reference to the house of Israel. "Yet a little while, and I will avenge the blood of Jezreel upon the house of Jehu, and will cause to cease the kingdom of the house of Israel." It was a long while before God came upon the house of Jehu, still he saith, yet but a little while, I will stay but a little longer ere I avenge the blood of Jezreel upon the house of Jehu. It was now the third generation since Jehu committed those sins, nay, it will appear that it was above a hundred years from the sins of Jehu to God's avenging the blood of Jezreel upon his house: for Jehu reigned twenty-eight years, his son Jehoahaz seventeen years, and Jehoash his son sixteen years, and Jeroboam his son forty-one years, and then in the days of Zachariah, the son of this Jeroboam, God came to avenge this blood, which was above a hundred years, 2 Kings x. 36; xiii. 1, 23. Oh the patience of the Lord towards sinners! But though he stayed long, he saith, "yet a little while."

Obs. 1. That God sometimes comes upon sinners for their old sins. Sins a long time ago committed, and perhaps forgotten by you, yet remain, are filed and recorded in heaven above a hundred years after the commission. It is likely that these sins of Jehu were forgotten, yet God comes now at last to avenge the sins of Jehu upon his house. So he did for the sins of Manasses, and for the sins of Joseph's brethren. It was twenty-two years before they had their consciences troubled, and then say they, "We are verily guilty concerning our brother; therefore is this distress come upon us;" and now (saith Reuben) "behold also his blood is required," Gen. xlii. 21, 22.

Look to yourselves, you that are young, take heed of youthful sins. Youthful sins may prove to be the terrors of age. Perhaps you think it was a great while ago, when you were a young man, that you were in such a tavern or in such a journey, and committed such and such sins. Have you repented for them? have you made your peace with God for them? Though you were then young, and did not fear the wrath of God to come upon you; yet now you are old the wrath of God may come upon you for sins committed in your apprenticeship. "A sinner being a hundred years old shall be accused," Isa. lxv. 20.

Obs. 2. A long time after the flourishing of a nation God may reckon with it in ways of judgment. "Yet a little while, and I will cause to cease the kingdom of the house of Israel." This nation had continued a pompous, successful nation, though idolatrous, for about two hundred and sixty years before that wrath of God came upon it which was here threatened. This may make us look back to the sins committed in the days of Henry the Eighth, and of Queen Mary. Let us not plead from our forefathers for the maintenance of superstitious worship, but let us look to the sins of our forefathers, and bewail them before the Lord, for God may come upon a nation for former sins after it hath flourished a long time. You ask me, Was it really but a little while from the beginning of this prophecy till the ceasing of the kingdom of the house of Israel? No, my brethren, it was many years. And it is very observable, that from the beginning of this prophecy, which was in the end of the reign of Jeroboam, to the fulfilling of what was here threatened, viz. to the ceasing of the kingdom of the house of Israel, it was seventy-six years. For, from the end of this Jeroboam, spoken of ver. 1, unto the time of Hezekiah, was seventy years, and in the sixth year of Hezekiah Israel was destroyed by the king of Assyria; and yet God saith here by Hosea, "yet a little while."

Obs. 3. Seventy-six years are but a little while in God's account. Sinners think, either in ways of judgment or mercy, a little while to be a great while. If God defer mercy seven years, it is a great while in our account. We think our parliament has sat a long time: how long? Almost two years. A great while! We think every day a great while, but seventy-six years, yea, a hundred, a thousand years, are but as one day unto God. So for judgment: a sinner, if he has committed a sin seven years ago, he thinks it is a great while, and he has not heard of it, therefore surely it is forgotten. But what if it be seventy years ago? You that are sinners of seventy years old, all is but a little while in regard of God.

Obs. 4. The apprehension of a judgment just at hand is that which will stir the heart and work upon it most. "Yet a little while," and God will cause the kingdom to cease; therefore if ever you repent, repent now, for it is but a little while ere God will cause the kingdom to cease. The apprehension of a sinner to be upon the brink of judgment, beholding his poor soul ready to launch into the infinite ocean of eternal destruction, and to lie under the scalding drops of the wrath of the Almighty; this works upon the heart indeed. It is the way of the flesh and the devil to put far from us the evil day, to make us believe the day of death is a great way off. But it is the way of God to exhibit things present and real; and in this consist the efficacy and power of faith to make things future as if present. We say in nature there must be a contiguity and nearness between things that must work. So we must apprehend a nearness between the evil that is to come upon us and ourselves, that so it may work upon our hearts.

An excellent scripture you have to this purpose in 1 Kings xiv. 14; where the Lord threatens to "raise him up a king over Israel who should cut off the house of Jeroboam that day: but what?" (he immediately recalls his word:) "even now;" you may think the day a great way off, but it is "even now;" and therefore now come in, return and repent. O sinners, consider that your danger is now; not only in that day of Christ: but what? even now, it may be at hand.

Obs. 5. God suffers some sinners to continue long, others he cuts off speedily. Jeroboam had continued above forty years in his sin, but now Zachariah his son, upon whom this threatening was fulfilled, continued but six months. Perhaps he thought to escape as long as his father. No; though the father continue old in his sins, if the son presume to follow his steps he may be cut off presently.

"And I will cause to cease the kingdom of the house of Israel." Kingdoms and monarchies are subject to change. What is become of all the glorious monarchies in the world? how hath the Lord tossed them up and down as a man would toss a ball! Idolatry is enough to destroy the greatest monarchy in the world.

But there is some instruction in the elegance of the word והשכתי "and I will cause to cease." It is a metaphor (according to some) taken from instruments, that a man uses for a while, and when he has done with them, either hangs them up against a wall and regards them no more, or else brings them to the fire to be burned. So saith God, "yet a little while, and I will cause to cease," &c. As if he should say, Indeed there was a time wherein I made some use of the rent between Judah and Israel, and of this kingdom; but I have done with that use, there is an end of it, and now I will cause to cease the kingdom, I will take them away, they shall be to me as an instrument not to be used any more, or for the fire. When the Lord has any use of a people, or of any particular men to do him service, he will preserve them, though they are wicked; and when he has done with them, he either lays them aside, or else brings them to the fire. A husbandman, so long as he can use thorns to stop a gap, he destroys them not, but when there is no further use for them, he brings them to the fire: so God here, "I will cause to cease the kingdom of the house of Israel."

But how and where will God cause to cease the kingdom of Israel?

Ver. 5. And it shall come to pass at that day, that I will break the bow of Israel in the valley of Jezreel.

By "breaking the bow," is here meant the blasting and bringing to nothing all the strength of their warlike power, all their arms and ammunition; for the bow was a great warlike instrument in those days; therefore, in Psal. xli. 9, "He maketh wars to cease; he breaketh the bow, and cutteth the spear in sunder."

But here, by "breaking the bow," something more is meant. There is this particular reason why the bow is instanced here, because, whereas Jehu did many memorable things in his warlike affairs, yet none more than that he did by his bow. Mark that place, 2 Kings ix. 24, "And Jehu drew a bow with his full strength, and smote Jehoram between his arms, and the arrow went out at his heart." So that the victory that Jehu obtained over the two kings of Israel and Judah was by the bow especially. What observe we from hence?

Obs. 1. That even in those things wherein wicked men have been most prosperous and successful, God will curse them, and let out his wrath upon them.

Obs. 2. Carnal hearts trust much in their warlike weapons, but they are nothing when God breaks a people's strength. "Break the bow," blast all the power of their ammunition. God has the power of all ammunition. The Lord is called the Lord of hosts, and he delights much in this title, first, because God has not only the power over ammunition and all warlike weapons, so that they cannot be used but by him; but secondly, because when they are used, they can have no success at all but by him: and so the Lord is the Lord of hosts in a peculiar sense. He is the great General of all armies, more than all other generals, for the success of all depends upon him. My brethren, why then need the church of God fear the strength of weapons, the bow, the cannon, or all the ammunition of the enemies of the church, seeing our Lord is the Lord of hosts? No weapon can be used or have success but by this Lord of hosts: he can break the bow, though of steel, when he pleases, and can give his people strength to do so too. For this you have an admirable promise, Isa. lv. 16, 17; "Behold," (saith God,) "I have created the smith that bloweth the coals in the fire, and bringeth forth an instrument for his work; and I have created the water to destroy. No weapon that is formed against thee shall prosper." What need the church fear then? God breaks the bow when he pleases; for as God has a providence over all the things in the world, so he has a specialty of providence to order battles, to give the victory not to the strong or to the multitude, but sometimes to the weak and few, even as he pleases. And therefore he is the Lord of hosts, because though his providence is general over all creatures, yet there is a specialty of providence exercised by God in warlike affairs.

But what was this valley of Jezreel?

It is worthy our time to inquire after this valley, in which God will break the bow of Israel. There were two places called Jezreel, the one belonging to Judah, Josh. xv. 56, the other belonging to Israel, Josh. xvii. 16; xix. 18. Jezreel was a fruitful valley, ten miles long, and by it there was a famous city built, which, in Ahab's time, was the metropolis of the kingdom, in which was a glorious tower, from whence they might see over Galilee and Jordan. Now there were two great cities that belonged to the ten tribes, Samaria and Jezreel; as we in England have two principal cities, London and York. But this Jezreel was the most fortified, in which they put much confidence, yet God saith here, "He will break the bow of Israel in the valley of Jezreel;" that is, in that very city which they accounted the great strength of their kingdom, there he would break the bow of Israel.

Obs. 3. Fortified cities cannot help when God comes out against a people. If we can fortify them against an enemy. If sin once get in, the enemy will quickly follow. "All thy strong holds shall be like fig trees with the first-ripe figs; if they be shaken, they shall even fall into the mouth of the eater," Nah. iii. 12. With the least wind, like the first-ripe figs, all your strong holds shall fall; yea, "thy people in the midst of thee are women: the gates of thy land shall be set wide open unto thine enemies: the fire shall devour thy bars," ver. 13. You see what the valley of Jezreel is, and the meaning of it.

But why will God "break the bow of Israel in the valley of Jezreel?" There are these two reasons for it: 1. Because God would deal with this people of Israel as judges deal with malefactors; hang them up where their fact was committed, as we see some hanged up in chains near to the city, at or about the place where their villainy was done. So in Jezreel was shed the blood of Jezebel, and the blood of the seventy sons of Ahab, and the blood of Jehoram, and there will God break the bow. Hence guilty consciences are often afraid to go near the places where they have committed wickedness, because they fly in their faces, for fear God should come upon them where the crimes were perpetrated.

But, 2. He "will break the bow of Israel in the valley of Jezreel," that is, in that fortified place in which they so much gloried.

Obs. 4. Eueu in the place in which a kingdom most glories, and seems to trust most in, God many times comes and breaks the kingdom in that very place. "Art thou better than populous No, that was situate among the rivers, that had the waters round about it, whose rampart was the sea, and her wall was from the sea?" Nah. iii. 8. Mark, a people just like England in this case. What! we overcome by the enemy? we that have the seas for our wall, and such a multitude of people amongst us? These have been and still are the two pleas which England uses for herself, because our people are many, and we have the seas for a wall: but "art thou better than populous No? Yet was she carried away, she went into captivity;" ver. 10. Thus the prophet pleads with them.

But further; These trusted in Jezreel, they seemed to scorn the prophet. What! the kingdom of Israel cease! what think you of Jezreel, such a strong place as that? Just as we should say, What! an enemy come to us! what say you to London, a brave city, a strong city? What say you to the ammunition, to the militia, to the strength that is there? Are they not able to resist all that can come against it? Have we cause to fear danger? It is true, the kingdom has cause to bless God for London, and London has not yet been "the valley of Jezreel," but Israel, the strength of the Lord, and has prevailed with God, as an instrument: and therefore we bless God for the protection we have had. But yet let us not trust in it, for even in London, in the valley of Jezreel, the bow may be broken; and God knows how to bring things about, so as to make the ammunition of London to be broken in pieces, and turned against its people: O, therefore, do not trust here. Only let it be your care, ye people of this city of London, that you prove not the valley of Jezreel, and then we shall do well enough, our bow shall not be broken. What attempts have there been to make London by this time the valley of Jezreel, that is, a scattered valley, and to bring divisions into this city, that it might be a scattered people! And woe to the kingdom if this had been effected! better these men had never been born, than that they should have had success in that horrid enterprise. O London, now the blessing of God is over you, the means of grace abundantly among you, the eyes of the kingdom are upon you; take heed you be not the valley of Jezreel; your divisions will cause great thoughts of heart: continue you united one to another, and then you are as one Israel of God, the instrument of God for our strength.

Thus we have done with the mother and with the first son.

Ver. 6. And she conceived again, and bare a daughter. And God said unto him, Call her name Lo-ruhamah: for I will no more have mercy upon the house of Israel; but I will utterly take them away.

"She conceived again." This conception sets out also the estate of Israel in regard of her sin and misery: sin is fruitful, and what does it bring forth? Parents bring forth a likeness to themselves, and so does sin; and what is that? nothing but ruin and misery.

This second child is a daughter, denoting the weakness of the ten tribes at this time. They were grown effeminate in regard of their lust, and the baseness of their spirits; and in regard of their strength also they were weak like the female sex.

There are three estates of the people signified by the three children of Hosea; first, their scattered estate, and that was signified by Jezreel, the first son; and the story of that you have 2 Kings xv. 9—19, where you may read their woeful seditions; for Zachariah reigned but six months, and then Shallum slew him, and reigned in his stead, and he reigned but one month, for Menahem came and smote Shallum and slew him, and reigned in his stead: so here were nothing but murders and seditions amongst them. A scattered people.

The second state of the people of Israel was their weak condition, signified by this daughter; and the history of that you have from ver. 16 of that chapter onwards, where, when Pul the king of Assyria came against Israel, Menahem yielded to him his demand, gave him a thousand talents of silver to go from him, and laid a tax upon the people for it. Here they were brought into a very low and weak condition. And afterwards this king of Assyria came to them again, and carried part of them into captivity.

The third child was Lo-ammi; and the history of the state of the people signified by that you have in 2 Kings xvii. 6, where they were fully carried away, and wholly rejected for ever. And because they were a little before that time grown up to some strength more than formerly, therefore this last was a son. We are now to speak of the second.

"She conceived again, and bare a daughter."

From the interpretation I have given, this denotes the weakness and effeminacy of the people at this time, a little before their ruin.

When the manliness, and courage, and vigour of the spirits of people are taken away, they are under a fearful judgment and near to ruin. Even when their men shall be as women, as Nah. iii. 13; when there shall be such baseness of spirit in people, that for the enjoyments of their present ease and quiet they yield to any thing. So it was with these, and their effeminate was showed,

1. When the king of Assyria came to them, they yielded to any terms he would appoint; and when the taxes were laid upon the people, they inquired not whether they were just or no, but merely for their peace and safety paid them. We must take heed of bringing ourselves into trouble, we had better pay this than venture the loss of all; we must not displease those that are above us, we know not what hard things may follow; it is our wisdom, though things are hard, and we complain the taxations are heavy, to suffer something. They had rather have a little, though with baseness, than venture anything for further peace and liberty for themselves and their posterity.

2. The effeminate of their spirits was shown in this, that they were willing to submit to the government of most vile murderers, without any inquiring after them, or taking any course to find out their murders and wickedness. Zachariah was slain by Shallum; then came Menahem, and he killed Shallum; after Menahem reigned Pekahiah, and against him conspired Pekah, the son of Remaliah, and smote him in Samaria, and with him killed fifty men, and reigned in his room; then came Hoshea the son of Elah, and made a conspiracy against Pekah, and slew him, and reigned in his stead. Here were murderers upon murderers, and yet the people all this while bow down their necks, and look not after these things: They have gotten power in their hands, and we must take heed of inquiring after those things that are above us, it will displease them, we had better be quiet and hold our peace: and so they bowed their necks to the yoke. Such horrible guilt of murders must not be questioned, because the murderers had got power in their hands. Their cowardly, timorous spirits were much like the temper of Issachar: "Issachar is a strong ass couching down between two burdens: and he saw that rest was good, and the land that it was pleasant; and bowed his shoulder to bear, and became a servant unto tribute," Gen. xlix. 14, 15.

And when men's spirits are effeminate with respect to the civil state, they quickly grow so in regard of their consciences, and religion too. Purity of religion in the church cannot stand long with slavery admitted in the state. We read, Rev. iv. 7, of four ages of the church set out by four living creatures: the third living creature had the face of a man, and that was to note the state of the church in the time of reformation; they began then to be of manly spirits, and to cast off that yoke of bondage which was upon them, to inquire after what liberty God had granted to them. Not like those we read of, Isa. li. 23, that would obey such as would say to their souls, "Bow down, that we may go over."

This, my brethren, was the condition of many of us; there has been that effeminateness of spirit in us that we have bowed down our necks, yea, our souls, to those that would go over us; yea, as it is in Isa. li. 23, they made themselves the very street to them that went over them, their very consciences were trampled upon by the foot of pride, and all for the enjoyment of a little outward accommodation in their estates, in their shops, and in their trading; O, they dare not venture these, rather yield to any thing in the world. And truly we were afraid, not long since, that God was calling us by the name of this daughter Lo-ruhamah, for our effeminateness of spirit; that the Lord was departing from our nation. But blessed be God, that now there is a rising of spirit among us, especially among our worthies in parliament; and their warmth, and vigour, and life have put warmth, vigour, and spirit into the whole kingdom. Now our kingdom will never bow down and submit their consciences, nor estates, nor liberties, to the former bondage and oppression. No, they had rather die honourably than live basely. But why do I make such a disjunction? Die honourably, or live basely! Had we spirits we might free ourselves and posterity from living basely, and we need not die at all; for the malignant party has neither spirit to act nor power to prevail: if we keep up our spirits and are strong in the Lord, we are safe enough, we shall not have our name Lo-ruhamah, but Ruhamah; the Lord will have mercy upon us.

In 1 Kings xiv. 15, God threatens to smite Israel, that they shall be "as a reed shaken in the water;" and mark what follows, and then "he shall root up Israel out of this good land, which he gave to their fathers." If this judgment be upon England, that our spirits be shaken as a reed with the wind, that we bow and yield to any thing in a base way, the next may justly follow, that the Lord may root us out of this good land. As Israel grew effeminate before their destruction, so do Judah also before theirs: Isa. iii. 2, 3, when God intended judgment against them, you may observe that he took away "the mighty man, and the man of war, the judge, and the prophet, and the prudent, and the ancient, the captain of fifty, and the honourable man, and the counsellor;" men of truly noble spirits were removed, their nobles became vile and sordid, and yielded to any humours and lusts, then they were near ruin; and ver. 12 saith, "women rule over them;" for women that have manly spirits to rule is no judgment at all, but for women of revengeful spirits to rule over a nation is a most fearful judgment. But so much of the first, that it is a daughter born to Hosea.

What is this daughter's name? Call her name "Lo-ruhamah," either not beloved, or one that has not obtained mercy, for God's mercy proceeds from his love.

"I will no more have mercy," or, I will add no more mercy; noting that God had showed abundance of mercy to Israel before, but now he declares, I will not add any more, I will show no further mercy to them.

"But I will utterly take them away;" so turned by some, in taking them away I will take them away;

others, I will lift them up, that I may cast them down so much the more dreadfully. The old Latin thus reads, obliviscendo obliviscar, forgetting I will forget. And this was upon a mistake of the Hebrew word, because there is little difference in the Hebrew between נשׁוּ: signifying to forget, and נשׁוּ: which signifies to take away. The Septuagint, ἀνταρροσμενος ἀνταρροσμαι, setting myself against them I will set myself against them. Well, the name of the child must bear this upon it, that God will have no more mercy upon them. Hence,

Obs. 1. Sometimes the very children of families, and in a kingdom, bear this impression upon them, that God will have no mercy upon this family. My brethren, one may read such an impression upon the children of many great families in this kingdom, when we look upon the horrible wickedness of the young that are growing up. How different from their former religious ancestors! We may see, with trembling hearts, such an impression of wrath, as if God had said, I have done with this family, I intend no further mercy to it. As sometimes, when we see in a family gracious children, gracious young gentlemen, noblemen, we may see the impression of God's mercy to that family; Ruhamah, I intend mercy to it.

It was not long since that we might, and we thought indeed we did, see such an impression upon the young people of this kingdom, in the city, and in the chief families in the country, that we were afraid Lo-ruhamah to England was written upon them; for, oh the rudeness and wickedness of the young! But blessed be God that we see it otherwise now. Because of that graciousness and forwardness of so many young people amongst us, we think we see written upon them Ruhamah to England, mercy to England; God has taken away his Lo, and writes only Ruhamah, mercy to you. The great ground of the hope we have for mercy to England, is the impression of God upon the young: when God has tender plants growing up in his orchard, certainly he will not break down the hedge or dig it up.

Obs. 2. There is a time when God will not have mercy upon a kingdom, or upon a particular people. "Gather yourselves together, yea, gather together, O nation not desired; before the decree come forth," Zeph. ii. 1, 2. There is a time for the decree to come forth against a kingdom; a time when, though Noah, Job, and Daniel should stand before him, yet he will not be entreated; though they cry, cry early, cry aloud, cry with tears, cry with fasting, yet God will not be entreated. God's mercy is precious, and he will not let it run out to waste, he will not be prodigal of it; a time wherein God will say, Now I have done, I have done with this people, mercy has had her turn. It is true, except we had that immediate revelation which the prophets had we cannot now determine the particular time. Those who labour'd most to search God's mind in his word, were afraid that this decree had gone out upon us in England. It is true, God seems for the present to tell us that he has a prerogative, and he will have mercy upon whom he will have mercy. But they are not altogether to be blamed who, even in their own hearts, determined that mercy was gone, except they wholly limited God, and left nothing of prerogative to him. It was God's ordinary way, and except God had wrought with us in a way of sovereignty otherwise than ever he did with any nation before, they concluded that the decree was gone forth: and so it might be true; and what God may do with us yet we do not know. But this we can say, if the decree be not gone forth, if there be mercy for us, God shows his prerogative, that he will now go on in a way different from his former paths in the world; and if God will do so, who can say against it?

A time there is likewise for God to say against particular persons, he will not have mercy upon them; a time when God will say, Those men that were bidden shall not taste of my supper, Luke xiv. 24; he that will be filthy, let him be filthy still, Rev. xxii. 11; my Spirit shall no longer strive with them, Gen. vi. 3. He has no need, my brethren, that we should receive or entertain his mercy; we have need that God should grant it. God many times is quick in the offer of his mercy; "Go and preach the gospel; he that believeth shall be saved, he that believeth not shall be damned." A quick work God makes many times in the effect of mercy.

Obs. 3. "I will not have mercy;" this is pronounced as the most dreadful judgment. What! not have mercy upon them? then indeed is a state or kingdom in a dreadful condition, when God shall say of them, that he will not have mercy. "Woe to you," saith the Lord, "when I depart from you!" woe then to you, when my mercy is for ever gone! then all judgments and miseries must needs flow in upon a nation, or a particular soul. When the sea-bank is broken up, then the waves will all flow in. "All ye beasts of the field, come to devour, yea, all ye beasts in the forest." Why, what is the matter? "His watchmen are blind," Isa. lvi. 9, 10. I argue from thence, if the prudence of the watchman is taken away, which should stop misery, then all evils come flowing in upon a nation. What then, if the mercy of God, that should stop misery, be taken away? whither should the poor creature go if mercy be gone? to what creature should it look for help? if it cries to any creature, the creature saith, I can afford no comfort, because God affords no mercy. What shall uphold the heart when it has no hope at all? It must needs sink.

Obs. 4. Men best know what the worth of mercy is, when mercy is taken away from them. I will not add mercy; showing that what good they had received before, it was from his mercy, though they would take no notice of it. Well, saith God, you shall have no more; you have taken no notice that it was my mercy that helped you before, but when my mercy is gone, then you will know it; but then I will not add more.

Obs. 5. God usually takes not away his mercy fully from a people, or from a soul, until after much mercy has been received and abused. You have a parallel place to this, Judg. x. 13: "I will deliver you no more," saith God; I have delivered you many times, my mercy has been abused, I will deliver you no more. It is just with God, when mercy is abused, that we should never know further what mercy means. Mercy, as it is a precious thing, so it is a tender thing, and a dangerous thing to abuse. There is nothing that more quickly works the ruin of a people, or of a soul, than abused mercy.

Obs. 6. God's second strokes usually are more dreadful than the first. "I will utterly take them away." Before it was only that they should be scattered, the name of the first child before was but Jezreel, that they should be the scattered of the Lord; but the second is Lo-rubamah, that they shall have no more mercy from the Lord. God begins first with the house of correction before he brings to the gallows. There is branding first, before hanging; there are warning pieces before murdering pieces. God makes way for his wrath by lesser afflictions before he comes with destroying judgments.

I remember Knox, in his History of Scotland, relates that Sir James Hamilton, having been murdered by the king's means, he appeared to him in a vision with a naked sword drawn, and struck off both his arms, with these words, Take this before thou receive a final payment for all thy impieties; and within twenty-four hours two of the king's sons died. God comes to nations and particular persons with a sword, cuts off arms before he takes their lives. As when the Lord comes in a way of abundance of mercy, lesser mercies make way for greater mercies. When manna was rained down, the dew ever came before it: so, lesser judgments to the wicked are forerunners of, and make way for, greater judgments; first they are parboiled, before they come to be roasted in the fire.

Obs. 7. With God a multitude of sinners is no argument for their escape of judgment. I will not add mercy to the house of Israel. He does not say, I will not add mercy to this or that particular man of Israel, but to the house of Israel. It is a rule, indeed, with man, Multitudo peccantium tollit peccatum, Multitude of offenders take away their offences: men know not how to execute the offenders when they are in multitudes; here and there some of the ringleaders may be taken, for example's sake. But it is no rule with God; though it be the whole house of Israel, God has no mercy for the whole house of all the people of Israel. Let no man presume to sin against the Lord because there are multitudes that offend, and think that he shall escape with the multitude. No; all the nations of the world with the Lord are but as the drop of a bucket, and as the small dust of the balance; nothing, even less than nothing.

Obs. 8. The nearness of any to God exempts them not from the wrath of God. "No more have mercy upon the house of Israel;" though it be the house of Israel, yet no mercy upon her. If it were the house of Pharaoh it were not so much; but what! no mercy upon the house of Israel! God hates sin, and hates sin most in those nearest to him: "You only have I known of all the families of the earth; therefore I will punish you for all your iniquities," saith the Lord, Amos iii. 2. As we hate a toad in our bosoms more than when it is at a farther distance, so God hates sin in those that are nearest to him more than in those that are farther off; for "God will be sanctified in all those that draw nigh unto him."

But why will God have no more mercy upon the house of Israel? What hath the house of Israel done that God should be so angry with it? It is worth our searching and inquiring after, it concerns ourselves nearly.

1. The first and a main reason is, because of their continuance in their false worship, notwithstanding all the means that God had used to bring them off; not only by his prophets, sending them again and again to show them its evil in those two calves that were set up in Dan and Bethel, but by most remarkable works of his providence against them. As for example; the work of God against Jeroboam, when he was stretching out his hand against the prophet that came to denounce judgment against the altar upon which he was offering sacrifice; his hand dried up, so that he could not pull it in again to him, and upon the prayer of the prophet it was restored, and became as it was before, 1 Kings xiii. 4, 6. Again, the remarkable work of God in anointing Jehu to destroy the house of Ahab and his seed for their idolatry. Yet, notwithstanding these prophets, and these works of God, with many others, they still persisted in their way of idolatry; and this caused the Lord now not to have mercy upon the house of Israel.

Let us take heed of this: God has used and still uses means to bring us off fully from all ways of false worship; not only by sending his ministers from time to time to declaim against such things, but by wonderful and remarkable works of his providence towards England, especially at this day. Never had any nation, never had England heretofore, more remarkable works of God to draw them off from all ways of false worship, to bring them to worship God in the right way according to his will. Now let us tremble at this sentence; I will not add mercy, I will have no more mercy. God has added mercy to us again and again, from time to time. And now, methinks, in this work of God's mercy, that he is about concerning us, he speaks to us as he did to the people, "Come and put off thy ornaments from thee, that I may know what to do unto thee," Exod. xxxiii. 5; come now and humble yourselves that I may know what to do; as if God should say, Come and give in your last answer. Now I am showing mercy once more, take heed of rejecting it, lest you have a Lo-ruhamah upon you, I will add no more mercy. Consider not only what we have done, but what we do; how we have abused mercy, and how we now abuse present mercy; how opposed the spirits of most are to the work of reformation now commencing, who even say to the Lord Christ, Depart from us, we desire not the knowledge of thy ways. When the people of Israel were offered Canaan, and God bade them go in and possess it, they were then near unto it; but as they then refused Canaan, God swore in his wrath that they should not enter into his rest. If ever a people were offered Canaan, were offered the ordinances of God in his own way, certainly we are at this time. Let us tremble lest God, if we reject this mercy, should swear in his wrath, I will have no more mercy upon you, and so we prove to be a Lo-ruhamah indeed.

2. But a second reason why this people could have no mercy, might be because of their forsaking God even in the civil state: for the people of Israel had not only left God in their church state, and defiled themselves with false worship, but they had in their civil government wickedly departed from those whom God had appointed over them; they had departed from the house of David, and rent themselves from it. It is true, this was of God's permission, but yet it was the wickedness of their hearts, and no excuse at all for them. Hence, Hos. viii. 4, God charges them that they had set up kings, but not by him. From whence we observe,

Obs. 9. It is a most dangerous thing for a people to forsake, or to rebel against, the civil government which God sets over them. When the people, in 1 Sam. viii. 7, required a king, and would not be ruled by judges any more, the Lord saith to Samuel, "They have not rejected thee, but they have rejected me, that I should not reign over them." A most fearful declaration: and I confess freely to you, this one text of Scripture was the first that made impression upon my thoughts and heart, about fearing to adopt a way of church government that God had not appointed. For thus I reasoned: What! is God so provoked against a people that will reject but a civil government that he has appointed, which concerns but the outward man? Then if God has appointed any government in a church, which is a Divine institution, which concerns the good of the soul, and is immediately to work upon that, surely God will be much more provoked for rejecting it. And though we have not a civil government appointed by God, as the Jews had, yet for the church state we have one appointed even by God himself. And reason there must be for it; for whatever has a spiritual efficacy upon the heart, must have a spiritual rule for its warrant and direction. Indeed prudence and reason are enough for ordering things that concern the outward man, except God will come in with his own institution: but when it comes to the ordering of the heart, and there is a spiritual efficacy expected, as in all church ordinances there must be, and that authority by which they are executed gives a great influence into them, nothing can go beyond its principle, therefore it must have a Divine institution to give it its efficacy.

It may here be demanded, whether God has not appointed over us a particular civil government, as he did over the Jews? That our government, and all lawful government of other nations, is appointed by God, we must conclude is a certain truth. But not so appointed by God as the government of the Jews was. And the reason is this, because the church and commonwealth of the Jews were involved in one, and therefore the apostle, speaking of the Gentiles, saith they were "aliens from the commonwealth of Israel;" it was meant of the church state. There was such a kind of pedagogy under the law, that the church and state were involved in one, for Christ would be the Head of the church and commonwealth too, and appoint them laws; and so their government was immediately from heaven. Now for us: that we should have a government according to the rules of wisdom and justice, that indeed is appointed by God. God would have us have a just and wise government; but he leaves the ordering of that government to general rules of prudence and justice. So that now it is lawful for any kingdom or country to agree together, and, according to the rules of wisdom and justice, to appoint what kind of government they will, as whether it shall be a monarchy, or an aristocracy, or a democracy; and to limit it according to covenants of agreement, as whether the fundamental power shall be wholly put out, or any part reserved, how far this or that man or society of men shall have the managing of it, and the like; then so far as it is agreed upon, we are bound in conscience to obey either actively or passively, but no further are we bound to obey any man; conscience is not tied. Though such men be in authority, yet not to do what they would have, is no resisting of authority. Yea, though the thing be lawful which they command, if it be not according to the law of the kingdom, to the first agreement, I may be bound by the rules of prudence to save myself; but it is not authority that binds me to obey out of conscience: for we must of necessity distinguish between men in authority, and the authority of those men. Wherefore so long as we seek to keep authority in the right channel, that it flows not over the banks, we cannot be charged with resisting the government God hath set over us, though we do not obey the will of those who are set over us; and therefore there is no cause that we should fear, that God should say to England, upon this ground, Lo-ruhamah, he will have no mercy.

Ver. 7. But I will have mercy upon the house of Judah, and will save them by the Lord their God, and will not save them by bow, nor by sword, nor by battle, by horses, nor by horsemen.

The people of Israel might say, Hosea, thou art a severe preacher; what! preach nothing but judgment, nothing but wrath, to be utterly taken away? Is there no mercy at all? Is not God a merciful God? Yes, saith the prophet, though you be taken away, God knows how to glorify his mercy; he has others that he can make objects of his mercy, though you be destroyed.

Obs. 1. Though God utterly reject some, yet in the mean time he has others to whom he can show mercy. Therefore it is no plea for any sinner to say, Well, I have sinned indeed, but God is merciful. What if God be merciful? so he may be, though thou perish everlastingly. Yea, whole kingdoms and nations may perish, yet God may be merciful, God has still infinite ways to glorify his mercy. Many people, in desperate moods, lay violent hands upon themselves, and certainly there is a kind of spirit of revenge in it, as if they thought there would be some trouble about it, and so God should lose some honour. But if you will have your will in this, or in any thing else, though you be dead, and your souls perhaps in chains of darkness, God will have ways to be glorious in his mercy, whatever become of you.

Obs. 2. God will always have a church. He will never destroy his church at once. The Lord loves public worship in the world. Though he will utterly take away the house of Israel, yet he "will have mercy upon the house of Judah." Israel might say to the prophet, What! will not God be merciful to us? What does Judah get by worshipping God in that which you say is the only right way? Judah indeed keeps herself to Jerusalem, and to worship in the temple, but what does she gain by it? for aught we see, Judah is in as hard an estate, and as low a condition, as we? Well, saith God, let Judah be what she will, I will have mercy upon her.

Obs. 3. Though carnal hearts, when they look upon the low condition of the true worshippers of God, think that there is no difference between those who are in a good way, and themselves who walk in the ways of sin, yet God will make a difference; I will have mercy upon Judah, but not upon Israel. Many carnal men please themselves with arguing thus: I see others who are strict, who pray in their families, who run to sermons, and will not act as others, yet they are as poor, in as mean a condition, as others; what do they get by their forwardness in religion? Are not we in as good a condition as they? Well, friend, though thy carnal heart think there is no difference "between him that serveth God and him that serveth him not," God has a time to manifest a difference: "Then shall ye return, and discern between the righteous and the wicked, between him that serveth God and him that serveth him not," Mal. iii. 18. I will not have mercy upon Israel, "but I will have mercy upon Judah."

Obs. 4. If a people keep the worship of God pure, God will favour them, though there be many weaknesses, yea, many wickednesses, amongst them. Judah indulged at this time in many gross and fearful evils. It would require much time to show you the horrible wickedness of Judah; yet God saith, "I will have mercy upon the house of Judah." What is the reason of this? Because though Judah had many gross evils, yet Judah kept to the right way of worshipping God, kept to Jerusalem and to the temple; and so far kept the worship of God pure. It is true, many spirits are most bitter against those who seek to worship God in the right way; if they observe them tripping in any small thing, they charge it against them with all bitterness. This is not like God, who favours those that worship him in a right way, though in other respects he may have many charges against them.

But, you will say, this seems to contradict what you said before, that the nearer any are to God, the more he hates their sins; and the sins of those that make a show of worshipping God in a pure manner are worse than the sins of others. It is true, but as their relation to God in the nearness of his worship is an aggravation of their sins, so their relation to God is a foundation of their hope of mercy from God. How is this? It makes their sin indeed worse, so as to provoke God to punish them sooner, and perhaps more bitterly; yet their relation to God keeps this ground of faith, that God is their God still, and will have mercy upon them at last. But the wicked, though God spare them longer than his own people, yet when he comes against them he rejects them utterly; so he did Israel. Judah indeed was punished, but yet Judah had mercy at last; but, saith God, "I will have no more mercy upon the house of Israel; but I will utterly take them away."

Obs. 5. God sometimes shows mercy to poor afflicted ones, and yet rejects those who are greater and enjoy more prosperity in the world. Israel had prevailed a little before against Judah, for in 2 Kings xiv. 12—14, you find that "Judah was put to the worse before Israel; and they fled every man to their tents. And Jehoash king of Israel took Amaziah king of Judah, the son of Jehoash, the son of Amaziah, at Beth-shemes, and came to Jerusalem, and brake down the wall of Jerusalem from the gate of Ephraim unto the corner gate, four hundred cubits; and he took all the gold and silver, and all the vessels that were found in the house of the Lord, and in the treasures of the king's house, and hostages, and returned to Samaria." And this was but a little before this time, Israel had thus prevailed against Judah, and brought Judah under; yet now, saith God, I will have mercy upon Judah, but not upon Israel. Many who are in a low, afflicted condition, God looks upon and shows mercy unto them, when brave ones that carry it out, and thrive and live gallantly in the world, are often rejected of God. Mark what God saith, Zeph. iii. 12, "I will also leave in the midst of thee an afflicted and poor people, and they shall trust in the name of the Lord." God looks not at the brave and gallant ones of the world, but at the poor and afflicted ones, and they shall trust in the name of the Lord. We must not then judge of the happiness of men from their success in the world; for you may now be delivered, and others kept under affliction, yet afterwards you may be rejected, and they received to mercy.

Obs. 6. How impartial the ministers of God ought to be in their work. Hosea was the prophet of Israel, he was sent to the ten tribes, yet Hosea tells them, whose prophet especially he was, that God would have no more mercy upon them. And he speaks to Judah, (to whom he was not sent,) and tells them that God would have mercy upon them. Ministers must not go according to their private engagements with any people, though bound to them in many respects; if they be wicked, they must deal faithfully and plainly, and denounce the judgments of God. And if others, though strangers to them, be godly, they are to give them that comfort which belongs unto them. My brethren, partiality in those in public places, especially of the ministry, is a great evil: it was for this that God said he had made the priest and the Levite "contemptible and base before all the people;" why? because they were "partial in the law," Mal. ii. 9.

Obs. 7. It is a great aggravation of the misery of some, that God shows mercy to others. For it is here set down as a part of the threatening against Israel, "I will have no more mercy upon the house of Israel, but I will show mercy to Judah." To aggravate the misery of Israel, God manifests his mercy to Judah. Mark how God, in Isa. lxv. 13, makes it a part of his threatening against the wicked, that he will show mercy to his servants: "Behold, my servants shall eat, but ye shall be hungry; behold, my servants shall drink, but ye shall be thirsty; behold, my servants shall rejoice, but ye shall be ashamed; behold, my servants shall sing for joy of heart, but ye shall cry for sorrow of heart, and shall howl for vexation of spirit." These "buts" are cutting ones to the heart of the wicked. And observe, the word "behold" is four times used in setting out the difference that God will make between his servants and the wicked; and how God will aggravate the misery of the wicked by showing mercy to his people, because it is a thing much to be considered. A singular passage you have in Matt. viii. 11, "Many shall come from the east and west, and shall sit down with Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob, in the kingdom of heaven; but the children of the kingdom shall be cast out into outer darkness: there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth." Mark, they shall gnash their teeth when they shall see how they are rejected and others received, gnash their teeth for envy and vexation of spirit, for it is a great aggravation of men's misery. And is it not fulfilled this day? How do many gnash their very teeth to see the mercy that God shows to his people in these days; giving them liberty to meet together, and encouragement in his service, while he casts shame and contempt upon their faces, and brings them forth to answer for their wickedness, and to suffer condign punishment!

It is observable, that, in Acts xxii. 21, 22, Paul was speaking a great while to the Jews, and they heard him quietly till he came to that sentence, "Depart: for I will send thee far hence unto the Gentiles. They gave him audience unto this word, and then lifted up their voices, and said, Away with such a fellow from the earth! for it is not fit that he should live." What! to disgrace us thus, and to think that the Gentiles should come to have more mercy than we! Away with such a fellow from the earth! We have such an expression likewise in Luke iv. 25—29; our Saviour, Christ, told the Jews of the widow of Sarepta, that Elias the prophet was sent only to her, and that Naaman the Syrian, of all the lepers in Israel, was cleansed. They of the synagogue, when they heard these things, "were filled with wrath, and rose up and thrust him out of the city, and led him unto the brow of the hill whereon their city was built, that they might cast him down headlong." They were so vexed at Christ's sermon that they would have broke his neck as soon as he had done preaching. It was at this statement, "many widows were in Israel in the days of Elias, but unto none of them was Elias sent, save unto Sarepta, a city of Sidon, unto a woman that was a widow. And many lepers were in Israel in the time of Eliseus the prophet; and none of them was cleansed, saving Naaman the Syrian." Christ intimated, that though there were many of the people of Israel, yet the Lord would have mercy but upon a few of them; yea, that God would choose to show mercy to other people rather than to them: at this they were enraged. And certainly this will be the aggravation of the misery of the lost, to know the mercy of God to others. It may be wicked parents shall see their

*Dives maus turritus
groma Lazari, quam suo incendio.
Chrysologus.*

children at the right hand of Jesus Christ in glory, and themselves cast down into eternal torment; this will be a stinging aggravation of misery, no mercy unto thee, but mercy unto thy gracious child; the child that thou rebukedst for being forward is now at the right hand of Christ, and thou east into everlasting misery. So a poor servant, or a poor boy in a family, may stand at the right hand of Jesus Christ hereafter, and ascend with him in glory; while his rich master, that murmured at him, and would not suffer him to have the least time for God's service, but checked and mocked him in every thing with O, this is your preciseness, finds himself east down into eternal misery.

But yet further; God declares, "I will have mercy upon the house of Judah." Here is another remark very observable, and which much concerns our present condition. God promises to Judah mercy, after Israel's rejection; yet if we search the Scriptures we shall find that both before and after the rejection of Israel was executed, Judah was under very sore afflictions. In 2 Chron. xxviii. 6, you find that "Pekah the son of Remaliah slew in Judah an hundred and twenty thousand in one day." We never heard of such a slaughter; we wonder when we hear of five or ten thousand slain in the field; here we have one hundred and twenty thousand slain, and this slaughter was made after this promise: yea, further, ver. 8, there were besides "carried away captive two hundred thousand, women, sons, and daughters;" yea, further, ver. 17, "again the Edomites had come and smitten Judah, and carried away captives." And, ver. 18, "The Philistines also had invaded the cities of the low country, and of the south of Judah; and they dwelt there:" and, ver. 19, it is said, "the Lord brought Judah low:" and, ver. 20, it is said, "Tilgath-pilneser, king of Assyria;" (whom Ahaz had sent to help him,) "came unto him and distressed him, but strengthened him not." Pekah, the son of Remaliah, slays one hundred and twenty thousand, and carries away captive two hundred thousand: then come the Philistines and invade the country; and then the Edomites carry away captives, and God brings them low; and then comes Tilgath-pilneser, and he, instead of helping, distresses them. What a case were they in now! Yet this was after the promise, for this promise was made to Judah in the beginning of Hosea's prophecy; so it is, ver. 2, "The beginning of the word of the Lord by Hosea," which was before the rejection of Israel. It was in the reign of Ahaz that Judah was brought into this low condition, about twenty-two years before the execution of the sentence against Israel, for that was fulfilled in the sixth year of the reign of Hezekiah, which, if you take it from the beginning of the reign of Ahaz, who reigned sixteen years, makes twenty-two years. Now this promise to Judah was made in the days of Uzziah, king of Judah, and of Jeroboam, king of Israel, which was at least seventy-six years before the rejection of Israel; and yet, after the making of this promise, Judah is reduced to this sad condition.

Yea, and we shall find, besides, that though God had said he would reject Israel, and be merciful to Judah; so that when Israel was rejected a man would think that Judah should come into a better condition than ever; yet see how Judah was dealt with. 2 Kings xviii. 13 saith, that "in the fourteenth year of Hezekiah, Sennacherib king of Assyria came up against Judah;" and this was after the casting off of the ten tribes, for that was in the sixth year of Hezekiah, as ver. 10; and seven years after came Sennacherib against Judah, thinking to prevail against them as they had done before against Israel; and then Hezekiah was disposed to give him all the silver that was found in the house of the Lord, and in the treasures of the king's house; yea, ver. 16 saith, that "Hezekiah cut off the gold from the doors of the temple of the Lord, and from the pillars, and gave it to the king of Assyria." Now the Lord keep our kingdom and our parliament from giving the gold of the temple doors in any way of compliance with any malignant party, who regard with an evil eye the beauty of our Zion.

Yea, and after Sennacherib had gotten this, not content with it, he sends Rabshakeh from Lachish, with a great host against Jerusalem. The adversaries of the church are never satisfied, yield to them, gratify them in what you will: this is the first temptation. What! will you be so strict and rugged, and yield to them in nothing? say some: but if they prevail with you to begin to yield, they will encroach upon you. Hezekiah yielded to Sennacherib, even to take away the gold of the temple doors, yet a little while after he comes again with a great host, so that Hezekiah said, it was "a day of trouble and rebuke," chap. xix. 3. Nothing will quiet them but the ruin of the church, they must needs have that; "Down with it, down with it, even to the ground!" nothing else will satisfy them.

To this low estate and sad condition was Judah brought, though God promises mercy to them.

Obs. 8. God may intend much mercy, yea, God may be in a way of mercy to a people, yet may bring that people into very great straits and difficulties. The promises of God's mercies are always to be understood with the condition of the cross. If we think that upon the promise of mercy we shall be delivered from all trouble and affliction, we lay more upon the promise than the promise will or can bear. It is a great evil, which proceeds from much weakness of spirit and distemper of heart, in people for whom God has done great things, if there come any difficulty or trouble, to say, Now we are all lost, now God has left us; we hoped that there would have come mercy, we looked for light, and behold darkness; now the heart sinks, and all hope is abandoned. Know, my brethren, this is an evil, unthankful, and unbelieving heart. God has indeed done great things for us; yet how ready are we, though God be in such a glorious way of mercy, if we hear of any difficulty, any combining of the adversaries together, to expect nothing but blood, and to bid adieu to all our peace: we thought to have had happy days, but now the Lord is coming out against us, and all that is done must be undone again. Why are you so full of unbelief? Surely this is unworthy of Christians that profess an interest in God, and unworthy of all the good that God has done for us. Though Peter had walked upon the sea through the power of Christ, when the waves came, he cried, "Master, save, or else I perish." Has not God made us walk upon the waves of the sea all this while? wrought as great a miracle for us in England as he did for Peter? Yet when a wave does but rise a little higher than before, we are so distressed in our spirits that we can scarcely cry, O Master, save us; but we look one upon another, and instead of crying unto God, we cry out one to another in a discouraging way, and so pine away in our iniquities. Certainly God is exceedingly angry at such a demeanour as this, and yet this is common, both with nations and particular persons.

With nations: it was so with Judah. Though God had made this promise to Judah, yet if we look into Isa. vii. 2, (Isaiah was contemporary with Hosea, and it was not much after the making of this promise,) we shall see how they were troubled with fear: "It was told the house of David, saying, Syria is confederate with Ephraim. And the heart of the king of Judah was moved, and the heart of his people, as the trees of the wood are moved with the wind; they were afraid, and shook as the very leaves of the trees shake. Well, but God speaks to the prophet, in chap. viii. 11—13, "with a strong hand, and instructed him that he should not walk in the way of this people, saying, Say ye not, A confederacy."—Oh, the king of Israel and the king of Syria are confederate together; what shall we do? we are undone, we are lost for ever! "Say ye not, A confederacy, to all to whom this people shall say, A confederacy; neither fear ye their fear, nor be afraid. Sanctify the Lord of hosts himself; let him be your fear, and let him be your dread." Thus God would have his saints act now. When you hear of confederate enemies, or any ill tidings abroad, exclaim not, Oh, the papists are linked together, a confederacy, a confederacy! Do not say, A confederacy, fear not their fear, but "sanctify the Lord of hosts himself, and let him be your fear, and let him be your dread; and he shall be for a sanctuary" to you. And mark the resolution of the prophet afterward, ver. 17, "I will wait upon the Lord, that hideth his face from the house of Jacob, and I will look for him." Oh that this were the disposition of our hearts! Take that note away with you, amongst many, though you cannot remember all: when you hear so many rumours of fears and troubles, as if all were gone, and there were now no more hope, let this be your answer, "I will wait upon the Lord, that hideth his face from the house of Jacob;" for God is in a way of mercy, and mercy certainly we shall have, let us look for it then.

With particular persons: though God be in a wonderful way of mercy towards them, yet if they do but feel their corruptions stirring never so little, how common is it for them to say, All is lost! I was indeed in a good way, but God is gone, Christ is gone, mercy is gone, and all is gone, surely God intends no thoughts of good to me. O, be not faithless, but believing: for this is the way of God, though he promises great mercy, yet in the mean time he may bring into great afflictions.

"I will no more have mercy upon the house of Israel, but I will utterly take them away; but I will have mercy upon the house of Judah, and will save them."

For a people to be saved when others near them are destroyed, is a great display of God's goodness to them: as to stand upon the shore safely, and see others suffer shipwreck before us, is a great augmentation of God's mercy towards us. When the people of Israel stood upon the banks, and saw the Egyptians tumbling in the Red Sea, and their dead bodies cast upon the shore, then "sang Moses and the children of Israel unto the Lord," Exod. xv. 1. And this kind of mercy the Lord has granted to us in England, for while neighbouring nations have been in a combustion, and many of them spoiled, we have sat under our own vines and fig trees, and our greatest afflictions have been only the hearing of what our brethren have suffered, and yet do suffer. All about us is as the fiery furnace, and we walk in the midst of it like the three children, and our garments are not touched, nor the smell of the fire passed on them. We see all countries as Gideon's fleece, wetted with the tempest of God's wrath, yea, with their own blood; but, behold, we are dry, and the sunshine of God's mercy is upon us; the blackness of the misery of our brethren is the brightness of our mercy.

"I will save them." It is the Lord that will save them. This is an upbraiding of Israel. O Israel, you think to be saved by your own policy, you have gone beyond God; you are afraid that the people should go up to Jerusalem to worship, therefore you have set up the two calves to save yourselves. But Judah shall be saved, and saved after another way: Judah need not go to such carnal policies to save themselves, for the Lord shall save them. Though carnal hearts think and endeavour to save themselves only by their own policy and carnal ways, yet let God's people know that they have a stronger means to save them than all the policy in the world. So long as the wisdom, the power, the mercy, the faithfulness of God is for them, they need no other string to their bow.

"I will save them by the Lord." This, by interpreters, is expounded concerning Christ: that God the Father promises to save by Christ. In Dan. ix. 17, we have such an expression in prayer, "Now therefore, O our God, hear the prayer of thy servant—for the Lord's sake;" that is, for Christ's sake: so here, God will save by the Lord; that is, by Christ.

Obs. 9. The administration of God's grace to his people is given into the hands of Jesus Christ. It is Christ that saves the people of God, and has saved them in all former times: "As for thee also, by the blood of thy covenant I have sent forth thy prisoners out of the pit wherein is no water," Zech. ix. 11. All the prisoners of God's people, ever since the world began, have been sent out of the pit by the blood of the covenant, by the merits of Christ: and not only so, but Christ, in the administration of God's grace, has been the chief; he has been the Angel of God's presence, who has stood up for his people in all their necessities; he has been the great Captain and Deliverer, the Saviour of them all. Let Christ then have the honour of a sovereign to us with respect to our salvation in outward deliverances. Let us look up to him for salvation in all our straits. And if Christ was the Saviour of his people in all ages, and still will be, then surely those ages and places where Christ is most known and honoured may expect the greatest salvation. And this is our comfort, for above all the ages since the world began, Christ is most known and honoured in this age; and of all places in the world, here in England, and amongst our countrymen; and if Christ will be a Saviour of those places where he is known and honoured, surely England may expect a salvation. England has had it; and as England is peculiar in the knowledge of Christ, so England shall be peculiar in God's grace to her.

Obs. 10. It is a great upbraiding of a people when it can be said of them, that they have forsaken the Lord. "I will save them by the Lord their God." Not your God, O Israel, but their God. Thus he upbraids the people of Israel that they had forsaken their God; that Judah had kept their God, but Israel had not. It is a woeful thing not to have God to be our God at all; when conscience can charge upon a man what Daniel did upon Belshazzar, "That God in whose hand thy breath is, and whose are all thy ways, hast thou not glorified," Dan. v. 23: but it is dreadful when conscience can charge this, That God, whom thou hast chosen, and with whom thou hast entered into covenant, O thou apostatized soul, thou apostatized nation, thou hast forsaken, he is not now thy God. This is a sore and heavy charge indeed.

Obs. 3. Those, then, who do not worship God in a right way, God will not acknowledge himself to be worshipped by them at all. It seems he is the God of Judah, though Judah had many evils, but not the God of Israel. The people in the wilderness proclaimed a fast to Jehovah, and yet the apostle, 1 Cor. x. 7, calls them idolaters; and it is said they sacrificed to idols, because they worshipped God by a calf, and not in God's way. Though we may think we worship God, yet if we do not worship him in his own way, he does not own himself worshipped by us at all.

Obs. 4. Carnal hearts cannot endure that any one should think they have more interest in God than themselves. This could not but sting Israel, that Judah should be thought to have more interest in God than Israel had. Thus they scorned at Christ: O, he trusted in God, he thinks he has more interest in God than others, now let his God come and save him. We read in the Book of Martyrs, that the papists were much vexed with the protestants, because they used to say, our God, and our Lord, by which they seemed to claim more interest in God than others. And, indeed, what is the cause of the quarrel against God's people, but because the world think they claim more peculiarity and interest in God than others? And this is the reason that soul-searching preaching cannot be endured, because it makes a difference between the one and the other, and shows that some have an interest in God more than others. Hence it is that in no places in the world men's spirits so fret against preaching as in England. Why? Because there is not such soul-examining, such soul-distinguishing preaching in the world as in England. Yea, that is the reason of the bitterness of one professor against another, because one is a protestant at large, and the other manifests more power of godliness, is more strict in his course, and seems to claim a greater share in God than the former. Profession in England is a more distinguishing profession than in other places.

Obs. 5. So long as God is our God we need not fear our adversaries. God is the God of Judah still, therefore God will save them. You have heard of the Palladium of the heathens in Troy. They imagined that so long as that idol was kept safe, they were unconquerable, all the strength in Greece was not able to prevail against it. Wherefore the Grecians sought by all the means they could to get it from them. I have read that the men of Tyrrus were afraid their god Apollo should forsake them: they therefore chained and nailed that idol to a post, that they might be sure of it, because they thought their safety was in it. Let us fasten ourselves to God in an everlasting covenant, and certainly God will be fast to us, and then we are safe enough.

"I will save them:" but how? What shall Judah be saved by, and not Israel? Judah, a poor, contemptible people! How saved?

"And will not save them by bow, nor by sword, nor by battle, by horses, nor by horsemen." It shall not be by any outward means, but by the immediate hand of God. This promise, that God would save them not "by bow nor by sword," was performed two several times, and there is a third time for the fulfilling of it, which is yet to come. It was done first when "the angel of the Lord went out, and smote in the camp of the Assyrians an hundred fourscore and five thousand," 2 Kings xix. 35: and God tells them that the king of Assyria should "not shoot an arrow there, nor come before the city with a shield:" so God saved them without bow, for they had no need to use the bow then, because the angel of the Lord destroyed them. The second time was when he saved Judah in their return from captivity, then, as it is Zech. iv. 6, he saved them "not by might, nor by power, but by my Spirit, saith the Lord of hosts." Mark the phrase; as if God should say, I have strength, for I am the Lord of hosts; I can command armies, if I would, to save you; no, though I be the Lord of hosts, yet I will not save you "by might, nor by power, but by my Spirit." Therefore, Isa. xxx. 7, "their strength" is said to be "to sit still;" and ver. 15, "in quietness, and in confidence, shall be your strength." Thus they were saved, "not by bow, nor by sword." Then the third time, which is yet to come; that is, in the wonderful work of God in calling the Jews, when God shall raise up out of them a glorious people to himself, and save Judah once again, and it shall not be by sword, nor by bow, but by the Lord their God; for, as it is said, Dan. ii. 34, the stone that smote the image "was cut out without hands," so there shall be a power not visible from whence it comes, but Jesus Christ shall come from heaven to do his great works. "As the lightning cometh out of the east, and shineth even unto the west; so shall also the coming of the Son of man be."

Obs. 1. God ties not himself to the use of outward means in procuring good to his people. Though all outward means fail, yet there may be ways of salvation for the saints. Wicked men's hearts presently sink, if outward means fail. And if our hearts faint when outward means fail, it is a sign that we before rested upon the means, and if we had had the means we should have robbed God of his honour. We must use means, but not rely upon the means. I might show you excellent texts of Scripture for this, as Psal. xxxiii. 16, "There is no king saved by the multitude of an host: a mighty man is not delivered by much strength." And Psal. xlv. 5, 6, "Through thee will we push down our enemies: through thy name will we tread them under that rise up against us. For I will not trust in my bow, neither shall my sword save me."

Obs. 2. Deliverance of a people without bow and without sword is a great mercy. For such are the woeful miseries that a people suffer when war comes, that usually the victory will scarce pay the charges of the battle. Though we are sure to be saved at last, yet if we must be saved by bow and by sword, the misery that we may suffer in our salvation may be more than the salvation. It was the height of that mercy promised, Isa. ix. 5, that it should be without "confused noise, and garments rolled in blood." Such a mercy we have had; and had Christ come to have reigned amongst us, though he had come riding upon his "red horse," with his garments rolled in blood, we should willingly have entertained him; but behold, he comes riding upon his "white horse," in peace and mercy. The mercies we have had have been very cheap, they have not been by bow, nor by sword. And if God should come at length by the sword, and bring perfect salvation to us by blood, which God forbid, we have had already more mercy without blood than our blood is worth. Should we now have our blood shed, God has paid us beforehand. Who almost in this congregation, but two or three years ago would have lost

*Ejus simulacrum
animulae conatibus
erant obsequio
tuo afferebant.*

his blood to procure so much mercy to England, as England has had already?

Obs. 3. Such is the love of God to his people, that he is pleased to work for them beyond means. The other point was, that he can save his people without means; this, that he will do it beyond means: for the grace and love of God to his people is so high and glorious, that it is beyond that which can be conveyed by means, therefore it must be done more immediately. "Thy right hand, O Lord, is become glorious in power; in the greatness of thine excellency thou hast overthrown them that rose up against thee," Exod. xv. 6, 7. First, it is the "hand of God." Secondly, it is "the right hand of God." Thirdly, it is "the right hand of God in power." Fourthly, this is "glorious in power." Fifthly, there is "excellency." And sixthly, there is "the greatness of excellency." It is a high expression, כָּרִב in the greatness of thy lifting up; for the same word signifies pride, which is here translated excellency; and if God be lifted up in any thing it is when he shows himself for his people. Now take all these six expressions, God's hand, God's right hand, his right hand in power, a right hand that is become glorious in power, his excellency, the greatness of his excellency, and all this for his saints; surely this is more than can be conveyed by means; God must come immediately and save them by himself.

Obs. 4. The more immediate hand of God appears in his mercy to his people, the more sweet and precious ought that mercy then to be. "Be thou exalted, O Lord, in thine own strength: so will we sing and praise thy power," Psal. xxi. 13. When God comes in his own strength, and not in the strength of the creature, then the saints sing and praise the power of God. We are accustomed to say, Dulcius ex ipso fonte, that which comes immediately comes exceeding sweetly. Then the saints may boast in God, when he comes immediately with his salvation: "Thou hast saved us from our enemies, and hast put them to shame that hated us." What follows? "In God we boast all the day long, and praise thy name for ever," Psal. xlv. 7, 8. So that the saints of God then praise God; nay, they may lawfully give up themselves to boast, when God works immediately. When God works by means, then they must take heed of ascribing to the means; but when God comes immediately, then they see his hand, and may well boast.

It is the blessedness of heaven, that God's mercy comes immediately. Created mercies are the most perfect mercies. Suppose God had been with them by bow and by sword when Sennacherib came against them, could the salvation have been so precious? God's hook that he put in his nose, and the bridle that he put in his lips, (for so God said he would do with him, that is, use him as a beast,) were better than their sword or bow. Surely, if ever any nation knew what it was to have immediate mercies come down from heaven, England does; if ever nation saw God exalting himself in his own power, England has; we have lived, blessed be God, to see the Lord exalting himself in his own power. O, let us cry out with the psalmist, "Be thou exalted, O Lord, in thine own strength," amongst us; "so will we," still, and still, and still, "sing and praise thy power."

Ver. 8. Now when she had weaned Lo-ruhamah, she conceived, and bare a son.

We finished the signification of the name of the second child of Hosea, Lo-ruhamah. We now come to its weaning, and the begetting of the third child, Lo-ammi.

"When she had weaned Lo-ruhamah." We do not read that the first child, Jezreel, was weaned; but that the second child, Lo-ruhamah, was weaned, before the third child, Lo-ammi, was conceived. What is the meaning of this?

This second child, Lo-ruhamah, was to typify the people of Israel being carried out of their own country in captivity to Assyria: it was to signify to them that they should be weaned from the comforts and delights which were in their own land; that they should be taken away from their milk and honey, and be fed in Assyria with hard meat, even with the water of affliction and the bread of adversity. The first child only signified their scattering, especially in regard of their seditions amongst themselves; but the second child signified the carrying them away wholly into captivity from their own land; therefore the second child is weaned. Cibus sustentabitur immundis, so Jerome interprets it. They should be carried amongst the Gentiles, and be fed with unclean meat, they should be deprived of prophecy, of the milk of the word, and of the ordinances that they enjoyed: so Vatablus.

Vaticinantur hic dicitur, ut desistantur verbo Dei, prophetis et gratis, Vatab. in loc.

Ordinances are as the breasts of consolation, out of which the people of God suck soul-satisfying comforts. "That ye may suck, and be satisfied with the breasts of her consolations; that ye may milk out, and be delighted with the abundance of her glory," Isa. lxxvi. 11. And, "We will remember thy love more than wine," Cant. i. 4. The Vulgate reads it, We will remember thy breasts above wine; and so the words will bear. These people should be deprived of those breasts out of which they had sucked much sweetness before; even deprived of all comfort in God. God's people hang upon God, and draw comfort from him, even as the infant upon the mother's breast, which sucks sweetness, and comfort, and nourishment from thence.

Membra uberiorum tiorum super vinnum.

This expression, then, of weaning the child, implies these two things:

1. That the enjoyment of the comforts of a sweet native land, specially where Divine ordinances abound, is a very great blessing of God; and to be deprived of it is a great affliction, yea, to some it comes as a curse. The very sucking of our native air is certainly a great blessing from the Lord. Those who have been banished and deprived of it, have been more sensible of it than many of you who always have enjoyed it. Many have lain so long sucking the sweetness of our English air, and the comforts which flow from their accommodations, till they have sucked in that which, if God's mercy had not prevented, would have proved poison to their souls. But I speak not of all, I make no question but there have been many of God's dear servants that have tarried in their native soil, and kept the uprightness of their hearts and consciences as clear as others that went away. It is true, the comforts of a native soil are sweet, but except we may enjoy them with the breasts of these consolations, the ordinances of the church, they are not able to satisfy the soul; yea, except we may suck out of these breasts sincere milk, not soiled nor soured by the inventions of men, better a great deal that we were weaned from all the sweetness and accommodation we have in our native soil, by the mortifying of our affections to it, than that God should wean us from it, by sending us into captivity, or by giving the adversary power over us, or by making the land too hot for us.

2. That it is an evil thing for a child to be taken from the mother's breast too soon, and sent away to be nursed by others. The expression fully implies this, for it is to tell us the evil condition of the people, that they should be taken from their own and sent to another country. The affliction is set out by a child's being taken from its mother's breast. It could not express what it intended, except it were to intimate thus much unto us; that it is an evil thing for a child to be taken from its own mother's breast. It is unnatural then for mothers, out of daintiness and pride, to deny the fruit of their wombs the comfort of their breasts. It is true, in time of weakness and danger, when it may be dangerous to themselves and the child, God permits it. But when it is merely out of pride and affectation, certainly it is an evil against nature itself. Hannah's care of her son Samuel is recorded, and it is mentioned by the Holy Ghost in her commendation, that she gave him suck; "The woman abode, and gave her son suck until she weaned him," 1 Sam. i. 23. It is said of the ostrich, Job xxxiii. 16, "She is hardened against her young ones, as though they were not hers:" the ostrich is reckoned among the fowls that are unclean: and Lam. iv. 3, "Even the sea monsters draw out the breast, they give suck to their young ones: the daughter of my people is become cruel, like the ostriches in the wilderness;" more cruel than the very sea monsters themselves, that draw out their breasts and give suck to their young ones. The instruction of the son belongs to the father, the nursing of the son belongs to the mother. The mother's milk is the most profitable and wholesome for every one, (saith

Pliny, except it be in some extraordinary case. We read, in 2 Tim. iii. 3, that in the latter day, when evil times should come, some should be ἀστροφύς, "without natural affection:" that τροφή, which is there spoken of, is the affection of the parents to the children, as well as of the children to the parents.

But enough of this; if not too much, to such as with their pride and daintiness, the children of their own fancies, neglect nature's duty to the children of their bodies.

But further observe here, That the Lord stays for the weaning of the child; he stays till Lo-ruhamah was weaned, before Lo-ammi was conceived. And there is much to be known in this. Why does God stay? This is to show the great patience of God toward his people; for God was now about to reject them utterly from being his people; God was coming in the height of his wrath, to declare that they were no more his people; and here God makes a stop, stays till Lo-ruhamah was weaned. I have read that it was the custom of the Jews to be a long time, three years sometimes, before they weaned their children. God then it seems stayed long here, till the third child, Lo-ammi, was born, before he would come with that dreadful sentence, "Ye are not my people, and I will not be your God." First, when Jezebel was born, they are scattered up and down, but they are not all carried away captive. Then Lo-ruhamah is born, and then they are carried away captive, never to return again. But for all this, God may yet own them in their captivity. This is not so bad as for God to say, I will have no more to do with you as my people. Lord, though we be under affliction, under the power of our enemies, own us still, acknowledge us to be thine; though we be in the fiery furnace, yet let us have thee to be our God. No, (saith God,) you shall not only be scattered, but you shall be all carried away captive, and I will not own you, I will cast you off, you shall not be my people, neither will I be your God. Now before this God makes a stop. Hence,

Obs. 1. That God stops in his anger for a while, as long as he pleases. God is called, Nah. i. 2, The Lord of anger; so the words הוה בעל signify, though translated otherwise. We may apply it at least thus, God is the Lord of his own anger, he can let it out as far as he will, he can stop it when he will, he can command it to come in when he pleases. It is not so with us; our passions are lords over us; if we once let our anger arise, we cannot get it down again when we would, we cannot still our passions when we please; if we let our affections run, we cannot rein them in a moment. That is the frame of spirit which we should all labour for, to be like God, though angry, yet sin not, so that we can stop when we will, and command our anger as we please. God says to the proud waves, "Hitherto shalt thou go, and no further." Oh that we were able to say to those proud waves of our passions, Hitherto are you gone, but you shall go no further!

Obs. 2. Those who have been once the people of God must not be suddenly rejected from being God's people. Mark here, God stops in his anger for a while. When this dreadful judgment was about to be executed, God is even ready to say, as he said afterward in this prophecy, "How shall I give thee up, Ephraim? How shall I deliver thee, O Israel?" Hos. xi. 8. When we are about either to reject any particular person, who has made profession of religion, from being God's, or to reject a church from being God's, we had need pause, and examine the matter well; yea, and when we have examined it, to stop again, and bethink ourselves what we do. We must not be too sudden in rejecting those who have been once the people of God, from being the people of God now. Many men are too hasty, in rejecting both particular servants of God, and particular churches from belonging to God, as soon as they see some few things amiss in them; especially if there be any thing gross, immediately they are no churches at all, they are altogether antichristian, they belong to the beast; and so, while they strike at the beast, they wound the Lamb. Certainly there is to be acknowledged much of Christ, not only in particular saints, but with respect to the church ordinances of many particular congregations in England: we must take heed therefore of too sudden rejection of them from belonging to God, or refusing them, as his people, church fellowship.

"She conceived, and bare a son." We come now to the conception of the third child; it was a son, and his name was Lo-ammi. The second child a daughter, but the third a son; what is the meaning of this? I told you, that by the second child was noted the state of the people at that time, that it grew weaker and more effeminate; weaker in regard of their outward strength, and more effeminate in regard of their spirits: and that statement I made good to you out of the history of those times in the Book of the Kings. Well, but now it is a son; what! do they grow stronger now they are nearer to destruction than before? Yes, though nearer to ruin, and more heavy wrath, than they were before, yet they get up a little strength before that time; therefore the third child is a son. Concerning the strength this people had a little before their utter rejection, upon which their spirits were raised, you shall find the history in 2 Kings xvii. 4, where you have a declaration of the state of the ten tribes when Lo-ammi was born; for the text tells us, that they began to join in confederacy with the king of Egypt; and whereas formerly they had done homage, by presents, to the king of Assyria, now being confederate with the king of Egypt, they refused to bring any more presents to him; they begin now to be a jolly people, and hoped to cast off that Assyrian yoke of bondage under which they had groaned.

Obs. God sometimes permits men, and nations, and churches, to rise a little out of their affliction before their utter ruin; he gives them a little reviving before their death. Many men think themselves in a very good condition, if, having been in affliction, their afflictions begin to abate, and they begin to rise a little; now they think they are safe, and they are ready to say, with Agag, "Surely the bitterness of death is past," surely the worst is gone, 1 Sam. xv. 32. But you may sometimes be recovered, when God intends you should be suddenly rejected. Many may be preserved from some judgments, because they are reserved to greater judgments. The Lord has begun, indeed, to give to us in England a little reviving, a little strength to enable us to rise against the cruel oppressions of our adversaries: but let us not be secure, notwithstanding this; for though we have some little reviving, if we follow not God in the way of humiliation and reformation, this our little reviving may be but a lightning before our death.

And yet further, it is very observable what the condition of Israel was at this time, when God was about to say, "Lo-ammi, they are not my people;" what it was not only in regard of their strength, but of their very sins. For if you examine the history, you find that the people of Israel not only had gotten somewhat more strength, but they were somewhat better in regard of their sins than they had been; I mean, they had less sins than they had before: yet now God is saying to them, "Lo-ammi, ye are not my people." And if you read 2 Kings xvii. 2, you will observe that the very time of the utter rejection of Israel was in the days of Hoshea, a king who did "evil in the sight of the Lord, but not as the kings of Israel that were before him." He was not so bad as the former kings of Israel, and yet in his days there comes utter destruction upon Israel. Yea, and as the king was not so bad as others before him, so it seems the people were not so bad as in former time, for ver. 9 saith, that "the children of Israel did secretly those things that were not right against the Lord their God." They were sinful, but their sinfulness was secret, they did not sin with such an open, impudent face as heretofore. Yet in this king's time, and when these people were thus improved, comes their utter ruin.

Hence we learn, that sometimes when there are greater sins patience stays judgment; and yet afterward, when a people seem to be in a better condition, not only in regard of their outward strength, but in regard of their sins too, then God comes with his wrath upon that people. Let us not flatter ourselves, although we can say that some things amongst us are not so bad as they were heretofore. Suppose there be some partial reformation, this is not ground enough to secure us. We cannot reason thus, Why heretofore the land was more sinful than now, and the governors were more oppressing than now. This is not enough, we may be nearer the sorest misery at this time, if our reformation be not a thorough reformation, than we were before. And the reason is this, because God, when he comes against a nation, does not only come against it for the present sins of which they are actually guilty, but to reckon with them for their sins committed before, though the judgment is inflicted just at that time. A concurrence of events in God's providence might so meet as to suit with God's ends, that the destruction of this nation should be now, rather than some time ago, yet the nation not more sinful than before, but in order to fulfill other events of providence that God intends; and then he comes to reckon with them for sins that were long ago committed and for their present sins all together. As he does sometimes with particular persons: perhaps they have been drunkards, unclean, wicked, twenty years ago; God has spared them; afterward, upon some lesser sins, God may take advantage to come against them for all their other sins together. We commonly say, It is not the last blow of the axe that fells the oak; perhaps the last may be a weaker blow than any of the former, but the other blows made way for the felling of it, and at length a little blow comes and completes it. So our former sins may be the things that make way for our ruin, and then at length some lesser sins may accomplish it.

You that have been guilty of gross sins, take heed of small sins; for though God has spared you when you were guilty of great sins, do not say that he will spare you now you commit lesser sins; at this very time of committing lesser sins, you may be called to an account for grosser. Did you never know a house stand out against many strong and blustering winds, yet afterward some little puff of wind has thrown it down? So it is with nations and people that sometimes stand out through God's patience, when their sins are gross and vile, and afterwards upon some lesser sins are utterly undone.

Ver. 9. Then said God, Call his name Lo-ammi: for ye are not my people, and I will not be your God.

The name of this son is Lo-ammi, and the word signifies, as it is interpreted here by God himself, "ye are not my people, and I will not be your God." The people to whom Hosea prophesied might have objected against him thus: What! Hosea, do you say that God will not have any more mercy upon us? What! will not God have mercy upon his own people? Is not God our God? Why do you threaten such things as these? The prophet answers, It is true, God has been your God, and you have been his people, but there is an end of those days; God now degrades you from those glorious privileges that you formerly possessed, he will own you no more to be his, and you shall have no further right to own him to be yours. From whence,

Obs. 1. A people that have been once a people dear to God, may be so rejected as never to become a people of God more. For so these did not, though afterwards we shall hear of the promise for others in other ages. God has no need of men. God is able to raise up a people what ways he pleases, even from the very stones in the street "to raise up children unto Abraham." Rome may boast that she has been a glorious church. True, there has been heretofore a glorious church in Rome. What then? Those who were his people are now no more his people. We shall meet further with this in the next chapter.

Only here observe but this thing, the great difference between the estate of a Christian in communion with Christ by grace, and a church estate. Men and women may lose their church estate, and that for ever; but their estate in communion with Jesus Christ by grace they can never lose. This is a great difference, and affords abundance of comfort. True, our church state, I mean in regard of an instituted church in congregations, is a great privilege and mercy; but our communion with Jesus Christ is a higher privilege, and that privilege can never be lost: we may be cut off from the one, but never cut off from the other.

Obs. 2. It is a most heavy judgment for any to have been heretofore the people of God, now to be unpeopled, for God to be no more theirs, and for them to be no more the Lord's. A heavy judgment for the Lord to say, Well, I will be no more a God to you, whatsoever I am to others, no more yours in my goodness, in my mercy, in my power, or whatsoever I am in myself.

The being cast off from God, 1. Takes us off from that high honour that was before upon a people. "Since thou wast precious in my sight, thou hast been honourable," Isa. xliii. 4. The people of God gathered together in church communion, certainly are in an honourable condition; when they are displeased, they are cast off from this their privilege, from their honour.

2. They have not the presence of God with them, nor the care of God towards them, nor the protection of God over them, nor the delight of God in them, nor the communication of God to them as before. But, among other privileges, they want this, namely, that great privilege of pleading with God for mercy upon this relation, which was the usual way of the prophets to plead with God, because they were the people of God: so Isa. lxix. 9, "Be not wroth very sore, O

Lord, neither remember iniquity for ever." Upon what ground? "Behold, see, we beseech thee, we are all thy people." This is a good argument. Again, Jer. xiv. 9, "Why shouldest thou be as a man astonished, as a mighty man that cannot save? yet thou, O Lord, art in the midst of us, and we are called by thy name; leave us not." This text is ours this day, and well may we say, "O Lord, why shouldest thou be as a man astonished?" Yet if we can but take up the second part, and say, "We are called by thy name," we may make more comfortable use of the former, "Why shouldest thou be as a man astonished?" How doth a man astonished stand? He stands still in a place, as if he knew not which way to go; he is in a kind of distraction, first he goes one way, and by and by he returns again. The Lord knows his purpose from eternity, but the Scriptures are pleased to express God's ways towards us in this similitude. Has not God stood amongst us "as a man astonished?" God has been in a way of mercy, and then stood still, and then gone forward a little, and afterward gone back again, and yet back and back still; and we have prayed and cried, and God has again stood as a man astonished, as if he were not yet resolved which way to go. Let us pray earnestly to God that he would not stand as a man astonished, but that the way of the Lord's mercy may be made clear before him, and clear before us. But this I bring in to show that the relation which a people have to God, is the ground of their encouragement to pray to God, and when a people is rejected they lose this privilege. Our relations to God are very sweet and glorious things, though ordinarily they are exceedingly abused. As it is said of other relations, Relations are of the least entity, but of the greatest efficacy; so it is here, our relations to God are of very great efficacy, whatever the entity be; and therefore to lose our relations to God, especially this relation of God's being ours, and we being his, is a sore and heavy curse.

Obs. 3. We first begin with God in our apostacy, before God begins with us in his rejection. Mark here; the first is, "you are not my people," before the second comes, "I will not be your God." I would not have withdrawn myself from being your God if you had not first rejected me, and would not be my people. When God loves, he begins first; we love not him, but he loves us first; but when it comes to departing, it begins on our side, we first depart before the Lord does; and this will be a dreadful aggravation to wicked men another day, to think with themselves, This evil is come upon us, God is gone, mercy is gone; but who began this first? where is the root and principle? Thy perdition is of thyself. I began first, and therefore all the loss of that grace and mercy that is in God, I may thank this proud, this disterped, this base, passionate, wretched heart of mine own for it.

Obs. 4. It is a greater misery to lose God himself, than to be deprived of whatsoever comes from God. "I will not be your God." He does not say, You shall not have the fruit of my patience to be yours, you shall not have my creatures to be yours, you shall not have those fruits of my bounty to be yours: no, but I will not be yours, I myself will not be yours. This is the sorest threatening that can possibly be to a gracious heart. And this indeed is one special difference between a hypocrite and a truly gracious heart; a hypocrite is satisfied with what comes from God, but a truly gracious heart is satisfied with nothing but God himself. Though God lets out never so many fruits of his bounty and goodness to him, yet he must have union with God himself, or else he is unsatisfied. It is a notable speech of Bernard, "Lord, as the good things that come from me please not thee without myself, so the good things that come from thee please not me without thyself." This is the expression of a gracious heart. Let us tender up to God never such duties, with never so great strength, except we tender up to God ourselves, they never please him. So let God bestow never so many favours upon us, except God give us himself, they should never please us; I mean, please us so as to satisfy us, so as to quiet us, if for our portion.

You know what God said to Abraham, "Fear not, I am thy shield, and thy exceeding great reward. But Abram said, Lord God, what wilt thou give me, seeing I go childless?" Gen. xv. 1, 2. What is all this to me, so long as I have not the promise fulfilled, that so I may come in Christ to enjoy thyself? And Moses would not be contented though God told him his Angel should go before him; no, saith he, "If thy presence go not with me carry us not up hence," Exod. xxxiii. 20; xxxiii. 15. The harlot cares not so much for the person of her lover, as for his gifts; but the true lover cannot be satisfied with love-tokens, but she must have the person himself. So it is with a gracious heart. It is very observable that David, in Psal. li. 9, prays, "Hide thy face from my sins;" it seems God's face was angry; and yet presently, ver. 11, "Cast me not away from thy face, or presence." God's face was an angry face, yet David would not be cast away from this face of God: O no, rather let God be present with a gracious heart, though he be angry; though his anger continue, yet let me have his countenance. In that God says not, I will not give you these and these favours, but "I will not be your God;" this is the sorest threatening that possibly can be to a gracious heart.

Obs. 5. This is the judgment for sin, God not being their God. It hence appears that sin carries along with it in itself its own punishment. How is that? Thus: by sin we refuse to have God to be our God; by it we depart from God, we do not trust God, nor love him, nor fear him. The very nature of sin causes a sinner to depart from God, yea, to reject God from being a God to him; and this is the punishment, "I will not be your God." And this is the sorest punishment to a sinner, that he shall not have God for ever for his God.

Obs. 6. When any forsake God, and disavow him to be their God, we should do as God does, reject them from being ours. If they will not be God's, neither should they be ours. Will not such a man have acquaintance with God, will he forsake him and his ways, then he shall not have our acquaintance, we will forsake him. How far we may withdraw from a church that it shall not be ours, we shall fully meet with in the second chapter. Only now thus much: though it be true, when a people forsake God, we are to forsake them, yet let them grow never so wicked, our natural and civil relations cannot be broken because of their wickedness; but the relations of husband and wife, father and child, master and servant, must be acknowledged; servants must be dutiful to their masters though never so wicked; and the wife must be loving and dutiful to her husband, though he be never so wicked a man. But any intimate familiarity with those, not thus joined in such relations, ought not to exist; if they reject God, if they will not be God's, they should not be ours. It is said, Job viii. 20, that God will not help the evildoers; it should be true of us all, that we should not take the ungodly by the hand, to help them in evil. Thus much for the name of this third child, "Lo-ammi: ye are not my people, and I will not be your God."

That which remains in the chapter, is a promise of mercy both to Israel, ver. 10, and afterwards to Israel and Judah together, ver. 11. To Israel first, and that is,

Ver. 10. I'll let the number of the children of Israel shall be as the sand of the sea, which cannot be measured nor numbered; and it shall come to pass, that in the place where it was said unto them, I'll be not your people,

Cujus faciem timet, ipsius faciem invocat. Aug.

there it shall be said unto them, Ye are the sons of the living God.

And so he goes on with wonderfully gracious promises of mercy to Israel in future generations, though for the present God had determined what to do with Israel. Here then we have, first, a promise of mercy to Israel. Secondly, this mercy to be in future generations. And thirdly, to consist in the multitudes that should be gathered to Israel.

I. Here is a promise of mercy to Israel.

Obs. 1. That the Lord in judgment remembers mercy. It is a sore thing when God in mercy remembers judgment, but it is as comfortable when God in judgment remembers mercy. When God threatens most dreadfully, yet he promises most graciously. We should therefore, when we most fear the threats of God, look up to the promises of God, look up to see, when wrath is denounced in the most hideous and dreadful way, whether we can spy a promise, whether there be not yet a little cloud, though but as big as a man's hand, whether there be not yet a little crevice, through which we may see whether God doth not break forth with a little light in a way of promise.

Obs. 2. It is usual, when we are in prosperity to forget all threatenings, and when we are in adversity to forget all promises. When we hear of mercy to God's people, we never think of God's wrath; and on the other side, when we hear of his wrath, our unbelieving hearts never think of his grace and mercy. We ought to sanctify the name of God in both; when God is in a way of justice, look up to his grace; and when he is in a way of grace, look up to his justice. For that end I shall give you two notable texts of Scripture, as famous as any I know in the book of God: the one declares to you that when God expresses the greatest mercy, yet then he declares the greatest wrath; and the other, when God expresses the greatest wrath, he then declares the greatest mercy: and I shall show you how the name of God ought to be sanctified in both.

The first is in Exod. xxxiv. 6, 7; when the Lord passed by before Moses he "proclaimed, The Lord, the Lord God, merciful and gracious, longsuffering, and abundant in goodness and truth, keeping mercy for thousands, forgiving iniquity and transgression and sin." What abundance of mercy is here expressed! Now it follows, "and that will by no means clear the guilty; visiting the iniquity of the fathers upon the children, and upon the children's children, unto the third and to the fourth generation." Here is an expression of great wrath. And then for our sanctifying of God's name in this, it follows, ver. 8, And when Moses heard this, he "made haste, and bowed his head toward the earth, and worshipped." Thus we must bow and worship before God, sanctifying his name in both his mercy and justice.

On the other side, Nah. i. 2, "God is jealous, and the Lord revengeth; the Lord revengeth, and is furious; the Lord will take vengeance on his adversaries, and he reserveth wrath for his enemies." Dreadful expressions! Yet, ver. 3, "The Lord is slow to anger;" there is a mitigation at first: then he advances in expressions of wrath, but he is "great in power, and will not at all acquit the wicked:" and ver. 5, "The mountains quake at him, and the hills melt, and the earth is burned at his presence, yea, the world, and all that dwell therein: who can stand before his indignation, and who can abide in the fierceness of his anger? His fury is poured out like fire, and the rocks are thrown down by him." What more terrible expressions of wrath than these? Now mark, ver. 7, "The Lord is good, and a strong hold in the day of trouble; and he knoweth them that trust in him." What a strong expression of grace is here! observe it, my brethren, that in the midst of God's anger, yet God is good still. A gracious heart must acknowledge, though God be provoked to anger, yet he is a good God still; and it is a good sign for the soul to fall down before God when he is in the way of his wrath, and to say, "The Lord is good." As that good old man Eli did, after the denunciation of that dreadful sentence against him and his house by Samuel, "It is the Lord, let him do what seemeth him good."

Obs. 3. God, in the midst of his anger, knows those that trust in him. All of you will say, when God bestows favours upon you, The Lord is good, O blessed be God, he is a good God: but when God reveals his greatest wrath, truly then the Lord is good. Luther declared he would acknowledge God to be a good God, though he should destroy all men in the world.

Deus bonus est, etiam si omnes homines perderet. Luther.

Much more then is he to be acknowledged in a day of trouble, when he appears most graciously to his saints. "The Lord is good, and a strong hold in the day of trouble." God is a strong hold now, when such wrath is revealed, to his saints in the day of trouble; and he knoweth those that trust in him; though his wrath is abroad in the world, he knoweth those that trust in him. When men are angry they scarce know the difference between their foes and their friends. If any displease them, they come home and are angry with their wives, with their servants, with their children, with their friends, with every one about them. While they are in their passion, their wives, and children, and servants wonder what the matter is with them: Surely some one has displeased my master to-day, he is so touchy, and angry at every little thing. My brethren, it is a dishonour to you in the eyes of your servants, and it lays low your authority in your families, for them to see you come home in such a pet that you know not how to be pleased, though they have done nothing to displease you. God does not act so; though he be never so angry, yet he knows those that trust in him. Let God's anger be never so public and general in the world, if there be but a gracious soul that lies in a poor cottage, or in a hole, the Lord knows it, and takes notice of it, and that soul shall understand too that God knows it. It is true, when the wrath of God is revealed abroad in the world, it seems as if it would swallow up all the saints; and those whose spirits are weak and fearful are afraid that they shall be swallowed up in the common calamity. But be of good comfort, God knows those that trust in him, even when his wrath is never so dreadful and general. In this case it is with God's children as it is with a child in the mother's arms; if the father violently lays hold upon his servant, and thrusts him out of doors for his demerits, there is such a terrible reflection of the father's anger against the servant upon the child, that the poor child begins to cry. So when the children of God see God laying hold upon wicked men, to execute wrath upon them, they cry out, they are afraid lest some evil should befall them too. O no, be of good comfort, "The Lord is good, and a strong hold in the day of trouble; and he knoweth them that trust in him," when his anger is never so great and general. So though this Israel be "not my people," yet "the number of the children of Israel shall be as the sand of the sea." So in Nah. i. 15, "Behold upon the mountains the feet of him that bringeth good tidings, that publisheth peace!" What! at this time, though God's way be in the whirlwind, and so terrible, yet now, "behold the feet of him that bringeth good tidings, that publisheth peace." God abroad publishes war, yet he has a messenger to publish peace and life to some.

Is it not so this day? It is true, the wrath of the Lord is kindled, and burns as an oven against the ungodly, but peace shall be upon Israel. And let us sanctify the name of God in this too, for so it follows,

Nah. i. 15, "O Judah, keep thy solemn feasts, perform thy vows: for the wicked shall no more pass through thee; he is utterly cut off." And because God reveals such rich grace in the midst of judgment, let this engage your hearts to the Lord for ever.

Obs. 4. Not only when God threatens judgments, but when judgments are actually upon us, let us sanctify God's name in looking up to promises. Suppose we should live to feel most fearful judgments of God, yet even then we must look up to promises, and exercise faith, and have an eye to God in the way of his grace at that time; this is more difficult than in threatenings. You have a notable passage in Isa. xvi. 8, "In the way of thy judgments, O Lord, have we waited for thee; the desire of our soul is to thy name." Blessed be God, my brethren, the Lord calls us to wait upon him in the ways of mercy for the present. Not long since the Lord was in a way of judgment toward England; and some of God's people would wait upon God and keep his ways; but there were many, when they saw that they were likely to suffer, departed from God and declined his ways. Much cause of bitterness of spirit, and of dread of humiliation, have they that did so. But others may have comfort to their souls, that in the very way of God's judgments they waited for him, and they can now with more comfort wait upon God, when he is in the way of his mercy. But if God should ever come unto us in the way of his judgments, let us learn even then to wait upon God and keep his way.

Jer. xxxiii. 24 may seem more pertinent to illustrate this truth: "Considerest thou not what this people have spoken, saying, The two families which the Lord hath chosen, he hath even cast them off? thus they have despised my people, that they should be no more a nation before them." Mark the low condition of the people at this time; God has cast them off, they are despised and contemptible, not worthy to be accounted a nation: but though they were brought low, and in a condition contemptible, yet now God confirms his covenant with them: for observe, ver. 25, 26, "Thus saith the Lord; If my covenant be not with day and night, and if I have not appointed the ordinances of heaven and earth; then will I cast away the seed of Jacob, and David my servant." As if God had said, Let them know that whatever their condition is now, yet my love, my mercy, my faithfulness, is toward them as sure as my covenant with day and night, and as the ordinances of heaven and earth. An admirable text to help not only nations, but individuals, when they are under the contempt of ungodly men. Yet at that time the Lord is most ready to confirm his covenant with them, to be as sure as his covenant with day and night, and heaven and earth. It brings honour to God when at such times we can look up to him and exercise faith. And indeed this is the glory, and dignity, and beauty of faith, to exercise it when God's judgments are actually upon us.

II. To whom did this promise refer? It was not a promise to any who then lived, but to be fulfilled in future ages, yet introduced by the prophet as a comfort to the people of God then living. Hence

Obs. Gracious hearts are comforted with the promises of God made to the church, though not to be fulfilled in their days. If the church may prosper and receive mercies from God, though I be dead and mouldering in the grave, yet blessed he God! When Jacob was dying he said to Joseph, "Behold, I die; but God shall be with you, and bring you again unto the land of your fathers," Gen. xlviii. 21; he will fulfil his promises to you though I am dead. Our forefathers, that generation of the saints who lived a while since, how comfortably would they have died, if God, before their death, had revealed to them, that within three, or four, or seven years, so much mercy should come to England as we now see! Yea, how comfortably would any of us have died (I appeal to any gracious heart here) if God had said thus to thee, Go and be gathered to thy fathers in peace, within these two years such things shall be done for England as we now live to see! would not we willingly have died? would it not have been comfort enough against the fear of death, to have had revealed to us what should have been done to our posterity? What mercy then is it now, that it is not only revealed to us, but enjoyed by us!

III. What was this promise? "That Israel should be a multitude, that the number of them should be as the sand of the sea shore." We shall examine the excellency of the mercy of God in this promise by and by. Only for the present, inquire we a little why God should manifest his grace "to multiply them as the sand of the sea shore?"

If we compare Scripture with Scripture, we shall find that God promises this, because he would thereby show, that he remembered his old promise to Abraham, that God would multiply his seed "as the stars of heaven, and as the sand which is upon the sea shore;" and now God a long time after renews this promise. Hence

Obs. That the Lord remembers his promises, though made a long time since. "God is ever mindful of his covenant," Psal. cxi. 5. When we have some new and fresh manifestations of God's mercy, our hearts rejoice in it, but the impression of it is soon gone. When some of you have been seeking God, have had many manifestations of his love, and God has entered into covenant with you, for a while you have been comforted, but you lose all your comfort again within a short time. O remember, "God is ever mindful of his covenant," though made twenty or forty years ago; he remains the same still; be you the same still; be you ever mindful of your covenants. When men are brought into the bond of the covenant, their consciences are awed with it, at first they walk very strictly, and dare not in the least thing go from the covenant; but after a few months or weeks are over their heads, they forget the covenant they made with God. There is not such a strong bond upon their spirits as there was before. O my brethren, know that this is a great and sore evil in you; "God is ever mindful of his covenant," so you should be.

And as of his covenant, so of his threats too, by way of proportion. God remembers his threats that were made many years ago: we are affected with God's threats for the present, but within a while the impression is gone; but let us know, time alters not God as it does us.

We must, however, inquire more fully into this promise, because it is often declared in Scripture, that the children of Israel should be like the stars of the heaven, and as the sand upon the sea shore. Why did God express himself thus in his covenant to Abraham?

First, Abraham left his father's house and all his kindred at God's command, and upon that God made this covenant with him, that he would make his seed "as the stars of the heaven, and as the sand which is upon the sea shore." As if God had said, Abraham, be willing to leave your father's house, I will make a great house of you, a great family of yours.

Secondly, Observe that afterwards God confirmed this covenant to Abraham, and that with an oath. When he came first out of his country, and left his father's house, God made this promise of increasing his seed, but not with an oath; but afterwards, in Gen. xxii. 16, 17, God renews this promise of multiplying his seed, and that by an oath: "By myself have I sworn, saith the Lord, for because thou hast done this thing, and hast not withheld thy son, thine only son: that in blessing I will bless thee, and in multiplying I will multiply thy seed as the stars of the heaven, and as the sand which is upon the sea shore." Mark here, it was upon Abraham's being willing to offer up his son Isaac, his only son Isaac. Abraham was willing at God's command to offer up his own son, and upon that God promises to multiply his seed as the stars of heaven, and as the sand of the sea. Yea, with an oath, By myself I swear, saith the Lord, that I will do it, because thou hast done this.

Obs. 1. There is nothing lost in being willing to lose for God. Abraham was willing to lose his father's house, the comfort of his family, for God: I will make thee a glorious family as the stars of heaven, saith God. Again, Abraham was willing to lose one son, his only son, for God. Art thou willing to lose one son for me, saith God, thou shalt have ten thousand sons for this one thou lovest, yea, though it be lost but in thy intention. Thou shalt have thy own son, and yet have ten thousand sons besides. O, let us not be afraid to part with any thing for God. God's people know how to make up in God whatever they lose for God. But God will not only make it up in himself, but will make it up even in the very creature itself thou lovest for God. Art thou willing to lose a little of thy estate? Thou mayst with comfort expect, as far as, if thou knewest all, thou thyself wouldst desire, to have it made up in abundance, even in that very way. You know the promise, "And every one that hath forsaken houses, or brethren, or sisters, or father, or mother, or wife, or children, or lands, for my name's sake, shall receive an hundredfold, and shall inherit everlasting life," Matt. xix. 29. How hath God fulfilled this promise this day in many of our eyes, and to many of our experiences! How many have you known who were willing to part with what they had, and to put it out, as it were, to the wide world! But God has made it up to them, not only in himself, but in the very thing itself; and thereby taught them, and all the world, to be willing to venture to part with any thing for God and his cause.

Obs. 2. When we are willing to lose for God, then is the time when God will renew and confirm his covenant with us. God confirmed his covenant with Abraham when he was willing to part with his son, to be deprived of all his seed. The way to make sure of what we have is to be willing to part with it. You all desire to be sure of your estates; Oh that we could in these times, wherein we see nothing sure, make our estates sure! Would you make sure of your estates? Be willing to employ your estates for God and for a good cause. This is the way to have God renew his covenant to you for an assurance that way. This is the best assurance office in the world.

But how comes this promise in at this time, and to this people, in Hosea's prophecy? Because the Lord, by the prophet, would answer an objection of the people. They might have said, Hosea, do you thus threaten the destruction of Israel? You promise mercy to Judah, and Judah is but a handful to us; we are the ten tribes, and with us is the greatest part, almost all the seed of Abraham, and yet you threaten our destruction; it can never possibly be. What will become of God's promise to Abraham, that his seed should be as the stars of heaven, and as the sand on the sea shore? You seem to speak contrary to God; God said that he would multiply that seed, and you take a course to make men believe that the seed of Abraham shall be brought to nothing.

The prophet answers thus: Do you say, What will become of Abraham's seed? Know that God can tell how to provide for his church and fulfil his promise made to Abraham, whatever becomes of you. You are mistaken in thinking that you alone are the seed of Abraham. Abraham has not only a carnal, but a spiritual seed; all those that shall join in the faith of Abraham, and subject themselves to the God of Abraham, shall be the seed of Abraham, and so they shall be the children of Israel as well as you. Thus God will make good his word. To expound this truth the apostle quotes this promise, "As he saith also in Hosea, I will call them my people which were not my people," Rom. ix. 25; and applies it to the Gentiles. The Holy Ghost, who is the best interpreter of Scripture, there shows that it is at least in part fulfilled in so many of the Gentiles coming in, and being converted to the faith of the true Messiah.

This and many other excellent prophecies concerning the glory of Israel, were made good in part in the first times of the gospel. They were, however, but the first-fruits of the fulfilling of those promises and prophecies; the accomplishment of them is yet certainly to come, when the fulness of the Gentiles shall come in, and the Jews be converted. Then not only the spiritual seed, but the very carnal seed of Abraham shall have this promise made good, and be multiplied, and come into the faith too, Rom. xi. 26. The apostle speaks there of a general salvation of Israel that was to come after the fulness of the Gentiles. So it appears plainly, that those prophecies concerning the glory of Israel, though they were in part made good in the first times of the gospel, yet there was a further accomplishment of them, when there should be a fulness of the Gentiles come in, and then all Israel should be saved. From hence

Obs. 1. All believers, though of the Gentiles, are of the seed of Abraham, they are of Israel, and therefore have the same privileges with Israel, the same in effect, yea, better. They are all the heirs of Abraham, who, Rom. iv. 13, is said to be "the heir of the world;" they have the dignity of Israel, to be the peculiar people of the Lord, to be God's treasure and portion. Whatever you read of excellent titles and appellations about Israel, they belong now to all believers, though they are Gentiles. A comfortable and most sweet point to us Gentiles.

Obs. 2. God has a time to bring in abundance of people to the profession of the faith; multitudes, even as the sand of the sea shore. He will do it, and he has ways enough to accomplish it. Though for the present men cast this reproach upon the people of God, that they are but few, a company of poor mean people, a handful, that are nothing in comparison of the rest. But this reproach will be wiped away, and we may yet expect, that before the world come to an end, the greatest part of its inhabitants shall embrace the faith of Christ, and become godly too. Isa. xlix. 19—21, "Thy waste and desolate places, and the land of thy destruction, shall even now be too narrow by reason of the inhabitants." This yet has not been fulfilled. Thy children shall say, "The place is too strait for me, give place to me that I may dwell. Then shalt thou say in thine heart, who hath begotten me these?" When was this fulfilled? "The stone," in Dan. ii. 35, "that smote the image became a great mountain, and filled the whole earth." God's people shall fill the whole earth. Now take all Christians to be God's people that only acknowledge Christ to be the Son of God, they are computed to be not above the sixth part of the world; and yet this must be fulfilled, that the church shall be as the stone that smote the image, become a great mountain and fill the whole earth. "John saw," in the Revelation, "the holy city, new Jerusalem, coming down from God out of heaven, prepared as a bride adorned for her husband," Rev. xxi. 2, 10; and when God comes to dwell with men by his Spirit, all people shall come and flock to the church, as the prophet saith, like "the doves to their windows," Isa. lx. 8; and they, you know, fly together in flocks. In Christ's time the people of God were a little flock; "Fear not, little flock." The Greek has two diminutives, little, little flock, and so it may be translated, "Fear not, little, little flock; for it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom," Luke xii. 32. It was a little flock then, but it shall be a great flock when the Father shall come to give them the kingdom. Christ is promised to have the "heathen for his inheritance, and the uttermost parts of the earth for his possession," Psal. ii. 8; he shall possess them. A king does not possess a kingdom who only possesses some town, or one shire of it: Christ shall possess the uttermost parts of the earth. Yea, it shall be said, "The kingdoms of this world are become the kingdoms of our Lord, and his Christ," Rev. xi. 15. They are the Lord's indeed in some sense always; but he speaks in a special sense, wherein it shall be said not only a few congregations are the Lord's, and his Christ's, but the whole kingdoms of the earth, which, with their great kings, shall come and bring their glory into the church.

Obs. 3. Is it so? let every one then come in, and help on this work. Has God promised this, that there shall be multitudes come into the church? Come thou in then, and thou! What! shall so many embrace the faith of Jesus Christ, and shalt thou stand out, and be shut out at last amongst the dogs? Do you come in and add to the number, to make good this word of the Lord. Yea, let us seek to draw in all others as much as we can: therefore it is that we have such excellent promises in the Scripture to encourage us to draw in others to the faith. "He that turneth many to righteousness shall shine as the stars for ever and ever," Dan. xii. 3.

Obs. 4. Although God defers fulfilling his promise for a time, yet at last he does it gloriously. The paucity of the number of the saints of God now shall not discourage always; let us be above this stumblingblock. There are but few yet; what then? there shall be many, "The number of the children of Israel shall be as the sand of the sea." What though we do not see ways how this promise shall be fulfilled for the present, yet let us believe it. For, observe, when God first made this promise to Abraham, that his seed should be as the stars of heaven, and as the sand of the sea shore, it required much exercise of faith in Abraham to believe it. It was twenty years after this promise before Abraham had a child. At last he had a child, and a child by promise; then he must go and kill that child; but he was spared. Well, Isaac grows up, and he was forty years old before he married; all this while there was but one of the promised seed. When Isaac married, Rebekah his wife continued twenty years barren; what became of the promise all this while, that the seed of Abraham should be as the sand of the sea? Here are twenty years gone, and forty years gone, and twenty years more gone, and yet there are no other children of the seed by promise but Isaac. Nay, it appears that upon their going into Egypt, which was two hundred and fifteen years after the promise, there were but threescore and ten of them all. Where is the promise then, that Abraham's seed should be as the stars of heaven for multitude? But now mark, God afterwards comes on apace, for in Numb. i. 46, you find that at the end of the next two hundred and fifteen years they were reckoned when they came out of Egypt, and "they were six hundred thousand and three thousand and five hundred and fifty" fighting men of twenty years old and upwards, besides all the women and children, and all the tribe of Levi, which made two and twenty thousand more, Numb. iii. 39. In the first two hundred and fifteen years they were but threescore and ten, and the next two hundred and fifteen years, while they were in bondage, they increased to six hundred thousand and three thousand and five hundred and fifty, besides women and children, and the tribe of Levi. Thus, though it was long, yet when God's time came he fulfilled the promise to Abraham. So though we do not for the present see God making good the promise, yet let us believe, for God has ways to fulfill all, and he will do it, and when he comes he will come gloriously above our faith.

We can hardly believe there should be such great things done in England as we desire and expect, but there is nothing yet to accomplish which is more difficult than that which has been already done, therefore we may believe: and when God once comes in the way of mercy, he triumphs gloriously; therefore let us be willing to wait his time. Let us not proportion out God's ways, nor draw an argument from what has been done in one time, that therefore no more shall be done in another. You see what he did in the fulfilling of the promise to Abraham; and you may observe in your reading of the New Testament, what low beginnings there were of the church at the first: therefore saith Christ, "Where two or three are gathered together" as noting that there would be but a very few at the first. When Paul was called by a wonderful vision, in which he saw a man of Macedonia appearing to him, and praying him to come over to Macedonia and help them, Acts xvi. 9; one would have thought that when he preached there, all would have come flocking to hear, and there would have been a glorious work done, that he would have brought in a great number to the faith. But when he came to Macedonia he was fain to go into the fields by a river's side to preach, and only a few women came there to hear him. That was all the auditory he had, and amongst them there was but one poor woman wrought upon, "God opened the heart of Lydia." This was the present result only of such a mighty call; and yet we know how gloriously God wrought by Paul. This I note to confirm you in this, that though the beginnings be very small, yet we may expect a glorious increase afterward. As it was with the church at the beginning, so it will be here: that which Bildad said of Job, chap. viii. 7, may well be applied to the church, "Though thy beginning was small, yet thy latter end shall greatly increase."

Obs. 5. As God has a time to multiply his church, so it is a great blessing to the church of God when it is multiplied. It is a fruit of God's great grace and mercy to make the church a numerous people: as "in the multitude of people is the king's honour," Prov. xiv. 28; so it is the glory of Jesus Christ, and therefore it was prophesied of him, that converts should come into the church as the "dew of the morning," Psal. cx. 3. Thus it began in the primitive times, and soon after multitudes united with the church. I remember that Jerome, writing to Cromatius, affirms, that there might be computed for every day in the year (except the first of January) five thousand martyrs; therefore the church was grown to a numerous multitude. And Tertullian, in his Apology to the Heathens, states, they were become so numerous in his day, that they had filled their cities; and that if they would they had strength enough to make their party good against them, but they were patient and submitted themselves to their tyranny.

I know many make this statement of Tertullian an argument that men ought to lay down their necks, if those who rule over them will it; and that if they cannot obey actively, they must obey passively, any thing that is according to the will of their rulers. Why, say they, did not the Christians resist in the primitive times? Yes, though they were under idolaters, and were commanded to deny Christ, which was utterly unlawful, if they could not obey actively, they obeyed passively, they submitted themselves to their rage; and though they had strength yet they would not resist. Why should not Christians do so now?

You are exceedingly deceived with this argument. True, we are bound to obey authority, actively or passively, and yet this argument does not serve the turn. There is much difference between authority abused, and men that are in authority commanding; here the difference lies not in authority abused, but in that which is no authority at all. For there is no authority that we are subject to now, but according to the laws and constitutions of the country in which we live. Not to the commands and mere will of men are we bound in conscience to submit, either actively or passively. Though it be a good thing that is commanded, conscience does not bind to it, eu ratione, to yield to it because it is commanded, till it be brought to a law, and is according to the agreements and covenants of the country wherein we live. And suppose this authority is abused, and there is an ill law made, then I confess, if that law be of force, we must either leave the country, or submit, or suffer, for then the power of God is in it, though it be abused, and we are to be subject to all powers. When then it comes to be a power, to be a law, it is authority, though abused, and we must yield obedience to it, either actively or passively. But we must inquire whether it be a power; it is not because the man that is in authority commands it, except he command it by virtue of that authority which is according to the nature and condition of the fundamental constitutions of the country where he lives.

Now in the primitive times they submitted themselves to suffer when they could not do the things that were commanded, as to deny Christ, because by the constitutions of that country they had a legal power to proceed against them. Therefore the Christians were willing rather to suffer any thing than to resist; and were ours the same case we should do so too. If once it come to pass, that mischief be established by a law, though it be mischief, yet if we cannot obey it actively, we are bound to suffer, or else to quit the country, if it be urged upon us. We may seek what we can to get it alleviated, but we must either do or suffer, if once it be framed into a law; otherwise we are not bound in conscience; bound we may be in regard of prudence, and for preventing other disturbances, but conscience does not bind to the will of men, but to laws. Thus much for the satisfaction of conscience in this case.

Obs. 6. We should rejoice in multitudes joining the church. The Christians were wonderfully increased at this time. Now we know we are to rejoice when the church is increased, and to esteem it as the great blessing of God when its members are made as the sand upon the sea shore. In Psal. lxxii. 8, there is a large prophecy made of the kingdom of Christ, and of his glory in this particular: "He shall have dominion from sea to sea, and from the river unto the ends of the earth:" then ver. 11, "All kings shall fall down before him: all nations shall serve him:" and ver. 17, "His name shall endure for ever: his name shall be continued as long as the sun: and men shall be blessed in him: all nations shall call him blessed." Mark how the saints rejoice and bless God; what! shall all nations come in and serve Christ? shall there come multitudes in and join the church? "Blessed be the Lord God, the God of Israel, who only doeth wondrous things, and blessed be his glorious name for ever: and let the whole earth be filled with his glory; Amen, and Amen," saith the church of God then. Let all the saints send forth their echo, Amen; yea, and Amen too to this, that all the earth shall be filled with the glory of Christ; this is that with which they are affected, this is that they desire, as if they should say, This is a blessed thing indeed!

My brethren, it is a good and comely sight in a gracious eye to see multitudes flock to Christ and to his ordinances. It is true that the spirit of antichrist, which is in many, cannot look upon this but with a malevolent eye, and their hearts rage and fret. They love to scatter Christ's church up and down, but to see people flocking to ordinances, to see multitudes come and join themselves to Christ, this they cannot endure. The same malicious spirit that was against Christ, of which we read in the Acts of the Apostles, yea, and in the Gospels too, we find still in such kinds of men. Mark that text, Acts xiii. 44, 45: "Almost the whole city came together to hear the word of God;" to hear a sermon. Now when the Jews "saw the multitude, they were filled with envy:" why, what harm was there done? They saw no harm done, but merely saw the multitude, and they speak against those things that were spoken by Paul, contradicting and blaspheming. Mark again the vile spirits of the Pharisees, who envied at the multitude that followed Christ himself: not only did they envy the apostles, for they might be factious and singular men in their esteem; but what say you to Christ himself? John xii. 19, "The Pharisees said, Perceive ye how ye prevail nothing? behold, the whole world is gone after him." Certainly the same Pharisaical spirit has prevailed in our days. We know that many a godly, painful, conscientious minister, has been ousted of all he had in an instant, and his mouth stopped, though his persecutors had nothing against him, no, not for their own laws, but because he was a popular man, and multitudes followed him. What a dangerous thing has it been of late times for men to be popular, that is, to be such as multitudes would flock to the word preached by them. Certainly it is an evil spirit, for the promise of God to his church is, that there shall come multitudes and join with the people of God in his ordinances.

I know some reply to this, they do not object that multitudes should follow that which is good, but it is the humour and pride of such men to have multitudes to follow after them, and that they oppose. Take heed of putting this accusation off with such a plea. Consider whether it will hold at that great day. The devil himself never pleaded against Christ or any of his ways, but with some colour. Surely these men judge thus by looking into their own hearts; they know that if multitudes should come to them their hearts would be lifted up, and so they judge accordingly of others. But suppose it be so, for men are but men, that they, through corruption, should have any such workings of pride, yet do they say any thing that is not justifiable? do they preach any thing that is not according to Christ? If they do not, then thou shouldst encourage that which is good; and as for that which is evil, leave it to the coming of Christ, except thou canst by prayer and instruction help to remove it. It is worse to envy at multitudes coming to hear the gospel now, than it was for the Jews to envy Paul for multitudes following him, for they thought they could contradict the false doctrine which they supposed Paul preached, and therefore they had some colour for their conduct. But here it is nothing but merely because multitudes come to hear the word. If men preach first in corners privately, where they have but a few auditors, they object: well, if they preach publicly, and multitudes come to hear them, then they cry out of that too. Nothing can please envious and malicious spirits. If we keep ourselves retired, that has exceptions enough, and if we come in a public way, they have exceptions to that too. Here the gross malice and cunning of Satan appear, because when the thing itself cannot be excepted against, he runs to the intention of the heart, and to men's inward aims, and bringeth an argument against that which he knows no man can confute. For who can say that that is either true or false, that men have inward aims of pride, and vain-glory, and self-seeking, in multitudes flocking after them? Nay, suppose we profess before the Lord and Christ, as we desire to stand before him, and answer it at that day, what our aims are, this will not serve the turn. Why, then, my brethren, if men will choose such an argument as cannot possibly be answered before the coming of Christ, and so make a stumblingblock, there is no help, but men must stumble and fall; and many do stumble and fall. However, let "wisdom be justified of her children;" let the saints rejoice in this, that multitudes come to the ministry of the word and to the ordinances of Christ. Be careful and wise in your coming, and give no just occasion for reproach, but all due respect to those to whom you have the most relation.

This you see is the promise, that there shall come in such multitudes to the church. But mark how the promise runs:

"As the sand of the sea." Rabbin Ezra makes an allusion from hence: "As the sand," saith he, "keeps the waves of the sea from breaking in, and drowning the world; so Israel, so the saints, keep the world from being drowned by the waves of God's wrath." I do not say that this is the intention, but the intention of God is mainly to signify the multitudes that should come into the church. Only this idea we may use, as being a comfortable and pretty allusion, and it is a truth that Israel is as the sand of the sea, not only in respect of multitudes, but as the sand to keep in the waves of God's wrath from drowning the world. Were it not for the church of God, the waves of God's wrath would overflow all the world, and the world would quickly be confounded. So saith he, "When the waves of God's anger seem as if they would overflow all the world, they do but see Israel and immediately return back; they retire, and are not able to overflow the world as they desire."

Luther, in his comment upon this prophet, makes the second chapter to begin at the tenth verse; from which to the end we have the promise of future mercy to Israel, both to Israel and Judah together. Some part of God's promise of mercy to Israel we have expounded. Now we proceed:

"And it shall come to pass, that in the place." This, according to some, has reference to the land of Canaan, that God will have a very glorious church there, especially in Jerusalem, before the end of the world come; and many prophecies seem to incline that way, as Zech. xii. 6, "Jerusalem shall be inhabited again in her own place, even in Jerusalem." This cannot be meant only of their return out of captivity, that was in the time of Cyrus. The prophet saith, in the day that Jerusalem shall be inhabited, "the feeble among them shall be as David; and the house of David shall be as the angel of God;" and also that God will "pour upon them the spirit of grace and supplication; and they shall look upon him whom they have pierced," ver. 8, 10. The return of their captivity at first was not glorious; if you read the story of it, you find that even all that while they were in a contemptible condition before the surrounding nations. But God speaks here, and in other places, of a glorious return of their captivity, and coming into their own land.

The Jews have a tradition, that there is a time that all the Jews, wherever they die, shall come through meatus terræ, and rise again at Jerusalem; and therefore when some of them think they have not long to live, they sell all their possessions, and go and live near Jerusalem, to prevent the trouble of coming through those meatus terræ, of which they speak. Thus they are deluded in their conceits.

But yet more generally, "In that place."

Whereas the place of my people was confined to a little and narrow room, hereafter it shall be enlarged. Where I was not known, amongst the heathen, even there shall I be known, and there I shall have a people; and not only a people, but sons, the sons of the living God; and that so apparently, that it shall be said unto them, "Ye are the sons of the living God."

Thus St. Peter seems to interpret this place: 1 Pet. ii. 10, speaking of the Gentiles, that God would have a people among them, the apostle saith, "Which in times past were not a people, but are now the people of God." Interpreters generally conclude that the apostle had reference to this very place in Hosea. We may build then upon this interpretation, that it is the intention of the Spirit of God, that God would call home the Gentiles to himself, and so they that were no people should become his people, his sons. It should be said in that place where before it was said that they knew him not, that now they are his sons. Yea, the heathen shall be brought in, they shall be convinced of the vanity of their idolatry. We worshipped dead stocks; our gods were dead stones. We were vassals to them; but now we see a people come in to the profession of this Christian religion, they worship the living God, their God is the true God: certainly here are the sons of the living God. This is the scope of the Holy Ghost.

Obs. 1. It is a comfortable thing to consider that where God has not been known and worshipped, that afterward in those places God shall be known and worshipped.

That such nations, countries, and towns, which have been in darkness and idolatry, should now have the knowledge of the true God, that the true God should be worshipped amongst them, is a blessed thing. England was once one of the most barbarous nations in the world, and in that place, where it was said, "Ye are not my people," where there was nothing but a company of savage barbarians that worshipped the devil; how in this place, in England, is it said, even by the nations round about us, Surely "they are the sons of the living God!" And so many times in dark corners in the country, where they never had the knowledge of Jesus Christ, but were nursed in popery, and in all kinds of superstitious vanity, God is pleased to send some faithful minister to carry the light of the knowledge of Christ unto them, and efficaciously to work faith in their hearts, and then, oh what an alteration is there in that town! It may be said of many a house and family, in which nothing but blasphemy, atheism, scorn of religion, uncleanness, and all manner of wickedness have been, now it is a family filled with the servants and sons of the living God. As it is a grievous thing to think that in a place where God has been truly worshipped, the devil should be served there; so it is a comfortable thing to think of other places wherein the devil has been served, that God is now truly worshipped there. The Turks have possession of the temple at Jerusalem; there where the ark, and the cherubim, and the seraphim dwelt, now are tigers, and bears, and savage creatures: but on the other side, consider that in places where there have been none but tigers, and bears, and savage creatures, they are now filled with cherubim and seraphim; this is a comfortable thing.

Obs. 2. God has a time to convince the world of the excellency of his saints. It shall be said they "are the sons of the living God." They shall not only be the sons of the living God, but it shall come to pass that it shall be said they are the sons of the living God: all about them shall see such a lustre of the glory of God upon them, that they shall say, Verily, whatever other people have said heretofore, whatever the thoughts of men have been, these are not only the servants, but the sons of the living God. We have an excellent prophecy of this in Zech. xii. 5, "The governors of Judah shall say in their heart, The inhabitants of Jerusalem shall be my strength in the Lord of hosts their God." Not only the people shall be convinced of this, but the governors of Judah shall say in their hearts, Our strength is in the inhabitants of Jerusalem, in the Lord of hosts their God. However they were heretofore scandalized as seditious and factious, and as enemies of the state, yet now the governors of Judah shall acknowledge that their strength is in them, and in the Lord their God, that this Lord of hosts is their God. That time will be a blessed time when the governors of Judah shall come to be convinced of this; when God shall so manifest the excellencies of his saints, as that both great and small shall confess them to be "the sons of the living God." It is promised to the church of Philadelphia, Rev. iii. 9, that the Lord would make them that said they were Jews and were not, and said they were the church and were not; but were "of the synagogue of Satan, to come and worship before their feet, and to know that I have loved thee." There is a time that ungodly men shall be forced to know that God loves his people.

And one thing, amongst the rest, that will much convince the men of the world of the excellency of the saints, will be the beauty of God's ordinances that shall be set up amongst them, that shall even dazzle the eyes of the beholders. For this you have an excellent promise, Ezek. xxxvii. 28, "The heathen shall know that I the Lord do sanctify Israel." How shall they know it? "When my sanctuary shall be in the midst of them for evermore:" they shall know that I the Lord do sanctify Israel, when the beauty of my ordinances shall appear in them.

And if God be not only satisfied in doing good to his people, but he will have the world know it, and be convinced of it; let the people of God then not be satisfied only in having their hearts upon God, but let the world know that they love God too. You must do that which will make it appear to all the world that you are the children of the living God. "Let your light so shine before men, that they, seeing your good works, may glorify your Father which is in heaven." It is one thing to do a thing that may be seen, and another thing to do a thing that it may be seen: and yet God's people may do both; not do good only that may be seen, but if they keep the glory of God in their eye, as the highest aim, they may desire, and be willing too, that it may be seen to the praise of God. But this, I confess, requires some strength of grace, so to act, and yet to keep the heart upright. The excellency of grace consists not in casting off the outward comforts of the world, but to know how to enjoy them, and to overrule them for God: so the strength of grace consists not in forbearing such actions as are taken notice of by men, or not daring to aim to publish those things that have excellency in them, but in having the heart enabled to do this, and yet to keep it under, and to keep God above in his right place.

Obs. 3. It is a great blessing to God's children that they shall be accounted so before others. It shall be said they are sons.

Not only that they shall be so, but that they shall be accounted so. "Blessed are the peacemakers: for they shall be called the children of God," Matt. v. 9. This is a blessing, not only to be God's children, but to be called God's children; we must account it so, and therefore we must walk so as may convince all with whom we converse that we are the children of God. Let us not think this sufficient; Well, let me approve my heart to God, and then what need I care what all the world thinks of me. God promises it as a blessing to have his people called the children of God; then this must not be slighted. You find in the gospel that Christ often made it his great business to make it manifest to the world that he was sent of God; he would have them know that his Father sent him, and that he came from him: so the people of God should count it a blessing, and walk so as they may obtain such a blessing, that the world may know that they are of God.

Obs. 4. The grace of God under the gospel, is more full and glorious than the grace of God under the law. "In the place where it was said unto them, Ye are not my people, there it shall be said unto them, Ye are the sons of the living God."

Mark, it is not in the place where it was said they "are not my people," it shall be said to them, they are my people. No; but further, it shall be said they are sons, and "sons of the living God:" this goes beyond being his people.

For this is spoken of the state of the church under the gospel: they were God's people indeed under the law; but the appellation, "the sons of the living God," is reserved for the times under the gospel. Sometimes under the law they are called by the name of sons; but it appeareth by this text, that in comparison of that glorious sonship which they shall have under the times of the gospel, that in former times they were rather servants than sons. There is very little of our adoption in Christ revealed in the Old Testament. No, that was reserved for the Son of God, for him that came out of the bosom of the Father, and brought the treasures of his Father's counsel to the world to reveal. Both adoption and eternal life were very little made known in the time of the law, therefore St. Paul saith, that "life and immortality were brought to light through the gospel," 2 Tim. i. 10.

(2.) Sons, because, in the time of the gospel, the spirits of the saints are of son-like dispositions, they are ingenuous, not mercenary. In the time of the law, God induced his people to obey by offering rewards, especially prosperity in outward things; but in the time of the gospel we have no such rewards in temporals. In the time of the law afflictions are not much spoken of, but much outward prosperity; but in the time of the gospel more affliction, because the dispositions of the hearts of people should not be so mercenary as they were before, they should be an ingenuous, willing people in the day of Christ's power.

(3.) Sons, because of the son-like affection toward God their Father, out of a natural στροφῆ, that they should have more than in the times of the law. I suppose some of you have heard of the story of the son of Cræsus; though he was dumb all his days, when he perceived a soldier striking his father his affection broke the bars of his speech, and he cried out to the soldier to spare his father. This is the affection of a son, and these affections God looks for from his children, especially in the time of the gospel, that they should hear no wrong done to him; but though they could never speak in their own cause, yet they should be sure to speak in their Father's cause.

(4.) Sons, because they have not such a spirit of servility upon them as they had in the time of the law. Christ is come to redeem us, that we might "serve the Lord in holiness and righteousness before him, without fear, all the days of our life;" to take away the spirit of fear. Hence the apostle saith, 2 Tim. i. 7, We have not received "the spirit of fear; but of power, and of love, and of a sound mind:" and Heb. ii. 15, Christ is come "to deliver them who through fear of death were all their lifetime subject to bondage." The spirit of a son is not the spirit of fear: "Ye have not received the spirit of bondage again to fear; but ye have received the Spirit of adoption, whereby we cry, Abba, Father," Rom. viii. 15. It is unseemly in the children of God, especially in the time of the gospel, to be of such servile spirits as to fear every little danger; to be distracted and amazed. Has not God revealed himself to us as a Father to his children, that we should not fear? He would not have us fear himself with a servile fear, as men do, and therefore surely not to fear men, be they what they will. We are sons.

(5.) Sons. Not only sons, for we might find in Scripture where the people of God, under the law, perhaps are sometimes called so, but elder sons, sons come to years; (it is true, they were before us, and so in that respect we are not elder;) not children under tutorage, not under schoolmasters and governors, as they were under the law. You know what comparison the Scripture makes of the difference between the church in the time of the gospel, and that in the time of the law. In the time of the law it is true indeed they were children; but how? they were children under tutors and governors, they were not as yet come to years, they were but as young children that were put out to school. But now, as the apostle saith, Gal. iv. 5, Christ hath redeemed us from being under the law, "that we might receive the adoption of sons:" mark, that we might receive it; so that now the state of the church is like a child that is of age, and by that is freed from his tutors and governors, and comes to his inheritance, sui juris, as it were.

Therefore the saints now are not to be dealt with as if still they were in their childish condition. How were the Jews dealt with in their childish condition? Thus, they had external things to gain them to serve God, they worshipped God much in external things. As we deal with children, we give them apples and fine things to induce them to obey, so God dealt with them. And as children, when they begin to learn, must have a great many pictures in their book; so God taught the Jews with outward ceremonies, which afterward the Scripture calls but beggarly rudiments. Children, you know, are pleased much with gay things; and they that would bring Jewish ceremonies, or ceremonies of their own invention, into the church, treat the church as if in her childish condition still, as if gay things would please her. Therefore they must have pictures, and images, and such things to gratify the people, which make the people of God beneath themselves, as if they were yet children. No, in the state of the gospel they are come to the adoption of sons. And so children you know are pleased with hearing music, and pipes, and such things, which men would bring still into the church in the time of the gospel. I remember Justin Martyr, in answer to that about musical instruments, saith that they are fit for children and fools, as organs and the like, and therefore they were not in the church. And indeed, for the childish state of the church those things are fit, but now when they are come to the adoption of sons, other services that are more spiritual are more suitable and honourable. As a man, that is grown to be a man, would think himself wronged much to be taught as a child, to be put off with gay things; so should the people of God under the gospel think it a great wrong that has been done them, when men have sought to teach them with pictures and images, instead of spiritual instruction.

Τὸ μετὰ τῶν ἄνθρωπων ὄργανον εἶναι τοῖς νηπιῶσι ῥημοδίον, διὸ ἐν ταῖς ἐκκλησίαις προσοίεται ἢ χυρῖσι ὄργανον καὶ τῶν ἁλλῶν νηπιῶσι ὄργανον ἀρμονικόν. 117. Quæst. ad Orthodoxos.

Obs. 5. When God is pleased to be reconciled to a people, he is as fully theirs as ever, yea, sometimes more fully. "It shall be said, Ye are the sons of the living God." Israel, that was cast off from God, now shall be brought in more fully than before. He comes rather with more full grace than formerly he did.

People before, but sons now. Oh what an encouragement is this to all apostatizing souls that have fallen off from God! Come in, come in, and be reconciled to God, and thou shalt not only find God as good as ever thou didst, but thou shalt find him much better and much sweeter than ever thou didst in all thy life. Seldom we act so. When men fall out one with another, though possibly they may be reconciled, yet it is seldom that they are so fully reconciled, so fully one as they were before; they are but as a broken vessel soldered together, that is very weak in the soldering place; or as garments that have been rent, and are mended, soon torn, and quickly ready to fall in pieces in the place where they were mended: it is not so between God and a penitent soul.

Again, "sons," not only of God, but "of the living God." There is much in this, that the people of God under the gospel should be called the "sons of the living God." The life of God is the glory of God: he swears by his life: by this he is distinguished from the heathen gods, that he is the living God. Life is the most excellent thing in the world: Anstin therefore saith, that the life of a fly is more excellent than the sun in the firmament: and certainly it is the glory of God, that he is the living God. God, as the living God, is the object of our faith, and so he is the happiness of his people: "Trust in the living God," 1 Tim. vi. 17. "My soul thirsteth for God, for the living God: O when shall I come and appear before God?" Psal. xlii. 2.

But why is God called "the living God" in reference to his church here? This is a treasure of comfort to his people, that he is called the living God in reference to his church. God would hereby declare to them that all that is in him shall be active for the good of his church for ever. He will show himself not only to be a God, but a living God. He will show all his attributes to be living attributes, for the good of his people. Did God show himself active for his people in former times? much more may his church in the time of the gospel, expect the Lord to manifest himself to be active amongst them. Therefore, we may make use of what we read of God's activeness for the good of his church in former times, to plead with God to show himself as active now. See how the church pleads it: "Awake, awake, put on strength, O arm of the Lord; awake, as in the ancient days, in the generations of old. Art not thou it that hath cut Rahab, and wounded the dragon? Art thou not it which hath dried the sea, the waters of the great deep?" Isa. li. 9, 10. O Lord, hast thou not shown thyself glorious in defence of thy people, in helping thy servants in their great straits, and in destroying thine enemies? wilt not thou be so still? In the times of the gospel we may expect more activeness of God than ever he manifested since the world began. Therefore, when God would set out the state of the church under the gospel, mark how he takes that title to himself. Rev. iv. 9, the four living creatures (mentioned in the verses before, by which is meant the state of the church under the gospel) "give glory and honour and thanks to him that sat on the throne, who liveth for ever and ever;" and ver. 10, "the four and twenty elders fell down before Him that sat on the throne, and worshipped him that liveth for ever and ever;" and chap. v. 14, both join together: "The four living creatures said, Amen. And the four and twenty elders fell down and worshipped him that liveth for ever;" and chap. x. 5, 6, "The angel which I saw stand upon the sea and upon the earth lifted up his hand to heaven, and swarc by him that liveth for ever and ever." Thus life, the attribute of God, is made use of for the state of the church in the gospel, to show how active God will be for them. Hence, Heb. xii. 22, the church is called "the city of the living God." Now to apply this to ourselves.

Obs. 1. If we expect that God should be a living God to us, it becomes not us to have dead hearts in his service. If God be active for our good, let us be active for his honour. A living, and a lively Christian, is beautiful in the eyes of God and man. Let us labour not only to be living, but to be lively, for God and his cause. Abundance of service and good may living and lively Christians do in the places where they live, especially in these times. But oh how few are there, who are active and stirring, and are carried on by the spirit of wisdom and zeal for God and his cause! Away now with our cold and dead wishes and desires, let us up and be doing, and the Lord will be with us. The adversaries are lively; so saith the psalmist, "Mine enemies are lively, and they are strong," Psal. xxxviii. 19. We may well make use of that expression too; our enemies are lively and strong; shall they be more lively and active for Satan, and for their lusts, than we for the living God? As God is the object of our happiness as he is the living God, so we are the object of God's delight as we are living too. "God is not the God of the dead, but of the living."

Obs. 2. We should be lively and active, for we live upon the bread of life, and drink the water of life, we have lively oracles, lively ordinances, therefore life and activity are required of us: "fervent in spirit, serving the Lord," Rom. xii. 11; τὴν πνευματικὴν ἔσφραγιον. be burning, boiling up in your spirits, for you are serving the Lord, the living God: dead spirits become not the services of the living God. Grace is called "the Divine nature," 2 Pet. i. 4. It is also called the very "life of God," Eph. iv. 18. It is impossible, then, but a Christian must needs be active, seeing his grace is the very life of God in him.

Obs. 3. By being lively and active, we shall prevent abundance of temptations that otherwise will befall us. A dead, lazy spirit is liable to a thousand temptations: as when the honey is boiling, the flies will not come to it; when it is set in the window and grows cold, then they come to it: so when the spirits of men are boiling hot for God, Beelzebub, the god of flies, with his temptations, comes not upon them; but when their spirits begin to cool, and grow dull and heavy, then comes Beelzebub, and all manner of temptation, upon their souls. The breath that comes from the body of a man is warm, but the breath that comes from a pair of bellows is cold, because it is artificial; so when men are cold in the services of God, it is to be feared that their breath in praying, and other duties, is but artificial; it is not the breath of life; if it were living it would be warm. That was the reason why God would not have an ass offered him in the law in sacrifice, but his neck must be broken, because the ass is a dull creature: God loves not dull creatures in his service.

I have read of a people who worshipped the sun for their god, to which they sacrificed a flying horse; the reason was this, because they would offer to the sun somewhat suitable to it. They honoured the sun for the swiftness of his motion, and a horse you know is a swift creature, and therefore somewhat suitable, especially having the emblem of wings upon him. They that would honour the sun as a god for swiftness, would not offer a snail, but a flying horse; so if we honour God for a living God, an active God, let us not offer snails to him, dull, heavy, sluggish services, but quick and lively hearts.

That which the courtiers of Nebuchadnezzar flatteringly said unto him, in the name of God say I to you, "Live for ever." Saith Christ, "As the living Father hath sent me, and I live by the Father; so he that eateth me, even he shall live by me," John vi. 57. Christ was active, exceedingly active, in the work he was sent about; why? because "the living Father sent him:" so let us consider that in all our services and employments it is a living God that sets us about them, and we should be active as Christ was.

I am willing a little to enlarge on this, because of its importance to our present times, and give me leave to do it by telling you what this Christian activeness is.

1. Stay not for company in any good cause. An active spirit will not stay till he see others to accompany him, but if he must go, rather than the cause should fall he will go alone. Mark that saying, Isa. li. 2, "I called Abraham alone, and blessed him." Be not discouraged, if God give thee a zealous spirit, and others will not appear; God calls thee alone, and he will bless thee.

2. When you have company do not lag behind, but be willing to be foremost, rather than any cause of God should suffer by your indolence. Do not wait till others go before you. Hence in Prov. xxx. 31, amongst the goings of many things, the going of the he-goat is said to be very comely; why? because he is accustomed to go before the flock. Those who, out of love to the cause of God, are willing, if they are called to it, to go before the flock, go comely in the eyes of God.

3. Do not forbear the work till all difficulties about it are over. That is a sluggish spirit that will not begin the work, till they can see how all the difficulties about the work are, or may be, removed. You must up and be doing, be doing presently, and fall to work wisely, to prevent and avoid the difficulties that come in it. As those active spirits did, of whom we read in Neh. iv. 17; when they were at work, with one of their hands they wrought, and with the other hand they held a weapon; they did not stay the building of the wall of Jerusalem till all their adversaries were quashed, but immediately began it. This is an active spirit.

4. We must not be active in a sudden mood, and upon a mere flash, and then give over, but in a constant, solid way. Active, yet solid. Many indeed are stirring and active for the present, but are like the flame of a wisp of straw, which makes a noise and a great stir for the present, but soon after there remains nothing but black, dead ashes. But we must be considerably active. Therefore observe, the Scripture saith (speaking of the saints, specially in the time of the gospel) that they are "lively stones," 1 Pet. ii. 5. What! a stone, and yet lively? A stone, of all things, is most dead, and so it is used to describe a dead spirit in the story of Nabal; when Abigail came to tell him of the business of David, "his heart died within him, and he became as a stone." What is this but to show, that though we must be lively and active, yet we must be solid, firm, and substantial in our activeness; and again, that when we are solid, firm, and substantial, yet we must be lively. There are many that know not how to be active solidly, and therefore grow slight and vain in their activity; and many others, striving to be solid and substantial, quickly grow dull; many, through a kind of affected gravity, would forsooth be accounted solid and wise, and so become at last dull, and heavy, and of very little use in the church of God. Take heed of either, and labour to unite both together: that is acceptable to God, to be living stones before him.

Ver. 11. Then shall the children of Judah and the children of Israel be gathered together, and appoint themselves one head, and they shall come up out of the land: for great shall be the day of Jezreel.

Here you have a promise both to Israel and Judah together. Great was the enmity between Judah and Israel heretofore. They worshipped the same God, but in divers manners. Judah worshipped God according to his own institution; and Israel worshipped the same God, but according to their own inventions, as might best suit with their political ends. Bitterness and vexation abounded between these two people, though worshipping the same God; and God here makes it a great matter to bring these two together, that they should be gathered together in one. Here we have the promise: First, that there shall be a union. Secondly, that there shall be a union under one head. Hence

Obs. 1. The enmity of such as seem not to differ much in matters of religion, and yet do differ, is sometimes exceedingly great and bitter. There shall be a union between Judah and Israel, saith God. Here is a mercy, a wonderful work of the Lord. It requires a mighty work of God to reconcile those who differ even but little. It appears it was so between Judah and Israel. 2 Chron. xxviii. 9, the prophet Oded tells the children of Israel, when he came to reprove them after the slaughter committed by them of the children of Judah, "Ye have slain them in a rage that reacheth up unto heaven." What a rage was this! and yet thus the people of Israel were enraged against the people of Judah; yea, they were often more bitter against each other, than they were against the heathen, the Philistines, Assyrians, and Egyptians, who were round about them.

Thus it has been, and until that blessed time come here spoken of, thus it will be. Though the Calvinists and Lutherans agree together against papists in fundamental articles, yet, oh the bitterness of their spirits one against another! A Lutheran is scarce so bitter against a papist as he is against a Calvinist. Luther himself complains,* Not only openly wicked men are our enemies, but even our friends, and those who at first received the doctrine of the gospel from us, persecute us most bitterly. And he complains particularly of Zuinglius; † Zuinglius accuses me of every wickedness and cruelty, so that the papists do not tear me so much as these my friends. Again, speaking of Carlostadius, ‡ He is more deadly against me, more set against me, than any of mine enemies ever were. Even he, whom God used for the furtherance of the gospel, has bitterness to another, with whom he agrees in doctrine.

And has it not been so amongst us? Those who are protestants, and such as are nick-named puritans, though they agree in all the fundamental points against popery, yet for some difference in matter of discipline and ceremonies, oh what bitterness of spirit is there! It is so much the more sinful in those who say that discipline and ceremonies are but indifferent things; they are specially to be blamed for bitterness on their side, because the conscience of the other is bound up, and cannot yield. Yea, not only such as contend against popish discipline, but such as go a degree further in reformation of discipline, yet because they differ in some few particulars, oh the bitterness of spirit that exists even among them! These are times that call all the people of God to see in what they can agree, and in that to join against the common adversary, and not to tear one another by dissensions. God may justly give us over to our adversaries, if we agree not among ourselves, and they may chain us together. Perhaps a prison may make us agree, as it was said of Ridley and Hooper. Ridley opposed Hooper in point of ceremonies, and they could not agree, yet when they came to prison they agreed well enough there. The Lord deliver us from that medicine of our dissensions, that we be not made so to agree; yea, that we be not soldered together by our own blood.

Obs. 2. God has a time to gather Judah and Israel together, that is, to bring peace to his church. God has a time to gather all his churches together, that there shall be a universal peace amongst his churches.

For though it be meant here of Judah and Israel literally, yet Israel and Judah set out to us all the churches of God that shall exist among the Gentiles:

and as God will fulfil this scripture literally, so he will fulfil it spiritually, to bring Judah and Israel, that is, all the churches of God, under one head. "Ephraim shall not envy Judah, and Judah shall not vex Ephraim," Isa. xi. 13. Ephraim envied Judah, because Judah challenged to himself the true worship of God; and Judah on the other side envied Ephraim, because he was the greatest; they were vexing spirits one against another. This shall not always be, saith God, but "the envy of Ephraim shall depart," I will take away this envious, vexatious spirit. Those two staves of which the Holy Ghost speaks in Zech. xi. 10, 11, 14, the staff of "Beauty," and the staff of "Bands," were both broken, but God has a time to unite them together again, and for that, mark that excellent prophecy in Ezek. xxxvii. 16, 17, 22, 24. There you find declared, God brings Judah and Israel, and joins those sticks together again. "Son of man, take thee one stick, and write upon it, For Judah, and for the children of Israel his companions: then take another stick, and write upon it, For Joseph, the stick of Ephraim, and for all the house of Israel his companions: and join them one to another into one stick; and they shall become one in thine hand." And then, ver. 19, this is interpreted of the union of them, "Behold, I will take the stick of Joseph, which is in the hand of Ephraim, and the tribes of Israel his fellows, and will put them with him, even with the stick of Judah, and make them one stick, and they shall be one in mine hand;" and ver. 22, "I will make them one nation in the land upon the mountains of Israel; and one king shall be king to them all." And in the 24th verse that king is said to be David, which we shall afterward show more fully, when we describe the head which they shall be under. Now this God has never yet fulfilled, that the ten tribes, and Judah and Benjamin, should come together and be set in one stick; he has never set together the staff of Bands that was broken, and yet this must be done; it is the great blessing of God upon his churches, the bringing about of this union. Mark that text, Jer. xxxiii. 11; God having promised that in the latter days he would bring Judah and Israel together, and build them as at first: in the 14th verse, "Behold, the days come, saith the Lord, that I will perform that good thing which I have promised unto the house of Israel, and to the house of Judah." What is that good thing that God had promised to the houses of Israel and Judah? That good thing, my brethren, is the building them up together as they were at first. "Behold, how good and how pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity! It is like the precious ointment upon the head, that ran down upon the beard, even Aaron's beard: that went down to the skirts of his garments; as the dew of Hermon, and as the dew that descended upon the mountains of Zion: for there the Lord commanded the blessing, even life for evermore," Psal. exxxxiii. In the churches of God, where this peace and union dwell, there is blessing, there is God commanding blessing, that is, blessing comes powerfully and efficaciously, the blessing of life, and life for evermore. Oh, who would not then love union and peace in the churches! "The Lord shall be king over all the earth: in that day shall there be one Lord, and his name one," Zech. xiv. 9. The churches now have one Lord, they all acknowledge God and Christ to be their Lord; yea, but this Lord has not one name: though they all pretend to honour Christ, and set up Christ, yet this one Lord has many names. But here it is prophesied that there shall be but one Lord, and his name

* Non solum hostes palam impii persequuntur nos, sed etiam hi qui fuerunt dulces amici nostri, qui a nobis acceperunt doctrinam Evangelii, fiunt insensissimii hostes nostros, persequentes nos acerrime.

† Nihil est scelus aut crudelitas, cujus me non reum agat, adeo ut nee papistæ me sic lacerent hostes mei, ut illi amici nostri. Ep. ad Mich. Stifelinum.

‡ Inferosissimi mihi est quatuor ulli hactenus fuerint inimici. Luther ep. ad Spalatinum.

shall be but one. And Zeph. iii. 9, "Then will I turn to the people a pure language, that they may all call upon the name of the Lord, to serve him with one consent." The words in the original are, אחד שכם one shoulder; all the people of God shall have but one shoulder, that they shall set to the service of God. O blessed time, when they shall be so united as to have but one shoulder! And the greater this blessing of Judah's and Israel's gathering together will be, if you consider these two things; I beseech you observe them.

First, that they shall have this perfect union together, even then, when "Israel shall be as the sand of the sea." When there shall be such multitudes flocking to the church, yet then they shall be united in one, and then there shall be peace in the churches. It is not a hard matter, when there are but very few of a church, perhaps half a dozen or half a score, for them to be of one mind, and to agree lovingly together, and to have no divisions nor dissensions among themselves; but when a church grows to be a multitude, then lies the difficulty. When did ever any church, though never so well constituted at first, but increase in divisions and dissensions, as they increased in number and multitude? You find it very hard in a meeting in any society, when any business concerns a great many, so to agree as to be of one and the same mind. An instrument, as a watch, or any thing that has many wheels, is sooner out of frame than that which has but a wheel or two. So when numbers come together about any business, it is mighty hard to bring them to be united in one. There are few families that consist of many persons, but quickly dissensions grow among them: perhaps, where there are two or three in a family they keep well enough together; but where there are seven in a family they cannot so well agree, nor so long a time together, as the seven devils did in Mary Magdalene. But God has made this promise to the church, that though it shall increase as the sand on the sea shore, and that multitudes shall come flocking to it, yet they shall be all gathered together into one, under one head, and they shall have peace.

Secondly, They shall agree in one, not only when they are a multitude, but when they enjoy the full privileges and liberty that Christ has purchased for them, even then there shall be a blessed agreement. For it is spoken here of those times, when they shall come under one head, and Christ alone shall rule them, and not men's inventions. Christ will grant his church those privileges that he has purchased for them, and rule them according to those, and then there shall be a blessed agreement among them all. Men now think it impossible for those liberties to be enjoyed without dissensions; O, say they, let them have but such liberty as they speak of, and we shall have nothing but babbling and divisions. What! shall every man be left to do what he list? why then we shall have nothing but breaches in the church, and heart-burnings one against another. No; Christ has never purchased so much liberty, for every man to do what he lists in things apparently unlawful, against the common principles of religion; in those there may be compulsion. But the liberty which Christ has purchased, is the lawful use of things indifferent, and the lawful use of his ordinances. And though now many think that, in things indifferent, if men be left at their liberty, there will be heart-burning and dissensions, and no peace at all in the church, they are much mistaken in this; for the only way to have true peace in the church, is to leave things as Christ has left them, and to force nothing upon men's consciences that Christ would not have forced; this is the way of peace. And the special way of dissension (we have had experience of it) has been, and ever will be, the urging upon men's consciences those things Christ would not have urged; this makes the greatest rent and division in the church. The urging of uniformity in all indifferent things as necessary to unity, is a most false principle. It is a principle that many have been led by, but it is a false and corrupt principle, and is, and will be found to be, the cause of the greatest distractions.

When the time comes here prophesied of, there shall not be such need of any antichristian chain to unite the servants of God together, but they shall be one without any such doings. It is true, papists and prelatical men cry out against others; they say, there are such divisions among them, none of them can agree, there is more uniformity and unity with us than with them. Mark these two answers to that.

1. They have little cause to boast of their unity, if we consider all; for though many thousands of Christians, and hundreds of faithful, painful, and conscientious ministers of God, (that did more service to God and his church than ever they will do,) be banished out of their country, and put upon miserable extremities, and endure sore afflictions for their conscience's sake, this is no breach of unity with them.

2. But suppose by their power they could have brought all to a uniformity in their own inventions and innovations, as they desired. What then? they have little cause to boast of that unity. Certainly, there the remedy would have been worse than the disease, and work a greater mischief. Their boasting of unity would have been, as if a couple of prisoners chained to a block, and kept close all day, should see others go abroad in the streets at a distance, and should cry out to them, Why do you not take example by us? you keep at a distance one from another; see, we keep close together from morning to night: pray take example by us, and do not go so distant one from another. Would not such an argument be most ridiculous? What is the reason of their union, but their chain? Certainly, there is the same argument in pleading for that uniformity which they force upon men by such a kind of antichristian chain. What breach of unity is it if, in a broad street, one goes a little distant from another? and so what breach is it if, in matters of indifference, one take one way and another another? It is the corrupt and perverse spirits of men that think they cannot have unity, and yet have things as Christ has left them. Christ needs no such things to cause unity in his church, the spirit of his people, which loves truth and peace, is enough to cause the unity he would have. And oh that this gathering together were come, of all churches to be made one, and to be under one head! for abundance of mischief is done now among the churches, and in the world, by the spirit of division and dissension. The devil delights (especially that devil that is the spirit of division) to live in the region of the church. There are some devils especially that are spirits of pride, as the dumb devil, and some of dissension, and some of one kind, and some of another. Cajetan remarks upon Mark v. 8, 9, where our Saviour Christ cast the devils out of the possessed man, they besought him that he would let them enter into the swine, and that he would not send them out of that region; because, saith he, they have several regions where they most haunt, and they that are in such a region are loth to be put out of it, but would fain keep their place. Whether that be so or no we will not say, but this we say, that if there be any region in the world which the unclean spirit of division loves, and is loth to be cast out, it is the region of the church, for there he does the greatest mischief. But Christ has a time to cast this unclean spirit out of the region of the church so effectually, that he never shall return again.

This point, as we meet with it so fitly, and is so fully agreeable to the necessity of our times, I cannot tell, though I go a little beyond the ordinary way of expostitions, how to get away from it.

This union of the church is that which will be the stability of it. You have an admirable place for this, Isa. xxxiii. 20, "Thine eyes shall see Jerusalem a quiet habitation." Oh that our eyes might be blessed to behold Jerusalem a quiet habitation! then we should be willing with old Simeon to say, "Lord, now lettest thou thy servant depart in peace, for mine eyes have seen thy salvation." Mark then what follows: "a quiet habitation, a tabernacle that shall not be taken down; not one of the stakes thereof shall ever be removed, neither shall any of the cords thereof be broken. But there the glorious Lord will be unto us a place of broad rivers and streams, wherein shall go no galley with oars, neither shall gallant ship pass thereby." The kingdoms of the world, though they seem to be built upon mountains, yet God will toss them up and down, and they shall come to nothing; but the church, when it is made a quiet habitation, though it be but a tabernacle and set upon stakes, yet this tabernacle shall not be taken down, nor one of the stakes thereof ever removed; though it be tied by lines, yet not a cord thereof shall be broken. Yea, in this the glory of the church consists, for when it is a quiet habitation, the glory of God shall be there, God shall dwell among them as a glorious God. No church was more honourable than the church of Philadelphia, for that is the church the adversaries must come and bow before, Rev. iii. 9, and that church carries brotherly love in its very name, for so it signifies. Cant. vi. 9, "My dove, my undefiled is but one, the only one of her mother." What follows? "The daughters saw her and blessed her; yea, the queens and the concubines, and they praised her." When Christ's dove and undefiled comes once to be but one, the daughters shall see her and bless her. In Isa. xi. 13, you have a promise of Judah and Ephraim's joining together. Mark what follows, chap. xii. 1, "And in that day thou shalt say, O Lord, I will praise thee." Observe, "in that day." And again, ver. 4, "And in that day shall ye say, Praise the Lord, call upon his name, declare his doings among the people, make mention that his name is exalted. Sing unto the Lord; for he hath done excellent things: this is known in all the earth. Cry out and shout, thou inhabitant of Zion." God indeed does excellent things, when he makes Ephraim and Judah to be one. Therefore saith the apostle, 1 Cor. xii. 31, "Yet show I unto you a more excellent way." What is that way? In the chapter following, he writes his commendation of love, the highest commendation of any grace found in the book of God; that is the more excellent way. In Cant. iii. 9, the church is compared to the chariot of Solomon: "The pillars thereof of silver, the bottom thereof of gold, the covering of it of purple, and the midst thereof being paved with love." Then the church rides in triumph in her chariot, when there is much love and peace in the midst of it.

It is true, my brethren, considering the weakness and peevishness of the spirits, yea, of good men as well as evil, we may wonder however this shall come to pass: Is it possible that this shall ever be so? Indeed it must be a mighty work of God to do it. We must not think to effect it by struggling one with another, and to say, We will make them be at peace and unity, or they shall smart for it, and we will pull them together by law. This will not do it; but we must look up to God for the accomplishing of this great thing. Jer. xxxiii. 3, "Thus saith the Lord, Call unto me and I will answer thee, and show thee great and mighty things which thou knowest not." What are those great and mighty things that we must call upon God for? Amongst others, this is a principal one, ver. 7, "And I will cause the captivity of Judah and the captivity of Israel to return, and will build them as at the first," and so make them both one. And then, ver. 9, "It shall be to me a name of joy, a praise and an honour before all the nations of the earth, when they shall hear all the good that I do unto them." Mark, joy, praise, honour, yea, a name of joy, praise, honour, follows upon this blessed union, and that before all the nations of the earth. For the accomplishing of this, "come, Lord Jesus, come quickly!"

Yet let us further observe the difference between the scattering of the wicked, and the scattering of the saints. Judah and Israel were scattered, but now they shall be gathered together.

Obs. 1. There is a great deal of difference between the scattering of the saints, and the scattering of the wicked. When God scatters the saints, he scatters them that they may be gathered; when he scatters the wicked, he scatters them that he may destroy them. Psal. lxxviii. 1, "Let God arise, let his enemies be scattered." How scattered? "As smoke is driven away, so drive them away." Smoke, you know, is so driven away and scattered, that it comes to nothing. Psal. cxliv. 6, "Cast forth lightning and scatter them, shoot out thine arrows and destroy them." This is the scattering of the wicked. But as for the saints, they may be scattered, but it is to spread abroad the gospel by them in the world. Acts viii. 4, "They that were scattered abroad" (by reason of the persecution of Saul) "went every where preaching the word." But within awhile our God shall come, and all his saints with him, and he will gather together the outcasts of Israel with abundance of mercy. Micah iv. 6, "In that day, saith the Lord, will I assemble her that hath, and I will gather her that is driven out, and her that I have afflicted." Isa. liv. 7, "For a small moment have I forsaken thee, but with great mercies will I gather thee." God will gather his people with great mercies. God has fulfilled this in a great part in our eyes even this day. Many of those who were driven out of their places and country, those that were afflicted, and those the land could not bear, God has gathered together these outcasts of Israel. Let every one take heed how he hinders this work of the Lord, and how he adds affliction to those that have been afflicted.

Obs. 2. The more the gospel prevails, the more peace there shall be. They shall "be gathered together," that is, in the time of the gospel, when that shall prevail, then Judah and Israel shall be gathered together.

The gospel is not the cause of divisions, of seditions, of factions. No; it is a gospel of peace, the Prince of it is a Prince of peace, the embassy of it is an embassy of peace. It is next to blasphemy, if not blasphemy itself, to say that since the preaching and profession of the gospel we have had no peace, but it causes factions and divisions among the people. People who are in the dark sit still and quiet together, as it is said of the Egyptians, when they were in the dark for those three days together, they stirred not from their seats, there was no noise among them; shall the light be blamed, because afterward, when it came, every one stirred and went, one way, and another another? So when we were in gross darkness, we saw nothing, we knew nothing; now light begins to break forth, and one searches after one truth, and another after another, and yet we cannot attain to perfection; shall we accuse the light for this? Yea, but we see too apparently that those who seem the strictest of all, that would worship God (as they say) in the purest manner in his ordinances; yet there are woful divisions and distractions even amongst them. How then is the gospel a gospel of peace?

Consider this one reason in answer to this, to satisfy your consciences, that the gospel may not be blamed, for indeed where the gospel comes there is promised peace. Because so long as we are here we are partly flesh and partly spirit. Those who have the gospel prevail with their consciences, cannot move any further than they can see light for, and their consciences will give them leave. But other men have more liberty, they quarrel not one with another; why? because they have wide, elastic consciences: having ends of their own, they will yield to any thing to attain those ends; so that here they have this advantage, that if they see contention will bring them more trouble than they conceive the thing is worth, they will descend, though it be against the light of conscience; whilst others upon whom the light of the gospel has prevailed, have that bond upon conscience, that though all the world should differ from them, they must be content to lie down and suffer; they cannot yield; though you would give them all the world, they cannot go against that light. They may search, and it may trouble them that their apprehensions of things should be different from the apprehensions of their brethren, and that they cannot yield to that to which their brethren yield. It is true they should be humbled, and suspect their hearts, and look to themselves, and fall down before God and pray, and use all means for advice and counsel, and consider of things again and again. But suppose they have done all this, and yet the Lord does not reveal to them any further light, though it be a sad affliction to them, yet they must lie down under it, for they cannot yield; one known truth is more to them than all the world; therefore, unless others will bear with them in their infirmity, they will suffer whatever men will lay upon them.

The world calls this obstinacy, and stiffness, and being wedded to their own opinion; but they know it is otherwise, and can appeal to God and say, Lord, thou knowest what a sad affliction it is unto me, that I cannot see what my brother sees, and that I cannot yield to what my brother yields: thou hast hid it from me: I will wait upon thee till thou shalt reveal it; and in the mean time I will be quiet, and not make disturbance in the places where I come, but pray, pray, pray for light, and that thou wouldst incline the heart of my brethren unto me, that they may not have hard thoughts of me. Do but thus, thou shalt have peace with God, and in thine own heart.

If we would have light let into us, we must so prize it, as to be willing that in the discussion of truths there should be some hazard of differences in lesser things. If a man have a house closed on every side with a thick brick wall, and he is so desirous to keep his house safe and strong, that he will rather all his days sit in the dark, than be at the trouble to have a hole digged or a few bricks broken to let in any light, we should accuse that man of folly. It is true, we must not be so desirous of light, as to break so much of the wall as to endanger the house, we must keep that safe; but yet it is difficult to let in light without taking away some bricks, and occasioning some trouble. A child, when he sees the workman with his tools breaking the wall, and making a deal of rubbish, thinks he is pulling down the house; but a wise man knows it is but a little trouble for the present, to let in light that shall be for the beauty of the house afterward.

Agreement in error is far worse than division for the sake of truth. Better to be divided from men that are erroneous, than to agree with them in the ways of their error. A company gathered without the covenant of peace, without the observance of God's law, is a headless multitude, says Bernard, it has much of Babylon, but little of Jerusalem.

Obs. 3. As soon as any are converted to the faith, they are of a gathering disposition. They desire to gather to the saints immediately. Every child of God is a gatherer; as Solomon is called Ecclesiastes, in the Greek, but the Hebrew word is interpreted by some, a soul gathered, because it is in the feminine gender. None in the world love good fellowship so much as the saints of God. They fly as doves to their windows, and doves you know fly in great flocks, thousands together. The more spiritual any one is, of the more joining and uniting nature he is. Thousands of beams of the sun will meet together in one, better than the beams of a candle. In the apostles' times, when men were converted, it is said, they "were added to the church," they gathered presently. So, in Isa. lxvi. 20, it is observable: "They shall bring all your brethren for an offering unto the Lord out of all nations upon horses, and in chariots, and in litters." How comes this? Those who dwell a great way off shall not make that their excuse for not joining the people of God, it is a great journey; no, but there are horses to be got. But it may be some cannot ride? Then get chariots. But some, perhaps, are so weak that they can neither ride on horses nor in chariots. Then they will get litters; and litters you know are to carry weak and sick persons. This shows the intention of spirit in the people of God to be gathered to the church, either to be carried on horses, or in chariots, or in litters, one way or other they will come and join themselves to the people of God. For there is the presence of Christ, and the protection of Christ, and the communication of Christ in their union and communion, and "Where-soever the body is, thither will the eagles be gathered together." Oh they love a life to be going towards Zion, gathering one to another, as in Psal. lxxxiv. 7, "They go from strength to strength, every one of them in Zion appeareth before God." "From strength to strength," that is, thus: from one place of the country perhaps there come half a score, or twenty, to go toward Zion, and perhaps before they come to such a town or turning they meet with half a score more, and so they grow stronger; when they are a mile or two farther perhaps they meet with another town coming, and they join presently and are stronger; and so they go from strength to strength comfortably together till they come before God in Zion.

"They shall appoint themselves one head." Although they are multitudes, and are as the sand of the sea, yet this is no great matter, unless they come under one head, and a right head too. Multitudes are not a sufficient argument of truth. A multitude coming under one Head, under Christ as one Head, they are the true church. The papists give universality as the mark of the church, that there are so many papists in the world.

But, 1. We must not regard how many the people are, but under what head they are: they shall be gathered under one head: look to the head they follow; for St. Paul tells us, that there shall be an apostacy before the revelation of that man of sin, 2 Thess. ii. 3. And Rev. xiii. 3, "All the world wondered after the beast:" and ver. 2, "The dragon gave him his power, and his seat, and great authority:" and Rev. xvii. 1, "The great whore that sitteth upon many waters;" and, ver. 15, these "many waters" are interpreted to be "peoples, and multitudes, and nations, and tongues." The whore sits upon them, that is, uses them vilely and basely; sits upon the very consciences of them in a base manner. And who does she sit upon? Upon peoples and multitudes. It is not an argument then of a true church, though they are multitudes, though they are as the sand of the sea, though they are gathered together, for they must be gathered under one head, under Christ.

2. Neither is unity a sufficient argument of the verity of the church. They shall be gathered together, they shall be joined together in one way, with one consent; but if it be not under one head, they are like Simeon and Levi, brethren in iniquity. It is not enough that we are one, unless we are one in Christ; and that is a blessed union: for there shall be much unity under antichrist. "These have one mind, and they shall give their power and strength unto the beast," Rev. xvii. 13. And chap. xviii. 5, "her sins have reached unto heaven." Their sins cleave together, and so get up to heaven. Here is a union of persons, and a union of sins amongst them. The Turks have as little dissension in their religion as any; they are all united in one. But well may that garment have no seam, that has no shape. Look at Psal. lxxxiii. 5, "They have consulted together with one consent, they are confederate against thee." There are two or three things exceedingly observable in this psalm about the union of the wicked: First you have ten countries join together against the church; ver. 6—8, "The tabernacles of Edom, and the Ishmaelites; of Moab, and the Hagarenes; Gebal, and Ammon, and Amalek; the Philistines with the inhabitants of Tyre; Assur also is joined with them: they have holpen the children of Lot." And it was not by accident that they joined, but in a deliberate way, "they consulted together," and not only consulted together, but consulted together "with one consent," or heartily, for יחדו לב which is translated there, with one consent, signifies, with heart together, their very heart was in the consultation; but mark, it was "against thy hidden ones," so ver. 3. Let them consult together, let ten of them consult together, and consult with their hearts, yet the saints are God's hidden ones. "They shall surely gather together, but not by me: whosoever shall gather together against thee shall fall for thy sake," Isa. liv. 15. My brethren, peace, though we should all desire it, yet not at too costly a price; peace is too chargeable when it costs us the loss of any truth. Take heed of any such costly peace: "Though hand join in hand" together in wickedness, yet they "shall not be unpunished," Prov. xvi. 5. And Nahum i. 10, "While they are folded together as thorns, they shall be devoured as stubble fully dry." Wicked men are as thorns to prick the people of God, yea, they are thorns folded together, there is a peace amongst them: yet, though they be folded together, they shall be devoured, they shall be devoured even in their folding. The division that comes by truth is better than the union that comes by error. It is a notable speech of Luther, Rather than any thing should fall of the kingdom of Christ and his glory, let not only peace go, but let heaven and earth go too: we should love peace, yet peace and truth better.

*U*n sine federe pacis, sive observantia legis, sive disciplina et regimine, Accephala multitudo congregata fuerit, non est civitas sed confusio, Ecclesiarum exarbit. Hieronymus in matrem nihil habet. Bern. Ser. 5. de dedie. Eccles.

What is this "head?"

I find both the Jews and divers of the ancients, Theodoret, Cyril, and others, would make this head to be Zerubbabel, and only to have reference to the return of the people from their Babylonish captivity. But this certainly cannot be, for these two reasons, to name no more.

First, Because both Israel and Judah are here to join together and to return out of the land: there it was Judah, and not the ten tribes, that were delivered from their captivity.

Secondly, Compare this scripture with others, and we shall find that Zerubbabel cannot be meant. In Ezek xxxiv. and xxxvii., we have expressions such as plainly appear that they are but comments upon this text of Hosea (for Ezekiel prophesied after Hosea): and especially in the 37th chapter we have a prophecy of the union of all the tribes together, Judah and Israel; and ver. 24, "David my servant shall be king over them;" and ver. 25, "My servant David shall be their prince for ever." The one head which they shall have when they come together shall be David. And so in chap. xxxiv. 23, "I will set one shepherd over them, and he shall feed them, even my servant David;" and ver. 24, "I the Lord will be their God, and my servant David a prince among them." That head then that they shall have shall be David, not Zerubbabel. Now by David we are to understand Christ clearly, for in other places, as in Isa. lv. 3, "I will make an everlasting covenant with you, even the sure mercies of David," they can only be meant of the sure mercies of Christ; and so it is interpreted by St. Paul, Acts xiii. 34. Therefore, then, we conclude certainly this is meant of Christ; they shall appoint Christ to be their Head.

This is then the first great point in this text, a head-point of divinity indeed, that Jesus Christ is the Head of the church. And, secondly, he shall be so appointed.

Obs. Jesus Christ is the Head of the church, and shall appear so hereafter, further than now he doth.

The church is not a headless multitude, it is a community of saints who have a glorious Head. That body cannot be contemptible that has a Head so honourable. It is he that is the brightness of his Father's glory, in whom "all fulness dwells," yea, "the fulness of the Godhead bodily." It is he by whom all things consist, that is the beginning of all things. It is he that is the Head of angels themselves: "Ye are complete in him, which is the Head of all principality and power," Col. ii. 10.

1. He is the Head of angels; how?

(1.) Because the angels are joined together with the church, and are part of the church triumphant, and so Christ is their Head.

(2.) Yea, the angels have influence from him. That grace which they have from God, which is beyond naturals, is from Christ, for Christ is canalis gratiae, the channel of grace from God. Their establishment in their condition is from Christ, for it is not due to them in a natural way; yea, the glory they shall have in joining with the church is above that which is due to their natural state, and all that is from Christ.

2. He is the Head of all men; "the Head of every man is Christ," 1 Cor. xi. 3. "The Head of every man;" how? What! are all men in the world the body of Christ? if he be the Head, then it seems they are all the members. No, though Christ be the Head of angels, yet angels are not said to be members of him; yea, in the same place of the Corinthians, God is said to be the head of Christ, and yet Christ is not a member of God. So that he may be the Head of every man, and yet every man not a member of Christ. He is the Head of every man in regard of that superiority that Christ has over every man, and some kind of influence even from Christ comes to every man; he enlighteneth every man that cometh into the world.

3. Yea, he that is the Head of his church, is the Head of all things; "God hath given him to be the Head over all things to the church," Eph. i. 22. Mark it, it is a most admirable place, that Christ is "the Head of all things." But how? "To the church," for the sake of the church, as aiming at the good of the church especially.

(1.) It is the honour of the church to have such a Head, who is the brightness of his Father's glory, the Head of angels, the Head of every man, the Head of all things for the good of his church.

(2.) He is their Head because he is their strength. Christ is the Head of the church in regard of the strength that the church has by him. An oppressed multitude cannot help itself if they have no head, but if God shall please to give them strength and a head, and that in a legal way, if they have hearts they may deliver themselves from oppression, this God has done for us; if therefore God does not vote us to misery and slavery, if we be not a people given up of God to ruin, we may have help. The church is a communion of saints oppressed here in the world; their strength is in heaven, in their Head, who has received all power to exercise it for them; to him they cleave, for him they bless God, even the Father, because he is their strength.

Poetus quam aliquid regno Christi, et gloriae eius decedat, ruat non solum pax, sed caelum et terra. Luther.

(3.) He is their Head, because the saints hold all upon Christ; all that they have they hold in Capite, as the best tenure of all. The tenure upon which the saints hold all their comfort, all their good in this world, is in another way than other men hold it: other men have what they have through the bounty and patience of God; but the saints hold all in Capite, in their Head, in Christ, in the right they have in him.

(4.) He is their Head, because their safety is in him: though all the members of the church be under water, yet all is safe when the head is above water; our Head is in heaven. Luther said he was even as a devil to some, they so violently accused him; but let Christ live and reign.

Christ is above, the head is above water.

(5.) He is their Head in regard of his compassion to his church and people. The meanest member here, if wronged, Christ is sensible of it. When but the toe is trodden upon, the head cries, Why do you hurt me? Christ the Head cries, "Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou me?" And observe, the meaneer and the poorer the members of Christ are here in the church, the more is Christ sensible of their sorrows and afflictions, and the more will he appear for them, when he shall appear a Head yet more gloriously than ever he has done. Ezek. xxxiv. 16—26, is very notable. You find there, Christ is said to be "one shepherd" to his people, and "a prince" to them; but mark what is promised, That he will "bring again that which was driven away, and will bind up that which was broken, and will strengthen that which was sick: but he will destroy the fat and the strong, and feed them with judgment.—And he will judge between cattle and cattle, between the rams and the he-goats.—He will judge between the fat cattle and the lean cattle; because ye have thrust with side and with shoulder, and pushed all the diseased with your horns, till ye have scattered them abroad." When Christ shall appear, he will not show such respect to the brave, stout, jolly spirits of those that were in the church, who thought to carry all before them with force. No; he will look to the poor of the flock; and those that thrust with the side, and pushed with the horns, and scattered the poor and the lean, they shall be judged.

My brethren, have you not known times when stout-hearted and cruel men have thrust with the side, and pushed with the horn, and scattered up and down in divers countries, thousands of weak and tender-conscience Christians? Well, but here is a promise, that Christ our Head will come, and he shall be one Shepherd, and he shall show his tender affection toward the poor afflicted of the flock, he shall take away from the land the evil beasts, as you have it there in the 25th verse. He is the Head in regard of his compassion.

(6.) Christ is their Head in regard of guidance and direction. The body is to be moved and guided by the head; so all truths, all doctrines of religion, must hold on Christ. Col. ii. 19, the apostle, rebuking worshipping of angels and other false opinions, saith, that they did not hold the head. All doctrines in the church therefore must hold the Head, and must not be obtruded upon the church, but as they come from the Head, and hold there.

(7.) And that principally, and upon which we must stay a while, which is most of all intended in the text, Christ is their Head in regard of his rule and government; and therefore he that is called "one head" here, is called "a prince" in those two forenamed chapters, Ezek. xxxiv. and xxxvii. It would spend time needlessly, to show you in Scripture how governors are called heads, that I suppose you are all acquainted with. This, therefore, is the main thing that we are now to open, how Christ is the Head of the church in regard of his rule and government. There are many things of importance in this point. I shall desire to decline, what possibly I may, all things that are controversial, especially with our brethren, and only speak of what I think for the present you are fit to bear.

There are four things, especially of the government of Christ in his church, for which he is to be accounted the Head.

1. All offices and officers in the church hold upon Christ, and are from him as from the Head. As in a civil body, the offices of a civil state hold of the king, hold upon him in a legal way; the power of the king being regular, it regulates all power in all other officers; that which is done, is done in the name of the king. So all the officers and offices in the church are in the name of Christ, they all hold on him. There can be no officer nor offices in the church, but such as Christ himself has appointed, for they must be by institution. I beseech you observe the difference between officers in a civil state, and officers in a church.

(1.) A civil state, because it reaches only to the outward man, has liberty to appoint what officers it please, according to the rules of prudence and justice; and more or less, according to the necessity of the country and place. But it is not so in the church, there we have no liberty to go according to the rules of prudence, merely to erect any office because we think it may make for the good and peace of the church. I say, therefore, to erect any new office not established before in the word, we have no liberty, we cannot do it, we are too bold if we attempt it, for such an office will not hold of the Head. In the state, none can erect new offices, new courts, but by the supreme legislative power; so in the church, none can erect new offices, but only from the Head. In the civil state, God leaves a great deal of liberty; there may be change of officers, those that are good now, perhaps, may seem not so fit afterwards, and those in one country may not be so fit for another. But for the officers of the church, they must be all the same in all places, where they can be had, and no more than those appointed by Christ.

(2.) The civil state may limit their officers as they think fit. They may choose one into an office, he shall have power but in so many things; this shall be the object of his power, when he is come hither there he shall stop; though he that was before him had more power, yet he that comes after him may not have that power, the civil state may limit that, if it see fit. But in the church state it cannot be so; and upon this ground, because they hold upon the Head. Indeed the men that bear any office in the church, are designed to it by the church, but they do not hold of the church, they hold of Christ the Head; therefore it is not in the power of the church to limit them being in it, but they must go to the word, for their office once taken upon them, whether it be the office of teachers or of pastors, they cannot then be limited by any power, but what the word saith is the office of a teacher or of a pastor: they cannot have the rule so propounded to them, as, You shall go but thus far, and you shall do so much of the office of a teacher and no more; but when they are once in, they are in without any limitation of the power of their office; it is only from Christ the Head.

(3.) In a civil state there may be alteration, raising the dignity of the office, and making it lower than before; but in the church no such thing, the officers of the church are always the same, no raising, no depressing; why? because they hold upon the Head. Others depend upon man's prudence, but these are institutions by Christ, and hold of the Head.

2. Christ is the Head in regard of rule, because all ordinances, laws, and institutions hold upon him. It is not in the liberty of man to erect any new spiritual ordinance in the church, no nor to make spiritual laws in the church, for the government of the spirits of men. No new ordinance, no new institution, can be in the church. In the civil state there may be thousands of new institutions.

I call that an institution that has an efficacy in it for attaining such an end by virtue of the institution, not by virtue of any naturalness in the thing. As for example, to instance in Divine institutions: The sacrament is an institution, and therefore there is a virtue, a spiritual efficacy, to be expected from that and by that, through the strength of the institution, more than it has in it in any natural way. So in preaching the word, and ecclesiastical censures, there is more to be expected, more efficacy to work upon the soul, for the spiritual man, by virtue of the institution, than there is in the natural things that are done there. So for laws: Christ makes a law in the church, it being an institution, there is to be expected a spiritual efficacy and virtue to go with that thing which Christ commands, beyond what it had before it was commanded. Now then, in this way, no man in the world can make any church institution, no, nor law for the church, so as to appoint any thing, to have any spiritual efficacy by virtue of that institution, beyond what it has in a natural way. We must take heed of being so bold, that when Christ has made an institution, an ordinance, and revealed it to us, for us to think we may imitate Christ, and make another ordinance, or another institution, like that; because Christ has done so, because we find such a thing in the word, therefore we may do so too. No, this is too bold, this is to set our post by God's post, for which the Lord charged the people, Ezek. xliii. 8. In Isa. xxxiii. 22, it is said, "The Lord is our judge, the Lord is our lawgiver, the Lord is our king" in this thing.

We are to consider that there are some things belonging to the church (I beseech you observe) common with all other societies; and therefore they have that which belongs to them, natural and civil, concerning which laws may be made: there the power of man may come in, there the rule of prudence may order things. Those things, I say, that belong to the church, that yet are not so peculiarly the church's, but belong to other societies, there man's reason may come in. As for instance: First, a church is a spiritual society and community, they must meet together, and if they do meet, they must meet in some place: this is common to all societies in the world, if they will meet, they must meet in a place. Yea, Secondly, if they meet in a place, this place must be determined where it shall be. This also is common to all societies. Thirdly, this likewise is common to them with all other societies, that what they do in that place, must be done decently and in order. As if many things are to be done, one thing must be before another, one thing must not exclude another; if they come together, they must come together as befitting men in a decent way. Therefore that rule of the apostle, "Let all things be done decently and in order," is not properly an institution, it is nothing but the dictate of right reason; so that if we had never found such a maxim in Scripture, it had been a truth that we were bound in conscience to observe. Again, if men will come and meet together, it is natural and common to all societies, that they should be decent in their garments and otherwise.

But then you will say, When is it an institution proper only to Christ, with which none must meddle?

Thus, when any man shall by virtue of any law, or imposition, put more efficacy in an institution for the worship of God, than God or nature has done, this we call sinful.

As for instance, (1.) Suppose we instance only garments. That all who meet together in Christian as-semblies, ministers and others, should meet in decent garments, the light of nature tells us; and there may be law, if men will be refractory, to compel them so to meet. But now, if we say, such a garment shall be decent for God's worship because it is appointed, whereas if it were not appointed, it would not be decent at all; then I say all the decency does not depend upon what God has put into it, or what is natural to it, but merely upon the institution of man. For some kind of garments, if men were left to their freedom, and there were no institution, would not be decent to wear; if it would not be decent, then it seems it is the institution that puts all honour upon them, and more than nature, or the God of nature, has put upon them.

2. There is more put upon a thing, than nature hath put into it, when there shall be expected, by virtue of an institution, some kind of spiritual efficacy to work upon the soul; then it is sinful. As thus, when that creature, by virtue of the institution and appointment, shall be made, esteemed, or accounted more effectual to stir up my mind, or to signify such a thing, to purity or holiness, than another creature that has as much in it naturally to signify the same thing, and to stir up my mind; this is to imitate God's institution, which is too much boldness in any man.

As, when God appoints a thing in his church, a ceremony or the like, he will take something that has a resemblance, to put men in mind of such a holy thing, that has some kind of metaphor or likeness in it. But when God has taken this creature and separated it from others, this creature must be expected to have more efficacy to signify the thing to my soul, and to stir up my soul to think of this holiness, than any creature in the world, not so appointed, though other creatures have as much in them naturally to do it. This is God's institution. Now man's institution, that comes near to God's, where there is a setting our post by his post, is when man shall take one creature from thousands of others, and all those thousands have as much in them naturally, and put into them by God, to remind me of holiness, and to stir up my heart; but this creature shall be separated from the rest, and by virtue of an institution put upon it, there shall be expected more efficacy in this to stir up my mind, and to draw my heart nearer to God, than other creatures, that only do it in a natural way. This, I say, is intrenching upon that which belongs to the government of Christ.

Therefore I beseech you, my brethren, be not mistaken in this, because I know you are ordinarily led by that speech of the apostle, "Let all things be done decently and in order." Understand it aright: it is true we must do so, and it is a sin not to do things decently and in order, in the worship of God; but this does not at all countenance any institution of man, to draw the heart nearer to God, or God nearer to the heart, by virtue of man's separation of it from common use.

I might instance other things, such as places: that there should be a convenient place for God's worship, the light of nature will tell us; but when any man shall set one place aside separated from another, and shall make the worship of God to be better, and have more efficacy to draw men nearer to God, or God nearer to men, than another place that has as much natural decency and fitness in it as that place has; then it has evil in it.

By these few instances you may judge of all things, when they come to be institutions in God's worship, and beyond the rule of the apostle, "Let all things be done decently and in order." This is the second thing of Christ's government, that all ordinances, all laws in the church, must hold on him the Head.

3. Those laws which Christ makes for the ordering and government of his church, not only hold on him as the Head, but have such a virtue and efficacy in them as coming from the Head, that they bind the consciences of men. Because they come from him who is the Head of the church, they lay bonds upon consciences, and that primarily, and more efficaciously than any law of any man in the world can. Yea, they lay such a bond upon conscience, that though a thing be commanded that has no other reason for the command but merely the will of Christ, and that we cannot see to what good the thing tends, but merely because Christ will have it, yet we are bound to obey, yea, and that in secret; yea, so far as the rule goes, we are bound to do what is required by it, though we should suffer never so much prejudice to ourselves. Here is the binding power of Christ in binding conscience. But no law of man can in this way bind conscience.

But what will you say then to that text of Scripture, which I suppose is in every one of your thoughts, and would be ready in every one of your mouths if you were from the assembly, "Let every soul be subject unto the higher powers; for there is no power but of God, the powers that be are ordained of God. Whosoever therefore resisteth the power, resisteth the ordinance of God; and they that resist shall receive to themselves damnation," Rom. xiii. 1, 2. Yea, "ye must needs be subject, not only for wrath, but also for conscience sake," ver. 5. This text seems to imply that the laws of men do bind the conscience; and we find how this is urged by many, so that there is no institution of man whatever, (except we can apparently show it is contrary to the word of God,) but they think by virtue of this text the consciences of men are bound; they do not submit to authority, they sin against their consciences. Many men will jeer at those who are so conscientious in God's commands about those which seem to be but little things (and in themselves are little things); O, they dare not disobey because they are bound in conscience; they will jeer at the scrupulosity of their consciences. But when it comes to man's commands, then they must obey in the least thing, whatever it be; though in its own nature it be never so indifferent, yet they must obey for conscience sake.

I shall desire, as fully and as clearly as I am able, to satisfy conscience in this very thing. To open therefore that scripture unto you:

First, You must observe, that every one is bound to be subject to the higher powers. Mark, it is not to the man first, but it is to the power, "Let every soul be subject unto the higher powers," wherever this power lies. It is not to the will of a man that has power, but it is to the power of that man. Now the power, the authority, is that which man has in a legal way. That first must be understood.

Secondly, We must consider in what they must be subject. The laws of men are of three sorts.

Some perhaps command that which is simply unlawful, to which we all yield the Scripture does not bind us to be subject; there "we must obey God rather than man." Others command things that are lawful; and they are of two sorts.

Either such things as tend, by the rules of justice and prudence, to the good of the community of which we are members; and there we are bound to obey for conscience sake. But still this is not according to that obedience we owe to Christ our Head, it is secondary, not primary, because commanded by man: and then, because there exists a law of Christ to us, to walk and live according to the rules of justice and prudence; so we are bound for conscience in those things, but not primarily, and so they cannot be said to bind conscience, as Christ's laws do.

There are other things which are commanded by man, (and that especially concerns our question,) and these are such things as indeed are neither here nor there for the public good. The good of the community does not at all depend upon them, and there is nothing in them but merely the satisfaction of the will of those who are in authority. Now here is the question, how far those laws bind men, and bind conscience? Indeed many poor Christians who are conscientious have been extremely snared in these things.

To that I answer, that though such things should be commanded to be done, yet if they be not done, (so that they are not omitted out of contempt, nor so as to bring scandal upon the authority that enjoins them, and those that omit them patiently and willingly submit to what punishment the law of the land shall require,) in such things a man's conscience shall not, nor need not, bind him over to answer before God, that he has sinned against that rule.

You will say, How do you prove that? How doth it appear? I will make it appear from the nature of subjection required in the text, and from reason.

First, this text, Rom. xiii. 4, gives this as the ground why we are to be subject, "For he is the minister of God to thee for good." So that that which is the special ground of our subjection is, because they that are in place are ministers for our good. But here is then an abuse of their power, if they command what does not tend to the good of the public, but merely the satisfaction of their own minds.

But suppose it to be an abuse, the text saith we must be subject.

Mark, therefore, the text saith not, you must do the thing for conscience sake; (I beseech you observe it;) it saith, ἀντί τινος ὑποτάσσασθετα, you must be subject, we must not resist, but be subject; the meaning is, we must be subordinate for conscience sake. Here is all that is required, that I must be subordinate and not resist, that is, if there be a thing commanded by authority, though this authority should be abused, yet I may not resist, I must be subject. If then out of that reverent respect I have to authority, though I do not the thing, yet I do not forbear out of contempt: it is a thing exceedingly prejudicial unto me, and it is not for the common good, but yet I am so careful that authority shall not be despised that I will keep it secret, I will not refuse to do it so as shall be a scandal unto authority. And yet further, if authority shall so far urge upon me as to inflict punishment because I do it not, I will patiently bear it. Now when these three things are done, here is that subordination to authority which the apostle in that scripture requires.

And the reason why this of necessity must be granted, is, because otherwise all that Christian liberty of which the Scripture so much speaks, may be utterly taken away in the practice, and be in the power of man wholly to deprive us of it. This scripture cannot be so understood, that all the liberty we have in things in their own nature indifferent, should be so under the power of men, as that we for the practice, and for our consciences too, must be tied, that we cannot have liberty, no, not in secret. Certainly, that is against the judgment of all orthodox divines of the Reformed churches.

But it may be said, Who shall be judge whether things tend to the public good or not? will you take upon you to judge yourself? To that the answer is plain, that indeed those who are appointed by law have the power to judge legally and authoritatively, to judge so as to bind others. But every man has liberty so far as concerns his own act to judge at his peril. And that a twofold peril. First at his peril, lest he, judging himself, should sin against God in this, that he should judge that not good for the public which indeed is good; that he should perhaps judge that to be of an indifferent nature that justice and prudence require of him. Here he misjudges at his peril, he sins against the Lord, against the rules of justice and prudence, and endangers his own soul if he go amiss. Secondly, if he misjudge, it is at his peril by the laws of men, as he is in danger then to suffer what the laws of men shall inflict upon him. And so submitting this way, his conscience may have some ease; and yet no gap open at all to liberty, or any disturbance to any lawful authority. This is necessary for men to know, that they may understand aright how to answer that question about laws binding of conscience. You hear it is the prerogative of Christ our Head, so to be our lawgiver, as to lay bonds upon conscience in such a manner as no man can do the like. That is the third.

4. Christ is the Head of the church, say some, even personally, so as to come and rule in the world in a glorious manner, personally. They think this may be interpreted, that Christ shall be a Head, that he shall come personally, and rule and govern things even in this world. As Christ in his own person exercised his priestly and prophetic offices, so they think in his own person he shall exercise his kingly power and office. Which opinion, because the further discussion of it I suppose generally you are not able to bear yet, therefore in modesty I will forbear; and though out of modesty I shall for the present forbear, yet out of conscience I dare not altogether deny it, but so we will leave it, to see what truth may be in it. We must expect to have light let in by degrees.

In these four things then we have the rule of Christ, three determined of, the fourth only propounded, about which Christ in time will show further light. Christ is then the Head.

Now from all this there follows three consequences that are very useful.—That seeking after the right government of Christ in his church is not a light matter, it concerns the headship of Christ.—By what has been said, we may learn to know what is properly antichristian, and what not;—and we shall come to have light how far the king may be said to be head of the church. In these things you will find it needful for conscience to be informed, and I shall carry them on too, I hope, with modesty, fullness, and safety.

1. I say it follows from hence, that it is not a light matter to seek after the right government of Christ in his church, it concerns the headship of Christ in a special manner. There are some other things in which the headship of Christ consists, which perhaps may be spoken of hereafter, but in this place especially that. In the primitive times, the greatest contention was about the doctrines of religion, what doctrines should hold upon Christ and what not, and the people of God suffered most for contending about them. They would not receive a doctrine but what held on Christ; and what was obtruded upon them, not holding upon Christ the Head, they rejected. And Luther upon this place saith how much the church in after-time suffered for this very thing; What kind of dangers environed the church, and do environ it for acknowledging Christ to be the Head, these our times sufficiently testify. And further, because we preach Christ to be the whole Head, therefore we are subject to anathemas, and to all kinds of punishment. In these latter times, it is likely that the great contention will be, rather about the headship of Christ in the point of his government, than in the other, the other being so clear unto us; and the sufferings of the people of God will be so much the more grievous, because this is accounted such a little thing, such a poor business. And rather, because this does not seem to be altogether so clearly revealed in the Scripture, as other doctrinal points that hold upon Christ the Head. Christ has so disposed of things, that this should not be so clearly revealed, because he intended to suffer antichrist to rise to his height: and it cannot be imagined, if the doctrine of Christ's government in his church had been clearly and demonstratively laid down, so as there could have been no gain-saying it, how it is possible for antichrist to have risen to the height he has attained. But the nearer the time comes for antichrist to fall, the more clearly this shall be revealed.

2. By this we may learn, what to account antichristianism, and what not. For there are many amongst us, who cry out against every thing that displeases them, that it is antichristianism, and yet understand but very little what antichristianism is. But by what has been said, you must know that antichristianism is not every error. It is true, in a large sense antichrist is as much as against Christ, and so every sin, every error, is against Christ, and is antichristianism, if you take it so. But you are to know the Scripture speaks of antichrist, and of antichristianism, in a special acceptation. What is that?

Antichristianism is that which shall oppose Christ as a Head, and set up another headship; this is the peculiarity of antichrist and antichristianism.

First, Whoever shall obtrude any doctrine upon the church, to be believed by his own authority, he is guilty of antichristianism; not whoever shall preach or hold an error in the church. But when any shall presume to obtrude upon the church any doctrine that holds upon human authority, to be urged by the authority of those that impose it, this, I say, is properly antichristianism, for it opposes Christ in his headship. Secondly, The intrusion of such offices and officers in the church, as merely belong to the spiritual man, such as are properly church offices, that do not hold upon Christ the Head, but only hold upon men, this is antichristianism. Thirdly, The imposing of any ordinance, any new institutions, upon the church, belongs to antichristianism. Fourthly, The imposing of laws so to bind conscience as the laws of Christ do, here is antichristianism.

Not only because these things are directly against the headship of Christ, but because these things set up another head; and so the word antichrist may signify as well for one to be instead of Christ (for so ἀντι, the Greek, signifies, sometimes as well for, as against; as, of his fullness we receive grace for grace, it is χάρις ἀντι χάριτος, grace for grace). So antichrist is one that shall claim to himself that headship which is proper unto Jesus Christ, and not to be communicated to any from Jesus Christ.

Now the apostle saith that there were many antichrists in his time, and this mystery of iniquity did work then; but now it grows to a great height in that great antichrist of Rome, for (you know) in these four special things he is the antichrist: Because he obtrudes doctrines, articles of faith, upon the church by his own authority. He makes all offices of the church to hold on him; and appoints laws, ordinances, and institutions likewise to hold on him. He claims the binding of consciences, which is proper only to Jesus Christ. All those who hold thus on antichrist, and are his abettors in these things, are guilty of this great sin of antichristianism.

3. The third consequence. You say Christ is the Head, but you know the king is called the head of the church; in what sense are we to understand that? or how may we come to understand aright the oath of supremacy?

These things (my brethren) are necessary for information of conscience, and the burden lies upon us to make them out as clearly unto you as we can, that you may go along with the more freedom of spirit and conscience in your way, and yet give every one their right too. You are to know, therefore, that the oath of supremacy came into England thus: In the time of popery, the pope claimed to himself the headship of the church : he being excluded, then came in that oath to acknowledge the king or queen the head of the church. But now you must know, first, that this title, The head of the church, as it has been attributed to the king, has been much abused, and has given some advantage to our adversaries ; for the king is not the head of the church, neither as Christ is, nor as the pope claimed it.

Not as Christ is. Christ is the Head to govern unlimitedly. No limits or bounds are set to the government of Christ, but only his own will. No prince in the world is so the head to govern. But all governors have a twofold limit ; they are limited by the laws of God, and by the laws of man.

Neither is he the head as the pope challenges to himself. How is that ? you will say. In the forenamed four things, the pope challenges holding of doctrines, and holding of offices, and the like, upon him. Offices do not so hold upon any governors, upon the king or others, as the pope challenges to hold upon him. How does he challenge them to hold upon him ? Thus, that all are in him virtually, and so to be derived from him to others. And in great part many of our prelates say that they are the head of the church, thus ; that is, that all the offices hold on them, that they are all in them virtually, and so go from them to others. Hence they account none others ministers but their curates, and they must not pray but as they will, and do nothing but what they will. Why ? because they are but their substitutes, as if all offices were virtually in them, and so came from them to others ; whereas every officer in the church, even the meanest, holds upon Christ the Head.

Now, in the civil state in some sense it may be said, that the officers of the commonwealth are virtually in the king, he being the supreme ; but you must not think that all are thus virtually in him in church affairs, for if they were virtually in him, then he could himself dispense those things that others dispense by virtue of their offices, but that he cannot, as to give the sacrament and the like.

But how is he the head, then, or in what sense may we quiet our consciences in acknowledging the king to be the head of the church ? Only thus ; he is said to be the head because he is the supreme to govern in a civil way, not only the civil state, but even affairs that belong to the church. We do not deny the power of princes even in affairs that belong to the church. And because the king is the supreme in that civil power, to govern by civil laws, to see Christ not dishonoured, to keep out idolatry, to protect the church, to punish enormities that exist, to defend it from enemies, in that sense he is said to be the head ; but the title of supreme governor, being understood in a civil way only, is more proper.

To make it a little plain that the king has some supremacy, not only in the civil state but in church affairs. For we must not exclude the king quite out of all church affairs, as some would do ; but though we would inform your consciences aright, yet we would not by any means take away any lawful power God has put into him. Now that he has power even in church affairs, there are many reasons that fully move me to be persuaded in it.

The first that I shall name I think will least prevail (though it be the most ordinary) with them that make most doubt of it, therefore I will not stand upon it, only name it. We know that among the Jews in the time of the Old Testament, the governors, and kings, and princes had power in affairs that belong to the church, as well as to the state. But this I say I do not think to be the greatest strength in this point, especially to persuade them that make any scruple of it ; they will tell us that the power there was but typical and the like, and so binds not now.

There are therefore other reasons that persuade the same thing.

The first is this, because I find that in the prophets, where we have a prophecy of the state of the church in the times of the gospel, God promises that he will make kings to be their nursing fathers, and queens their nursing mothers. Now if they are to be nursing fathers of the church, surely they must have some influence by their power in it.

Secondly, Rom. xiii. 4, speaks indifferently, and saith, " he is the minister for thy good." It does not say for this good, or that good, for this civil good, or ecclesiastical good, but " he is the minister of God to thee for good," for all good unto thee so far as his power can reach. It is a hard thing, you know, (if men will put us unto it,) to show in the New Testament the power that kings had, because there was then no king but heathens, yet saith he, they are ministers for thy good, and he speaks to Christians.

But thirdly, and that which yet may seem to have more in it, I find in the New Testament that St. Paul, when he was accused by his brethren in matters of religion, appealed unto Cæsar, Acts xxv. 19, who was a heathen magistrate, his accusation was in matters of religion, in questions about their law, and about " one Jesus that was dead, whom Paul affirmed to be alive." Yet in his answer to those things he appealed to Cæsar, therefore there is somewhat that Cæsar has to do in overlooking the affairs of the church.

But you will say, How can he be a competent judge ? Can Cæsar, a heathen, be a competent judge in matters of religion ? is that possible ? Or suppose that a governor be wicked, can he be a competent judge in matters of religion ?

I answer, a governor, though he be a heathen, yet loses not his power, he has still a true and lawful power ; yea, he has some oversight in things that concern church affairs. How can that be ? I answer, Christianity gives not the authority, but enables to execute the authority ; a heathen magistrate has authority, it is his duty to see that Christians be not wronged, and if he does not, it is his sin ; but if he becomes a Christian, he is the better able to do what he ought, but this puts not the power into him.

But if a man be wicked, and understand not the things of the church, how can he be a judge ? Thus ; though the king be not a competent judge of the principles upon which the church acts, whether right or no, yet he may have ability to judge between man and man, whether one wrongs the other in matters of religion. As thus ; though he does not think the principles upon which they act to be right, yet he can judge whether according to those principles they do right one to another, or whether according to their principles they do not wrong one the other. And this is a great matter, to be able to judge and to punish with civil punishment when any of the church wrongs his brother against the principles which he himself professes.

As for example, a man who is not a physician does not understand the difference between poison and a wholesome medicine, yet when things are brought before him, he may be a competent judge, by evidence, to condemn a physician who has poisoned a man instead of giving him wholesome physic. And that objection against his competency in judging in the affairs of the church, has no more power than if it should have been objected that he must not judge a physician, whether he has poisoned a man or no, because he himself is not a physician.

Thus we have done with these three consequences that follow upon the opening of the headship of Christ in point of his government. And now we see more clearly how Christ is Head, and none but Christ, and what glory we are to give to Christ as the Head of the church.

There is one thing more belongs to the headship of Christ, which must not be passed by, though it is not so fully aimed at in the text as that which has already been expounded, and that is, the influence of spiritual life which comes to the church by Christ the Head, as the animal spirits come from the head to the members. And this is the very reason, first, why grace in the saints is of such a beautiful and glorious nature as it is, because it comes from Christ the Head. Secondly, this is the reason of the power and efficacy of grace in the saints, because it comes from Christ the Head. Thirdly, this is also the reason why grace in the saints is of such an everlasting nature. It has more beauty, it has more power and efficacy, and it is of a more everlasting nature, than the grace Adam possessed, because the grace of the saints holds upon Christ the Head, and has an influence from Christ, God-man, in a special and peculiar way, such an influence as Adam had not. This is the excellency of grace in the saints.

And to conclude this point of the headship of Christ. God the Father thus advanced Christ to be the Head, because he was willing to stoop so low, to be as a worm under foot, for so he saith of himself, "I am a worm, and no man," Psal. xxii. 6. Christ was low in his own eyes, and submitted himself to such a condition; and now, behold, the Father has advanced him, God has made him "Head over all things," Eph. i. 22; has made him Head over principalities, and powers, and dominions, over angels, and over all men and all things in the church; has advanced him to this high and glorious dignity. We see somewhat of it now, and we shall see more gloriously the headship of Christ hereafter.

In this God the Father shows, that as he has dealt with his Son, so he is willing to deal with the members of his Son. His Son, who was willing to be so low and under foot, is now advanced to such high glory that all must stoop, and yield, and submit to him. Let us be willing to lie low, though it be under foot, to be trodden upon by the wicked and ungodly in the world; though we cannot expect to be advanced to be head, yet we may expect to be advanced to glory and dignity. You know what God said to Saul, "When thou wert little in thine own eyes, then I made thee king," 1 Sam. xv. 17. The less any of us are in our own eyes, the more are we likely to be advanced by God; for God will observe a proportion between his dealings with Christ the Head, and his dealings with all his members.

"And appoint themselves one head." In Eph. i. 22, it is said, God gave Christ "to be the Head over all things to the church." How then is it said here that they shall "appoint to themselves one head?"

It is true, God the Father has advanced his Son, and exalted him above all things, and given him to be Head over all; but yet when the church chooses Christ to be their Head, when they shall willingly submit themselves unto him, lifting him up above all, honouring his ordinances, laws, and institutions, and depending upon him for light, then they are said to appoint Christ to be their Head. Though God's eternal decree has made himself to be the God of his saints, yet when the saints choose God to be their God, God accounts himself to be made their God by them; they make God to be their God in choosing him. So though Christ by the Father is appointed to be Head over all, yet the act of the church in choosing Christ, and coming to him freely, and submitting to him as to the Head, is accounted an appointing of Christ to be Head.

This is that happy work which the saints have been doing, and which we are to do now, and which they will do to the end of the world. Though there be some special time to which this text refers, yet in all ages of the church, when the saints choose Christ to be their Head, they are said to appoint him.

Let us join in this blessed work, an honourable work for creatures, to appoint the Lord Jesus to be Head over them. Let us say, as Hushai did in another case, 2 Sam. xvi. 18, "Whom the Lord, and this people, and all the men of Israel, choose, his will I be, and with him will I abide." So, he whom God the Father shall give to be Head over all things, he whom the saints have in all times chosen for their Head, he shall be our Head and our King; his will we be, and with him will we abide. Let us give Christ the pre-eminence, prizing his government, his ordinances, above all the comforts we have in this world. "If I prefer not Jerusalem above my chief joy," Psal. cxxxvii. 6. The words are אם אהבתי ירושלים if I make not Jerusalem to ascend above the head of my joy; whatever is high in our thoughts, as a head, let Christ be above it. Christ in his ordinances must be above the head of our joy, for otherwise he is not a Head unto us. If you invite a man of quality to your table, though you provide excellent cheer for him, yet if you set any people of mean quality above him, he would not regard all your courtesies. When you tender up any thing unto Christ, when you seem to entertain him with the greatest respect, yet if there be any thing you set above him, especially if a vile lust be set above him, he cares not for all your entertainment. We read in Col. ii. 19, that there were some blamed for not "holding the Head;" what is that? because they gave more honour to angels than was due to them; though never such glorious creatures, yet by overprizing them they come not to hold the Head. What! is the giving undue honour to angels enough to take us off from Christ the Head? Certainly, then, prostrating ourselves before our vile and base lusts, much more takes us off from holding Christ to be the Head. Let us look at all the offices and ordinances of Christ, as holding upon him the Head, that so we may have a more reverent esteem of them. Let us depend upon him for influence of life, and not depend upon means. Let us manifest in our conversation the spirit and life that we have received from such a Head as Christ is, that we may not be a dishonour to this our Head. Chrysostom, in his comment upon the first chapter of the Ephesians, says,

*Τὴν ἀγγελῶν
βίβλους ἐλάττω καὶ τὸν ἀρχ-αγγέλων μετέωρον,
&c.*

in this respect we must be better than angels, yea, greater than archangels. He has three most excellent remarks, to prove that Christians should take heed of dishonouring Christ their Head. First, saith he, Suppose a man had a precious diadem upon his head, or a crown of gold, that would be some argument to him to make him take heed of doing things unworthy of that ornament: but we have not a diadem, not a crown of gold upon our heads, we have Christ himself to be our Head, therefore let us do nothing unworthy of this our Head. Secondly, he remarks, Oh the honour that God affords to us in this! the thought of this were enough to terrify us from sin, more than the setting of hell itself before our eyes. And indeed so it is. The right understanding of Christ to be our Head, and having so near a union with him, is of power to terrify us from sin more than the sight of hell, if it were before us. Thirdly, he observes, What! is Christ your Head? Do you know next to whom this your Head sits in heaven? Is he not placed at the right hand of the Father, above all principalities and powers? And shall the members of this Head be trampled upon by the devil? God forbid.

And yet so honour the Head, as to give due honour likewise to those he has placed under him for the administration of any of his ordinances to us. We must not, under pretence of giving Christ all the honour, dishonour those that are set over us by Christ. St. Paul, in 1 Cor. i. 12, when reproving the dissensions of the church of Corinth, remarks, "Every one of you saith, I am of Paul, and I of Apollos, and I of Cephas, and I of Christ." Why, are these all blamed? how could those who said that they held Christ be blamed? Thus: amongst the Corinthians there were some that made divisions, some were for one officer, others for another: We are for Paul, said some; We for Apollos, said others; and, We for Cephas; And for our parts, said others, we are neither for Paul, nor for Apollos, nor for Cephas, but for Christ. What are men? what are officers? what are ordinances? what are all those to us? Christ is all in all to us, he is our Head, and we are complete in him, and we hold upon him. These are blamed as well as the other, because we must so hold upon Christ, as to give all due honour to the ordinances, institutions, officers, and offices of Christ.

Yet I confess, if any that are in Christ's stead, to dispense his ordinances to us, prove to be wicked, of all people in the world they are the most contemptible, and a just judgment of God is upon them. Isa. ix. 15, "The ancient and honourable, he is the head, and the prophet that teacheth lies, he is the tail." Mark, the prophet speaks against those who were in place and power, though they were naught, yet still they retained the name of ancient and honourable; but the prophet that teacheth lies, a contemptible name is put upon him, he is the tail; no generation in the world more contemptible than those, when once they degenerate.

But you will say, though they are vile in their lives, yet their wickedness does not hinder the virtue and efficacy of the ordinances, they depend not upon the officers. True, the efficacy of no ordinance depends upon men, and it is not either because the minister is vile, or communicants are wicked, that the virtue of an ordinance is lost, if the church contract no guilt upon themselves by retaining such in place, and by not casting out such as come into communion with them. Take for granted that there is no guilt contracted, and then it is not the wickedness of the minister, or of the people, that hinders the efficacy of any ordinance. But if it prove that there be guilt contracted upon the church through their negligence of duty, then the case is the same with those of Corinth, 1 Cor. v. 6, "A little leaven leaveneth the whole lump;" what is that whole lump but their communion?

They shall "appoint themselves one Head?" But was not Christ the Head before. It is spoken of a glorious time, when the Jews shall be called again, and Israel and Judah shall join together. Now they shall appoint themselves one Head, Christ to be their Head. Christ was the Head to the fathers under the law, how now is he appointed their Head? I answer, Christ indeed was a Head to the forefathers, but now in the times of the gospel, especially at the calling of the Jews, the time spoken of here, Christ will appear a Head in another manner, to govern in another way, far more gloriously than he now does, and far more influence of grace and light will come from him to his members. Though Christ has always been a Head to his church, yet there is a time coming when the seventh trumpet shall be sounded, spoken of Rev. xi. 15; when that voice shall be heard that yet was never heard, "The kingdoms of this world are become the kingdoms of our Lord, and of his Christ, and he shall reign for ever and ever."—A time coming, wherein Christ shall say to his people, "To him that overcometh will I grant to sit with me in my throne, even as I also overcame, and am set down with my Father in his throne," Rev. iii. 21. The throne that Christ sits upon now, is his Father's throne; he does not call it his; and at the day of judgment, the Scripture tells us that he shall give up the kingdom unto his Father. There is a time therefore for the throne of Christ to be exalted more than it has been, which Christ has promised to those that overcome.—A time coming, when there shall be heard the noise, not only of "many waters," but as of "mighty thunderings, saying, Alleluia; for the Lord God omnipotent reigneth," Rev. xix. 6. He shall be a Head another way.

Now if it be true, that Christ himself is appointed by the church to be Head, then the officers and ministers of the church should not think much to be appointed in their places by the church too. It is true, their offices hold on Christ the Head, but the designation of the persons must be from the church. We do not now list to enter into the controversy, who of the church should do it, but there must be more than a civil act to make any man a pastor or teacher of a church; somewhat to make conscience yield and submit to him as an officer that Jesus Christ has placed over them. Christ himself would be appointed a Head by his people, that they might submit to him the more cheerfully, and give glory to him with the more freedom of spirit. And as for all such as thrust themselves upon a people, no marvel if they complain of want of respect from them, or of their going away from them. They never did any thing towards appointing them as officers over them.

They shall "appoint themselves one Head;" not force Christ upon others by fire and sword. Heretics are to be burnt with fire, saith Luther; but with what fire? the fire of charity.

igne charitatis comburendi sunt heretici. Luther.

They shall appoint to themselves. Let others choose what head they please, yet the saints will appoint to themselves the Lord Christ to be their Head; they will bless themselves in Christ, he shall be a Head unto them, whatever he is to others. Others, it may be, will choose to themselves other heads, but the saints say as they in Micah iv. 5, "All people will walk every one in the name of his god, and we will walk in the name of the Lord our God for ever and ever." Other people will walk in their ways, and choose to themselves such as give them most liberty; they perhaps think the government of Christ too strict for them: but for us, we will bless ourselves in our Christ, we will never prostitute our consciences to men, or to lusts and humours, as we have done; Christ shall be our Head, and we will submit to him. Secreta mea mecum, (is a Hebrew proverb,) My secret is with myself; what good we find in Christ it is to ourselves: let Christ be a stumbling-block and a rock of offence to others, to us he is precious, he is one of ten thousand, "he is altogether lovely;" Cant. v. 16.

They shall "appoint themselves one head." But one; the church is not a monster of divers heads, it has but one head. There cannot be a ministerial head of the church, Christ is always present, and has left his laws with his people. If we consider the difference between ecclesiastical power and civil power, we shall see clearly that there cannot be a ministerial head of the church. A ministerial head is absurd. In the civil power, it is not against any institution of Christ, nor against any law, that there should be one head over all the world. But to have one head over the church, yea, to have any general officers over all the churches, cannot be. The reason is, because there can be no delegation of power that belongs to the church. There may be a delegation of a civil power, one man may be king over many countries, and he may appoint substitutes under him, and delegate them to officiate for him. But in the church there is no delegation of power from one to another. Grant but once delegation of the teaching power, and you establish non-residency; grant but delegation of the ruling power, and you immediately establish a papacy. There is no such thing therefore.

Again, the civil power is by way of coercion; a magistrate is not always bound to give a reason of his injunctions, he may by way of compulsion require obedience. But church power is to deal with conscience; and therefore every one that has any power must officiate himself, and deal with the consciences of men to persuade and to instruct.

These two things being granted, it is impossible that there can be a head over all the churches, yea, or over many. We must join nothing with Jesus Christ, in the way of his headship. As Alexander said to Darius, when he sent to him that he would be willing to divide the kingdom; No, said Alexander, there is but one sun in the firmament, and there can be but one king in a kingdom. So saith Christ, But one Head: he must be Head alone, or no Head at all; nothing must be joined with him as head. Indeed, the heathen gods were contented to divide their honours: and hence the senate of Rome rejected Christ from taking him in to be a God, after they consulted about it; For, said they, if Christ is acknowledged as a God, he will not share with the rest, he will have all himself; and so upon this reason they refused him. Thus many reject Christ as God, and as a Head, because Christ will not share with others, he must be but one.

And a special help is here given to our faith, in looking up to Christ for help and protection when all means fail; I beseech you, observe it. Does Christ require of us that we should make him Head alone, and join nothing with him? Then we may well expect from him protection in all our wants, and that he alone will help us. Or, otherwise, the condition of a Christian were worse than the condition of a heathen; for the gods of a heathen would be content to have but part of the honour of the heart and life, because they could help but in part. If a heathen god should require the whole soul to be lifted up to him above all, and he alone to be honoured and worshipped as a god, yet, when help and protection are required, he could do nothing without another joined with him, a heathen might well reason the case against him, as doing him wrong. Certainly Christ will never wrong his people, so as to require them to lift up him alone, and join no other with him, and yet when they require help and succour, that there should be need to call in others besides himself to their help. Therefore, as Christ challenges us to make him our Head alone, so we may challenge Christ to help us alone, when there is no other help for us.

Thus we have finished both the headship of Christ, and the church's appointing him to be that Head.

Now follows the next blessing, and that but in a word, and then we come to the conclusion of this chapter.

"They shall come up out of the land." Jerome interprets it, a terrenis affectibus, a coming up from their earthly affections; Luther, a vita miserabili, a coming up from their miserable life and condition. But rather thus, "come up out of the land," that is, out of their captivity. Judah and Israel shall join together in coming to Jerusalem, and so unite in the same kind of worship. As they were wont to come out of all parts of the country to worship at Jerusalem, and there were united in one kind of worship, so they shall now come from all parts of the world where they are scattered, and join in the same way of worship, yea, and it is very probable in their own land.

There was a time when the people of God sang songs of praise in the wilderness, Exod. xv.; but the time shall come when they shall do it in their own land; and this shall be a blessing of God upon them. "In that day shall this song be sung in the land of Judah; We have a strong city; salvation will God appoint for walls and bulwarks," Isa. xxvi. 1. It shall be sung in the land of Judah. "In the mountain of the height of Israel, saith the Lord God, there shall all the house of Israel, all of them in the land, serve me: there will I accept them, and there will I require your offerings, and the first-fruits of your oblations, with all your holy things," Ezek. xx. 40. "I will take the children of Israel from among the heathen, whither they be gone, and will gather them on every side, and bring them into their own land," Ezek. xxxvii. 21.

This blessing has God granted to many of his servants this day, who never thought to have seen their own good land: but God has been pleased to gather them up, not only to come into their own land, but they find the arms and hearts of the saints open to embrace them, and call them to public employments. Not long since the land could not bear them; we hope that the time will come ere long, that the Lord Christ may so rule in our land, that it will as hardly bear wicked and ungodly men as it has borne the saints; though it were difficult to say that so much violence should be used, even to keep them from sin, as was used against the saints to keep them from their God. Yet, time may come ere long, that wicked men may be glad to flee, though not forced into another land, because they cannot have the enjoyment of their lusts so freely here; as the saints have been forced to flee out of their land that they might serve the Lord, and keep their consciences clear.

But we let this pass, and come now to the close of the chapter, to the epiphonema of it all.

"For great shall be the day of Jezreel." They shall "appoint themselves one head, and come up out of the land; for great," &c. Tremellius renders it, although the day of Jezreel be great: and the Hebrew particle ו signifies quavis, as well as quia, it may be translated "although," as well as "for." And translating it, although the day of Jezreel be great, takes it in this sense, that is, although the people of Israel shall be brought into great affliction, yet God will be so merciful when his time comes, that they shall be gathered together again, and appoint themselves one head, and come up out of the land. And from such an interpretation of the words there might be an excellent meditation raised, and it is this.

Obs. That the greatness of the misery of the church is no hindrance to the course of the freeness and abundance of God's mercy towards it. Although the day of Jezreel be never so calamitous, never so afflictive, never so grievous, yet they shall come up out of the land, and appoint themselves one head. The greatness of the church's misery is no hindrance to the church's deliverance. Why? because their deliverance depends upon a God who delights not only to manifest some power, but the excellency and the glory of his power, in their deliverance. Isaiah (lxii. 8) speaking of these very times of God's being merciful to his people, saith, "The Lord hath sworn by his right hand;" and we have not only mention there of God's right hand, and swearing by it, but his arm too; mark that, "and by the arm of his strength;" there is God's hand, God's arm, the arm of his strength, and God swearing by it. Surely when God delights to put forth such power for the deliverance of his church, it is no great matter whether its afflicted state be great or small. It makes no greater hindrance to the church's delivery than if you should see two bubbles of water rise up, one having a little thicker skin than the other. Now there is as much difference in the difficulty of bursting that thick-skin bubble above the thinner, when a mighty piece of ordnance is shot off with a weighty ball against them, as the greatest and sorest affliction that the people of God were ever under in this world makes a difference in the difficulty of their deliverance from the least affliction that ever the church endured, when they have to deal with an infinite God. If a child should see the thicker-skin bubble, he might think it is harder to be broken than the thinner; but if a cannon be shot off, nay, if it be but a gust of wind, it makes no difference. Now the afflictions of God's people are to this right hand of God's power, and the arm of his strength, but as a bubble of water before a mighty cannon. Yea, if there be no help at all to deliver God's people in time of affliction, God can create help, "He will create Jerusalem a rejoicing, and their people a joy." Yea, suppose their condition be such as never was the like since the beginning of the world, yet, "since the beginning of the world men have not heard, nor perceived by the ear, neither hath the eye seen, O God, beside thee, what he hath prepared for him that waiteth for him," Isa. lxiv. 4.

And as the greatness of the church's deliverance is no hinderance to God's power in delivering them, so it should be no hinderance to the work of our faith. Common prudence and reason will go a great way to uphold us under some afflictions, but when the affliction becomes grievous and long, prudence and reason sink under the burden; but then should faith lift up itself, and cast an eye upon this right hand of God's power, this arm of his strength by which he has sworn, and exercise itself in the glorious acts it has wrought. For certainly faith is appointed for such a time as this, when the church is under grievous extremities. The ordinary afflictions of the church do not call for such a work of faith, but when they come to extraordinary calamities, these require such a power of God for their deliverance, and call for a work of faith proportionable.

As Alexander, when he was in great danger, said, Now there is a danger fit for the spirit of Alexander to encounter; so when the church is in any great danger, all the members of it should say, Here is a danger, here is a trouble, fit for the spirit of Christians, fit for the spirits of those that are able to exercise the most noble and glorious acts of faith.

We are scarcely for the present put to this glorious exercise of faith, for reason and sense see much help. They see that the cause of God at this day has the better of the adversary. Let us not look upon every difficulty as a thing that calls for such a mighty, glorious work of faith, when men, by reason and prudence, may carry themselves under such difficulties much better than most of us do. However, we do not know but the Lord may call us to such difficulties and dangers as will require such an exercise of faith as I have spoken of. Let us therefore lay up this instruction for the time to come.

"For great shall be the day of Jezreel." If the words be read as they are in your Bibles, and yet have reference to the calamitous time and grievous extremities of the day of Jezreel, then

Obs. 1. That God's bowels of compassion work toward his church because of the greatness of their affliction. When their afflictions are very great, and the greater they are, the more God's bowels of compassion work toward them. We know the misery of God's people was a marvellous quickening argument to the compassion of God; "I have surely seen the affliction of my people, and their sorrows, and therefore am come down to deliver them," Exod. iii. 7, 8. If the greatness of the affliction of the church move the bowels of God's compassion, then let not the greatness of affliction hinder our faith. Let not the greatness of trouble reason down our faith, but let it rather reason up our faith, for so indeed it should; and so the saints of God heretofore have done. It is time for thee, O Lord, to work, for men have almost destroyed thy law; yea, the high time is come for thee to have mercy upon Zion, for thy people begin to favour the dust thereof. Was this a good argument, "For thy name's sake, O Lord, pardon mine iniquity, for it is great," Psal. xxv. 11, to move God withal? Surely then this is a good argument, Deliver us in afflictions, for they are very great. For sin makes more distance between God and us than afflictions: yet if the greatness of sin can be put as an argument for God's mercy and compassion to work, much more the greatness of afflictions. Yet this is the grace of God in the second covenant, that even the sins which before made the creature an object of hatred, now make it an object of compassion. So afflictions, that before were part of the curse, are turned to arguments for moving the bowels of God's tender compassion toward his people.

Obs. 2. The promise is the only support of the soul, and that which carries it through the greatest affliction. Afflictions are as lead to the net; the promise is as the cork, which keeps above water when the lead pulls down. But I leave these meditations, though I find many interpreters run this way; and I rather take it as a further expression of God's wonderful mercy to his church.

"For great shall be the day of Jezreel;" that is, God has a great day of mercy for Jezreel. They shall appoint themselves one head, they shall be gathered together and be made one, they shall come up out of the land; why? for God has a great day of mercy to his people, a "great day of Jezreel." And herein, therefore, God makes use of the name of Jezreel in a good sense. They who interpret Jezreel the other way would have the name signify, great is the day of scattering, or of the scattered people. But Jezreel signifies likewise the seed of God. Before God used their name in the worst sense, that he would scatter them according to their name; now he uses their name in the best sense, they are the seed of God, and there is great mercy from God for them.

Obs. When God is reconciled to a people he takes all in the best sense, and makes the best acceptance of every thing, as he does here of the name Jezreel. We have only these two things to consider in this expression: That the saints of God are God's Jezreel; that is, they are the seed of God. And that there is for this seed of God a great day.

1. They are the seed of God; the seed of the blessed, and there is a blessing in them. They are the precious seed which God preserves in the world, and has done ever since the beginning of the world. They are that seed that preserves the glory of God in the world. Were it not for a few gracious, holy people in the world, where would the glory of God be? what would become of it? The godly, however contemptible in the world, are the precious seed, that God reserves for great and glorious ends. They are the seed to preserve the continuation of the doctrine of the gospel; as Isa. vi. 13, "The holy seed shall be the substance thereof." Though they are under great afflictions, yet there shall be a holy seed that shall be the substance thereof, and there shall be his blessing. Psal. lxxii. 17, "His name shall endure for ever;" the words are read by Montanus, Filiabitur nomen ejus, His name shall be childed; that is, so continued as families are continued, one generation after another, one begetting another. Thus shall the name of Christ continue in the world, as it has done.

Though seed be but a handful in comparison of the harvest, so the saints of God then were, and yet are but as a handful in comparison of the glorious harvest that shall arise, yet they are very precious before God, and God will make the world hereafter know that they are the precious ones of God. Isa. lxi. 9, "All that see them shall acknowledge them that they are the seed which the Lord hath blessed." A man will be careful of his seed, whatever becomes of his other corn. In time of dearth, the husbandman will rather pinch his stomach, than have his seed-corn spent. So in times of common calamity or dearth, God's care is over his seed. The saints are (as I may say) God's seed-corn, to preserve his name in the world to succeeding generations, he will not therefore have them destroyed.

Seed is the most precious of the corn, which is most winnowed and elcansed; so are the saints the clean and the most precious ones. God winnows them more than others by the fans and winnows of afflictions; why? because they are his seed. Other corn which has chaff in it, the husbandman will give to the fowls and the cattle, he bestows not much winnowing upon it; but the corn that is for seed he carefully winnows, he would not willingly have a darnel amongst it. It may be thou complainest thou art more winnowed than other men; perhaps thou art more precious in God's eyes, and thou art reserved as seed, as the seed of the blessed.

The wicked indeed are seed too, but a corrupt seed, "a seed of evil-doers," Isa. i. 4; the grandfather was an enemy unto God, yea, the great-grandfather; and the father, and the children after him, continue enemies to God. And God, in mercy unto his church, many times cuts down the wicked before they seed too much. You who have gardens, if you see the weeds come up and grow towards seed, you think then that it is time to pull them up, you will not suffer them to seed. God looks upon many families, and sees wretched and sinful men as "a seed of evil-doers" ready to seed; and if they be not cut down suddenly, there will be a wretched brood of wicked ones in such a family. This is the reason of God's sudden cutting down many wicked families.

But to come to the point chiefly intended, that is, that this seed of the Lord shall have a great day.

"Great shall be the day of Jezreel." The men of the world have their day in which they ruffle it out. St. Paul seems to speak of this in 1 Cor. iv. 3, that he did not regard "man's judgment," the words are, ἀνθρωπίνης κρίσεως, man's day. Now men have the day, they have all the bravery of the world; well, observes St. Paul, I do not regard man's day, I expect another day. I know not how it is otherwise translated; you translate it judgment in your books, but in the original it is day, man has a day. As men have a day, so shall God's saints have a day too. We used often to say, when we saw our enemies jocund and merry, Surely they hope to have a day. My brethren, be joyful in the Lord, God has a day for you, and a great day too, "Great shall be the day of Jezreel." The beginning of God's mercy to his people, is called "a day of small things," Zech. iv. 10; and that must not be despised, "Who hath despised the day of small things?" It was the beginning of the reformation, and deliverance of the people of Judah from their captivity. But God has a day of great things, and certainly that day shall be honourable.

1. It shall be a great day, in which the glory of God shall exceedingly appear, wherein God shall be (as I may so speak with holy reverence) as it were in his robes. As we know princes upon great days put on their robes, so the King of glory shall have a day for his people, wherein even he himself will put on his robes: Psal. cii. 16, "When the Lord shall build up Zion, he shall appear in his glory." It seems, while the church is in affliction, and the witnesses prophesy in sackcloth, that God is as it were clothed in sackcloth, "in all their afflictions he was afflicted;" but because God has a day, a great day to his churches, he will reserve his robes till then, and when that day comes he will put them on. A great day it shall be for Jezreel, for the seed of the Lord.

2. It shall be a great day, for this day shall be the riches of the world. Mark, Paul, speaking of the Jews, saith, "If the fall of them be the riches of the world, and the diminishing of them the riches of the Gentiles; how much more their fulness?" Rom. xi. 12. It was a rich mercy to the Gentiles when they were brought out of darkness, and called to the knowledge of Jesus Christ. But God has a greater day than that, for it is spoken of here as a day that is to come; that is, their fall was the riches of the Gentiles, much more their calling in again. So then, there is such a day of calling home the people of God, as shall be the riches of the Gentiles, the riches of all the world.

3. Great shall be this day, for it shall be as a day of resurrection from death to life: so Dan. xii. 2, "Many of them that sleep in the dust shall awake, some to everlasting life, and some to shame and everlasting contempt." This is not spoken of the great resurrection at the last day of judgment; for, first, it is spoken but of some that shall arise. Secondly, the greatest glory that is here put upon the just, is but to shine as the stars in the firmament; but at the last day, the saints shall shine as the sun in the firmament, more and above the stars. Yea, thirdly, that which is here revealed to Daniel, must be sealed up as a great secret till the appointed time come; but the resurrection at the last day is no great secret, that they knew well enough. But this resurrection is to be sealed up as a great secret that was not known in the world, nor should be much known till the appointed time should come. And then, lastly, it was promised to Daniel in the 13th verse, that he should "stand up in his lot," as a peculiar and special favour that God would bestow upon him. Now it is not such a peculiar and special favour for a saint to stand up at the last day, but this was a favour to Daniel as an eminent saint, that he should stand up in his lot. Therefore this resurrection is the same with this great day of Jezreel, wherein there shall be such a glorious work of God in calling Israel and Judah together, and the fulness of the Gentiles, that it shall be as the resurrection from death to life; so the apostle calls it in Rom. xi. 15, "What shall the receiving of them be, but life from the dead?"

4. "Great shall be the day of Jezreel;" for this day shall bring refreshing to all the saints, this is "the time of refreshing," Acts iii. 19. There shall be such things then as will refresh and revive the spirits of all the saints.

5. A great day, for it shall be the day of restitution of all things. Acts iii. 21, "Until the times of restitution of all things, which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." I know this text is ordinarily interpreted concerning the last day; but that it cannot be so appears, because that then there shall not be the restitution of all things, but the annihilation of many things. Further, this speaks of a restitution of all things, that was spoken of by the mouth of all the holy prophets. Now the holy prophets spake but very little concerning the day of judgment, or the life to come; and therefore the apostle, in 2 Tim. i. 10, saith, that "life and immortality are brought to light through the gospel." Not but that it was known somewhat before, but it was very darkly known, there was very little spoken of life and immortality in the prophets: but this speaks of a time of which all the holy prophets spake, as an argument that was the general theme of them all. And, indeed, there is no argument whatever that is more general among the prophets, than this great argument of this great day of Jezreel.

6. A great day, for it shall be the day of a new creation; a new heaven and a new earth shall be made, when this great day of Jezreel shall come. "Behold, I create new heavens and a new earth," Isa. lxxv. 17. In ver. 18, you see what this new heaven and new earth is: "But be ye glad and rejoice for ever in that which I create: for, behold, I create Jerusalem a rejoicing, and her people a joy." These are the new heavens and the new earth which are to be created, and plainly mean the church, for ver. 21 speaks of "building houses," and "inhabiting them," and of "planting vineyards," and "eating the fruit" of them, upon these new heavens and this new earth's creation. And, 2 Pet. iii. 13, "Nevertheless we, according to his mise, look for new heavens and a new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness." This is usually taken for the kingdom of heaven hereafter. But where is this promise? We do not find it any where, but in Isa. lxx. 17. Now it is apparent that promise speaks of a state of the church in this world; it speaks of a new earth, as well as of a new heaven; if it only spoke of new heavens, it had been another matter, but it speaks of a new earth likewise, therefore meant of a state in this world, that is, there shall be such glorious things done by God, as shall manifest a creating power, as if God now made "new heavens and a new earth."

7. "Great shall be the day of Jezreel," for it shall be as another world, when this day comes. "Unto the angels hath he not put in subjection the world to come, whereof we speak. But one in a certain place (Psal. viii. 4) testified, saying, What is man, that thou art mindful of him? or the son of man, that thou visitest him? Thou madest him a little lower than the angels; thou crownedst him with glory and honour, and didst set him over the works of thy hands: thou hast put all things in subjection under his feet," Heb. ii. 5—8. This the apostle interprets of Christ, as ver. 6, that all things must be subjected to him as man, "What is man, that thou shouldst regard him?" that is, that thou shouldst advance the nature of man so far as to unite it to thy Son, and "put all things in subjection under his feet." But, saith he, "we see not yet all things put under him," that time is yet to come, for, saith he, "he hath not put in subjection the world to come, whereof we speak." Therefore, mark, my brethren, there must be such a time wherein all things, all creatures, must be put under subjection to Christ, and this is in the world to come. It cannot be meant of that world to come, where the saints shall reign gloriously in heaven, for the heavens must depart as a scroll, and many things shall then rather be annihilated, and the kingdom must then be given up by Christ to God the Father, 1 Cor. xv. 24. But this place speaks of a time when all creatures must come under subjection to Christ, and it is called "the world to come;" why? because of the great change there shall be of things, it shall be, as it were, a new world. As we call this world from Noah's time, a new world, and when we speak of the other world, we call it the old world; so the Scripture calls it, 2 Pet. ii. 5, God "spared not the old world;" and, chap. iii. 6, "The world that then was, being overflowed with water, perished." So, this world in which we live shall be as the old world; this day of Jezreel shall make such a glorious change, all things being put in subjection to Christ, that it shall be as it were a new world. God has made an excellent world, in which there is much beauty and glory, and yet his enemies have the rule here; what then will that world be that God intends for his saints?

8. "Great shall be the day of Jezreel," for it shall be such a great day that all former things shall be even forgotten because of the lustre and glory of that great day. As Isa. lxx. 17, the former heavens and the former earth "shall not be remembered, nor come into mind." And so Jer. iii. 16, 17, "In those days, saith the Lord, they shall no more say, The ark of the covenant of the Lord: neither shall it come to mind: neither shall they remember it; neither shall they visit it; neither shall that be done any more. At that time they shall call Jerusalem the throne of the Lord; and all the nations shall be gathered unto it, to the name of the Lord, to Jerusalem: neither shall they walk any more after the imagination of their evil heart." Mark, my brethren, "In those days the house of Judah shall walk with the house of Israel, and they shall come together out of the land of the north to the land that I have given for an inheritance unto your fathers," ver. 18. It is apparent that it is spoken of this great day of Jez-reel; for now God declares he will gather Judah and Israel together, and they shall walk together, and that then former things shall be forgotten. "They shall call Jerusalem the throne of the Lord." Heretofore, even the temple itself, the glory of Jerusalem, was but as the place of God's feet, and the ark of God was but his footstool. 1 Chron. xxviii. 2, "As for me, I had in mine heart, saith David, to build a house of rest for the ark of the covenant of the Lord, and for the footstool of our God:" and Isa. lx. 13, "I will make (Zion) the place of my feet glorious." But now in this great day, Jerusalem, that was but God's footstool, shall be God's throne. A great day certainly this shall be, when all things are thus forgotten.

9. "Great shall be the day of Jezreel," because it shall be a day after which there shall be no night. And that you will say will be a great day indeed, in which the saints shall be raised to such a state of prosperity and happiness, that it shall never be darkened any more. The churches here have often had some little release, they have had their days of peace for a while, but it has soon grown to be night, and a dismal night of darkness. But when this great day shall come, it shall be a day that shall never be succeeded by night, for so God promises here to his Jezreel, to make it an eternal excellency, and to make Jerusalem an everlasting joy; and, Dan. ii. 44, God shall in the days of those kings "set up a kingdom which shall never be destroyed," that is, the great day of Jezreel.

This will more clearly appear, if we consider more fully what shall be done for the church and the world on this day. (1.) There shall be the deliverance of the churches from woeful affliction, in which they shall be found a little before. For so the Scripture tells us, Dan. xii. 1, that before this day "there shall be a time of trouble, such as never was since there was a nation even to that same time: and at that time thy people shall be delivered." I might tell you how much some of the ancients have spoken of this; though it be a point that seems to be somewhat strange to us, yet it was one of the most ordinary things known in the primitive times. It was then so generally acknowledged, that Justin Martyr, who was but thirty years after St. John, observes, There is no man who is of the orthodox faith in all things, but acknowledges this. Lactantius shows the glory of this great day of Jezreel, but withal declares that a little before there shall be most grievous times, such times as that all right shall be confounded, the law shall perish, nobody shall know what is his own, the wicked shall have the pre-eminence, and the saints shall be persecuted; so that though in this our time wickedness is grown to such a height, that a man would think it could increase no higher, yet in comparison of the time a little before that great day, these times may be called golden ages. So that great times of affliction will be before that great day; and it is therefore called a great day, because of God's appearing so gloriously in the deliverance of his church. The Scripture speaks of wonderful things which God will do, and show himself marvellous, as he did when Israel came out of Egypt. Who knows but that God is now sending abroad so much of the light of his gospel, and so working in the hearts of men, and giving us such a time of reviving, and calling so many youths as he does, because this great day is at hand, and because before this day we may have a day of dismal darkness, and by this he will prepare people for those times? God will have a numerous seed in the world, therefore so many young people are converted and are so forward, because, I say, God means to prepare them, by this light that we now have, for this great day. And you that are young may expect to go through some difficulties and hardship before this great day comes, but be of good comfort, you may hope to live to see all the glory of this great day : God gives you now time that you may lay up, and be fit seed for such a glorious day as this, that, when sufferings come, you may not be found among the number of the fearful ones, spoken of in Rev. xxi. 8, who "shall have their portion in the lake which burneth with fire and brimstone." Those who through base cowardice and compliance shall yield to vile superstitious vanities, shall be cast out among dogs when that great day comes. God now gives you a day that you may see the evil of superstitious vanities, that you may have truths revealed to you with more freedom than formerly; and who knows but this may be to prepare you for that darkness which may come a little before this great day of Jezreel?

Ego autem et qui sunt per omnia orthodoxe sententiae Christiani, &c.
L. 7. c. 15. 24. 25.

(2.) There shall be the subduing of the adversaries of the church. Though they shall have great power a little before; yet when that great day of Jezreel comes, they shall certainly be all subdued and brought under. Christ, when he shall come in this great day, shall have his "vesture dipped in blood," in destroying the wicked and ungodly, Rev. xix. 13; and when the saints see the wicked destroyed as the Egyptians were in the sea, they shall again "sing the song of Moses," Rev. xv. 3. What was this song of Moses, but the praising of God for the destruction of their adversaries in the sea? God has another sea to destroy the wicked, and another day for his saints to sing over the song of Moses again, especially for the destruction of popery. My brethren, he not troubled to see papists flock together, for when this day shall come, God will so order things that his adversaries shall flock together, but it shall be that they may be destroyed, for God has a great feast and a great sacrifice, and he will sacrifice them especially. And therefore Lactantius, who lived one thousand three hundred years since, speaking of this day, saith, I have a thing to say, but I even tremble to utter it, but I must speak it; and what was it? Romanum nomen de terra tolletur ; the Roman name shall be taken off from the earth. In those primitive times he prophesied of the destruction of Rome. Perhaps, though he did not see it so clearly, God might intend it for these times. God will destroy the enemies of his churches then. Yea, Ezek. xxviii. 24, there is a promise to the saints that there shall be no more "a pricking brier, nor any grieving thorn," of any that are round about them that despise them; and in another place God saith, that he will "take away the Canaanite out of the land."

(3.) The glorious presence of Christ among the saints shall be displayed. Let it be personal, or what it will, we determine not, but thus far we may confidently affirm, that there shall be a more glorious presence of Jesus Christ among his people, than ever yet was since the beginning of the world. Rev. xxi. 22, "The Lord God Almighty and the Lamb are the temple of it:" and chap. xxii. 3, 4, "The throne of God and of the Lamb shall be in it; and his servants shall serve him: and they shall see his face." And the very last words of Ezek. xlvi. are, "the name of the city from that day shall be" Jehovah-shammah, that is, "The Lord is there."

(4.) Glory shall there be put upon the saints. Glory shall be put upon them, first in regard of their admirable gifts and graces, which shall be heightened and enlarged; the weak shall be as David, and they that are as David shall be as the angel of God at that day. Their adversaries shall bow down before them. They shall have high esteem, even in the thoughts and judgments of many great ones of the world; they shall be called up to heaven, that is, those that are in highest place and dignity shall advance and honour them in that day; yea, the kings of the earth in that day shall come in, and bring their glory to the church. Therefore it is apparent that Rev. xxi. 24 cannot be understood of heaven; for it is said, "the kings of the earth do bring their glory into it;" they shall not bring their glory to the church, when the church shall be in heaven.

(5.) There shall be a wonderful change of all creatures, and glorious, fruitful times. Lactantius says, that the rocks themselves should issue forth honey and precious things; but that we cannot affirm; yet that there shall be a wonderful change of all things, and all creatures brought to a further happiness, even the sensitive creatures, as well as others, than they had before, the Scriptures are clear enough. And we are to understand many scriptures literally that tend this way, concerning the fruitfulness of the earth, and the external glory that there shall be in the creatures. As upon a great marriage feast, or coronation day, all the servants of the prince are in their best array; so when Christ, this Bridegroom, shall come and meet his spouse, all creatures shall be put into a new dress, shall have further glory.

(6.) A multitude of all nations and people shall flock to the church, that they shall be as "the sand of the sea." But this I have spoken of before at large. Now put all these things together, and "great shall be the day of Jezreel."

Yea, but shall these things be so? Though flesh and blood may reason against these things, yet I may apply that place, Zech. ii. 13, "Be silent, O all flesh, before the Lord, for he is raised up out of his holy habitation." God has made known in his word the great things he intends to bring to pass. And Zech. viii. 6, "Thus saith the Lord of hosts; If it be marvellous in the eyes of the remnant of this people in these days, should it also be marvellous in mine eyes? saith the Lord of hosts." These things may seem marvellous to your eyes, especially because we have been but little acquainted with them, but they are not marvellous in the eyes of God. Yea, we find it, that these things were to be kept hidden till the appointed time should come, till we draw near to that great day. God tells us that they were to be sealed up even to the time appointed, Dan. xii. 4; and God tells John that he "must prophesy again before many people, and nations, and tongues, and kings," Rev. x. 11; that is, before the time of the fulfilling of all things, that book of the Revelation shall be made out as clear as if John were come to prophesy again before men. And we hope it is coming, because God begins to let in light, and the morning star seems to arise.

In Zech. xiv. 6, 7, you have mention of a day, that we may apply to the present day: "And it shall come to pass in that day, that the light shall not be clear, nor dark; but it shall be one day which shall be known to the Lord, not day nor night: but it shall come to pass, that at evening time it shall be light." Mark what shall be in that day, ver. 8, "And it shall be in that day, that living waters shall go out from Jerusalem;" and ver. 9, "In that day shall there be one Lord, and his name shall be one;" and then ver. 20, "In that day shall there be upon the bells of the horses, Holiness unto the Lord;" and ver. 21, "In that day there shall be no more the Canaanite in the house of the Lord of hosts." Certainly, my brethren, these scriptures speak of a glorious day that is approaching, but yet, in the beginning of it, it is just such a day as we have at present, wherein the light is neither clear nor dark. It is true, not long since it was dark, now this darkness begins to be a little dispelled, but it is not clear yet, many things for the present darken the light. Opposition and many damps are upon the hearts of God's people, and things go not on as we desire; but blessed be God, it is not night with us; though it be not so dark as it was, or as clear as we desire, it is as it were twilight. Well, but "it shall be one day," that is, a special day; and indeed it is our day now, it is the greatest day that ever yet England had. "It shall be one day which shall be known to the Lord," a day in which the Lord has great purposes to do great things; and, certainly, this our day is known to the Lord, great things God is about to do for his churches, and lay a foundation of glorious things for the good of his people. And then mark, though it be "neither day nor night," yet "at the evening time it shall be light." What a strange expression is here! It shall be a dusky, cloudy day, and then a man would think that at evening it should be quite dark. To be cloudy at noon, and darkest at three or four of the clock in the afternoon, surely then it must needs be more dark in the evening. No, though it be not clear now, though it be a cloudy day, yet at the evening time it shall be light. When light is least expected, and when we most fear darkness, when we are ready to conclude, Our day is gone: once God did bring a day to England, a comfortable day; though it was a little dark, yet there was a glorious light in comparison of what we had before; but now the evening begins to shut upon us, "we looked for light, but behold darkness." If we see things go on with difficulty and opposition, we shall be ready to have our hearts sink within us, and to cry, Now our day is gone, and the evening is coming. But, my brethren, be of good comfort, for "at evening time it shall be light;" when we expect evening, when it is most unlikely to be light, then shall the light of the Lord break forth most gloriously. For whenever this day of Jezreel comes, there must be such a glorious work of God, as may magnify his name before the eyes of all men, and therefore at the evening it shall be light. "And it shall be in that day, that living waters shall go out from Jerusalem:" we have had some drops of living waters in this our day, but there is a day coming wherein living waters shall even flow out of Jerusalem.

Terre aperiet fontem suum, et ulerrimus fruges sua sponte generabit: papae montium mille subdant, &c. Lactant. l. 7. c. 4.

Tunc qui erunt in corporibus vivi, non morientur, sed primum annos infinitam multitudinem generabunt, et erit adulescentium tanta, et Deo chara. Lactant. Ibid.

Romanum nomen, lorret animus dicere, sed, dicam quia futurum est, tollitur de terra. L. c. 6. 13.

Now, to wind up all, there is a day for the saints, a rest for the people of God, a day wherein God will deliver them from all afflictions. I have met with one, who, observing that the Jews might kindle no fire upon their sabbath, because that rest was to signify the rest of the saints, remarks, That was a type that there is such a time of rest for the saints, that they shall be delivered from all fiery trials, all their afflictions shall be taken away. "Great shall be the day of Jezreel."

Obs. 1. Let the consideration of this be a strong argument to draw all people to the ways and love of godliness, to come and join with the churches in appointing Christ Head over them. All you wicked ones who have forsaken the Lord hitherto, come in and join now, and submit unto Jesus Christ as your Head, "for great shall be the day of Jezreel." There is a great day for the church of God, a day of glory, a day of abundance of wonderful mercy from God to the churches. They shall have their day; come you in and embrace religion, that you may partake of their glory. Certainly, the saints of God shall have the best of it, shall have the day of all the world, let the world strive against them as they can. Every man desires to follow the stronger party, and to cleave to that. Would you cleave to the stronger part? Cleave to the saints of God, for certainly they are the stronger part. The church is rising, and will rise more and more till it be risen unto the height. Though there be some opposition, yet it is such as shall make the glory of the day so much the more.

Those men who now stand up to plead for antichrist, and to oppose this work of God, are men born out of time, born in an ill hour. Papists and superstitious people heretofore prospered in their way, because the day of God was not so near, but that was the day of his patience in permitting antichrist to continue. But dost thou resist now? what! superstitious now? what! opposing the work of God now, when God is coming out to fight against popery and superstition, when God is about to do such great things for his churches? Thou fightest against God, and God will fight against thee, and thou shalt be thrown. Thou art born in the worst time that possibly could be, worse than all the adversaries of the truth in former times.

Obs. 2. If there be such a day, let us be willing to suffer a little for a while, and to mourn for the churches a while in that way of mourning to which God calls us, for there is a recompence coming, glory enough coming even in this world. There is a time of triumphing, let us be content with our warfare here for a while.

Obs. 3. Let us study these things. It is useful for people in these times to search into these truths of God, that they may be the better prepared to meet Christ their Bridegroom when he comes. Ezek. xl. 4, speaks of the glorious times of the gospel, especially of these times which I am describing; where God saith to the prophet, "Behold with thine eyes, and hear with thine ears, and set thine heart upon all that I shall show thee." And what did God show him? The measure of the temple, and all the glorious things that should be in the church in future times. So I say to you, my brethren, concerning all I have spoken of the great day of Jezreel; behold with your eyes, look into God's book and see what is said there, and hear with your ears, and set your hearts upon what has been set before you. In Isa. xlii. 20, you have a passage somewhat like this: speaking of the mercies of God to his church in latter times, the prophet saith, "That they may see, and know, and consider, and understand together, that the hand of the Lord hath done this, and the Holy One of Israel hath created it." Mark how one word is heaped upon another, that they may "see, and know, and consider, and understand" what God would do for his people. And when God revealed the glorious things he intended for his church in future times in the book of the Revelation, mark how he begins. It is said, God gave this first to Christ; secondly, Christ to the angel; thirdly, the angel to John; and then there is pronounced a blessing to him that reads and hears the words of this prophecy, and understands it. What a solemn way of blessing is here! There is no instance in the Bible of a blessing so solemnly proclaimed to the reading and hearing of any of the books of God, as to that book. Therefore, though they are things that seem to be above us, yet, certainly, God would have us to inquire into these things. It is the fruit of the purchase of the blood of Christ to open these seals, Rev. v. 9. There was no man in heaven nor in earth that was able to open the book, and to loose the seals thereof; only the Lamb that was slain, and that hath redeemed us unto God by his blood, he was only worthy to open the seals. It is a fruit, I say, of the slaughter of Christ and of his blood, and therefore cry to him to open these things to thee. And though thou art very weak in regard of parts, and thinkest, How can I understand such things as these? know that Christ through his blood comes to open these seals, and seeing it is a fruit of his blood, it is no matter whether thou art weak or strong if he open them to thee. God saith to the prophet, Jer. xxxiii. 2, "Call unto me, and I will show thee great and mighty things which thou knowest not;" so I say to you, be a praying people, call upon God, and he will cause you to understand great and excellent things that you have not known.

Obs. 4. Seeing these things shall be thus, what manner of persons ought we to be! how heavenly our conversation! Our hearts should rise up from the earth, seeing God intends to do such great things for his people. "Arise, shine; for thy light is come, and the glory of the Lord is risen upon thee," Isa. lx. 1. So I say to the churches now, Arise, arise, shake off the dust of your earthly affections, for the light of God is now ready to arise upon you. Now sursum corda, now lift up your hearts above the things of the world. We read in Rev. iv. of the four living creatures that appeared unto John; the first was like a lion, and the second like an ox, and the third had a face as a man, and the fourth was like a flying eagle. They are, according to the interpretation of Brightman, to describe to us the four states and conditions of the church. The primitive times were lion-like for their valour; the second age like an ox, to bear the burden of antichrist; the third had a face as a man, that stood for their liberties, and would not be under slavery, and they are our times; and then the fourth as an eagle that soared aloft. In the state of the church hereafter, they shall be like an eagle, have heavenly hearts, no such drossy, base, earthly hearts as we have now. Labour we even now to be so that we may be fit for that day.

Obs. 5. Let us all prepare for the Bridegroom against his coming. How shall we prepare? The clothing then shall be "white linen, which is the righteousness of the saints." That great doctrine of our justification by the righteousness of Christ shall be the great business of that day, in which the glory of the saints shall much consist; they shall be clothed with that; it shall be clearly understood of all men; they shall be ashamed to rest upon duties and ordinances as now they do. Let us study the doctrine of the righteousness of Christ beforehand, for that is to be our clothing at that day, that is the white linen of the saints which shall be their glory. Let us prepare our lamps, and keep them all burning and shining; the oil not only of justification, but of sanctification, active, stirring in our hearts; that so we may be fit to entertain the Bridegroom whenever he comes.

Obs. 6. All of you labour now to instruct your children in the knowledge of God and of Christ, bring them up in the fear of the Lord, that they may be seed for that day. Acquaint them with these things, for though perhaps you may be dead and gone before this great day, yet they may live to see it; therefore catechise them, and instruct them, and drop into them those principles that may fit them for meeting Jesus Christ their Bridegroom.

Obs. 7. To conclude all, Let us be all praying Christians. It is that which is charged upon us in Isa. lxii. 6, 7, "Ye that make mention of the Lord, keep not silence, and give him no rest, till he establish, and till he make Jerusalem a praise in the earth." God has a day to set up Jerusalem as the praise of the whole earth; O be praying, praying Christians every one of you, and give God no rest till he effect this. Remind God of all his promises, search the prophets, search the book of God, and urge God with these promises to the church. And you that are the weakest, be not discouraged in your prayers, you may be a means to further and hasten this great day of Jezreel. Psal. cii. 17, the psalmist had spoken before of God's building up Zion, (and certainly that psalm is a prophecy of the future, glorious times of the church.) mark what he now saith, "He will regard the prayer of the destitute, and not despise their prayer." Speaking of those who shall live a little before this day of Jezreel, the Lord shall regard the prayer of the destitute. The word הקטיר translated destitute, signifies a poor shrub in the wilderness, that the foot of every beast is ready to tread down; and that poor shrub, that perhaps is despicable in the eyes of the world, and despisable in his own eyes, yet saith the text, the Lord shall regard the prayer of that poor shrub. Is there ever a poor shrub present, though never so destitute or despisable in the eyes of the world, or in thine own eyes? yet be thou a praying Christian, praying for those glorious things for the church, and God will regard thy prayer, he will not despise thy prayer. Perhaps thou art ready to despise thy prayers thyself, but God will not despise them. Let all our hearts be lifted up, and let us all cry with the church, Come, Lord Jesus, come quickly. O let this day come, "for great shall be the day of Jezreel."

CHAPTER II.

Ver. 1. Say ye unto your brethren, Ammi; and to your sisters, Ruhamah.

SOME join the first verse of this chapter to the end of the former; and (according to a sense that may be given of the words, agreeable to the scope of the latter part of the former chapter) it may seem more fit to be made the end of that, than the beginning of this. There God was promising mercy to his people, that those who were not his people should be his people, and those that had not received mercy should receive mercy. Now he calls upon all whose hearts were with God, to speak to one another of this great favour of God to his people, for their mutual encouragement, and for the praise of his name. As if he should say, Well, you have been under dreadful threats of God, your sins have called for severe punishment, but my grace is free, it is rich and powerful, therefore you that were not my people shall become my people; you that had not obtained mercy shall obtain mercy: "Say unto your brethren, Ammi; and to your sisters, Ruhamah;" that is, O you that are godly, speak one to another, and tell one another, for the quickening of one another's hearts, of this great favour of God, his free grace! O say, Ammi, Ammi, the people of God; Ruhamah, God's mercy: we were not his people, but now Ammi again, God has promised to make us his people, we were rejected from mercy, but mercy is come again, now Ruhamah. Oh the mercy of God! oh that free grace of our God! that we who have been so vile, we who have so provoked the eyes of his glory, we who have so sinned against mercy itself, that mercy should thus follow us, to make us his people, and to save us from his wrath! Ammi! Ruhamah!

Obs. 1. It is a good thing to speak of the loving-kindness of our God. "It is a good thing to give thanks unto the Lord, and to sing praises unto thy name, O Most High; to show forth thy loving-kindness in the morning, and thy faithfulness every night," Psal. xcii. 1, 2. That psalm is appointed for the sabbath. It is a work of the sabbath to be speaking one to another of the goodness of God; especially in this case, when a people were afraid that they should have been for ever rejected, and yet God calls them again, Ammi, my people, and says now that he will have mercy upon them. "One generation shall praise thy works to another, and shall declare thy mighty acts: I will speak of the glorious honour of thy majesty, and of thy wondrous works," Psal. cxlv. 4, 5. Mark what the works of God are toward his church, when he comes in the ways of mercy; they are wondrous works of God, they are the mighty acts of God, they are such wherein the honour of God appears, yea, they are the honour of his majesty, yea, they are the glorious honour of his majesty. He displays majesty, honour of majesty, glorious honour of majesty, the mighty works of God, the wonderful works of God. When these appear, these are fit to be declared indeed. And for them to be able to say to one another, Ammi, and Ruhamah, it was to declare the wonderful works of God, and the glorious honour of his majesty. Yea, it follows further in that psalm, ver. 6, "men shall speak of the might of thy terrible acts: and I will declare thy greatness." And ver. 7, "They shall abundantly utter the memory of thy great goodness." Montanus renders it, eructabunt, they shall not be able to keep it in, but break forth in the memory of thy goodness.

Happy are those people to whom God grants such subjects of discourse, that they may say to their brethren and sisters, Ammi, and Ruhamah. It was not long since, that, when we met with our brethren, we could not have such a subject of discourse as this, but usually when Christians met together, after their salutations, their first question was; Oh! what shall we do? what course shall we take? All the news almost in the kingdom, and the subject of discourses, specially among the saints, was this; Such a minister silenced in such a place, such a one banished in another place, such a one imprisoned in another place, such a one high-commissioned in another place, such signs of the wrath of God upon us, we are afraid that God is going, if he be not quite gone already; we are afraid that he will not only reject us from being his people, but reject us from being a people upon the face of the earth.

But, blessed be God, he has changed the subject of our discourses. Now, God's ways have begun to be towards us as if he intended to make us again his people. Now, when we meet together, we have plentiful subjects of discourse about God's grace and mercy; we say, Ammi, Ruhamah, O the Lord manifests goodness to an unworthy nation, we have hope that yet he will own us to be his people, that yet he will show mercy to us, though never so unworthy. Who would have thought to have seen and heard such things as we have seen and heard! who would have thought to have seen the hearts of the adversaries so daunted, their power so curbed, their rage so quelled, the wicked in their own works so insnared, and their hopes so disappointed! Who would have thought to have seen the saints so rejoicing, their liberties so enlarged, their hearts and expectations so raised! This is the free grace of God: Ammi, Ruhamah, we have obtained mercy, God has dealt with us in abundance of grace. But we must not discourse of this when we meet as matter of news only, we must speak of it to the praise of God, for the sanctifying of our hearts.

Our brethren in Ireland have another subject of discourse at this day. When a brother and a sister meet, they say. Oh my father, my mother, taken such a day by the rebels and cruelly massacred; such a kinsman, such a kinswoman, taken such a day and fearfully murdered; such houses were fired, such cities and towns were taken! and with what sorrowful faces do they look one upon another, when they are thus relating these sad things? The word of God came out against England, but it has lighted upon Ireland. O unworthy are we of these mercies which we enjoy, if, when we meet together, our discourses be frothy and light, about vain and trivial things, when God has given us such a subject of discourse as he has done by such gracious, wonderful, and glorious ways of his mercy towards us in this latter age.

Obs. 2. As the mercies of God are to be inculcated upon our spirits, we should not only tell them one to another, but again and again impress them upon our hearts. "Say to your brethren, Ammi; and to your sisters, Ruhamah." Indeed God's mercies at first seem to take impression upon our spirits, but the impression is soon vanished.

Obs. 3. A gracious heart should rejoice in God's mercies towards others. "Say to your brethren:" that is, according to some, Let Judah, to whom God showed special mercy, say to Israel, to the ten tribes, which were more threatened to be cast off from being the people of God, than Judah was. Let Judah rejoice in this, that their brethren are received again to mercy. God's mercies are an infinite ocean, there needs no envying there, no grieving for that which others have. When one man is richer than another, another is ready rather to envy him than to rejoice. A courtier envies the favour another has at court; why? because these are narrow things. But when we come to God's mercy, there is room enough there; that soul which has been made partaker of mercy, counts it a great happiness when in any way the mercy of God is magnified.

Obs. 4. Those whom God has received unto mercy, we should receive into brotherly affection. "Say to your brethren and sisters:" has God showed mercy to such and such, well may we account them our brethren and sisters then. If God takes them to mercy, we must be ready willingly to take them into brotherly society.

But if we take these words as the beginning of the second chapter, we shall see them interpreted in a different way. And taking them so, as most do, I shall first show you the scope of the chapter in the parts of it, and then in what sense the words may be expounded, as the beginning of this chapter.

The scope of this second chapter is much according to that of the first, viz. to show to Israel their sin and danger; and, secondly, to promise God's abundant grace and mercy again. The first is especially from the beginning to the 14th verse; and the second from the 14th verse to the end of the chapter.

Yet this is not an exact division, neither can we give one, more than we could give of the other chapter, because things are so intermixed. They are the pathetic expressions of a loving, and yet a provoked, husband. He is convincing his spouse who has dealt falsely with him, and showing her her sin and danger; but whilst he is manifesting his displeasure, the bowels of his compassion begin to yearn, and he must use some expressions of love in the midst of all; then, when he has had some expressions of love, he again rebukes her and shows her her sin, and then his bowels yearn, and he returns to expressions of love again. We have found it so in the former chapter, and shall find it so in this: for though the beginning of this chapter, to the 14th verse, is specially spent in convincing of sin and threatening of judgment, yet in the 6th and 7th verses there are promises of mercy and favour, and expressions of love; and then in the 8th verse he threatens again, and in the 14th verse begins to express mercy again.

As God acts in this case, so should we. When we rebuke others we should manifest love to them; and when we manifest love, to do it so as to take notice of what is amiss, and to reprove them. Many parents know not how to rebuke their children, they do it with nothing but bitterness; and they know not how to manifest their love, they do it with nothing but fondling and immoderate indulgence. God unites both together.

What then must be the sense and the scope of the words, "Say to your brethren, Ammi," &c. Something must be supplied for making up the full sense. As if God had said, O Ammi, you whom I have reserved to be my people, you to whom I have showed mercy, there yet is remaining a handful of you; while you remain to be my people, and others cast off, and you obtaining mercy, and others rejected, let it be your care to exhort, persuade, convince, and to use all the means you can to bring your brethren and sisters to that grace of God which you have received. "Say to your brethren:" say; it is not expressed what they should say, but by that which follows we may understand what the meaning of God is. When he saith, "Plead with your mother," &c., that is, You, the remnant, that have received mercy, and are my people, do not think that, so long as you escape, and are well enough yourselves, it is no great matter what becomes of others; O no, but let your hearts be much toward your brethren and sisters, let your bowels yearn toward them. O seek, if it be possible, to draw them unto God, that they may receive mercy too; labour to convince them; say, and speak to them, that they may not yet stand out against God and be obstinate: "Say to your brethren, Ammi, and to your sisters, Ruhamah."

Obs. 1. That in the most corrupt times God usually reserves a people, to deliver some from the guilt of the general corruptions of the place where they live. This Ammi and Ruhamah were a remainder, whom God delivered through his grace from the general corruptions of the place where they lived; for otherwise they had not been fit to have said to their brethren, or to have spoken to their sisters, in this sense.

Obs. 2. Those whom God delivers from the guilt of general corruptions, are to be acknowledged the people of God. Such as have received mercy from God in a special manner. It is free grace that has made this difference between you and others.

Obs. 3. The Lord takes special notice of those who are thus by his grace preserved in evil times. Ammi, Ruhamah. There are a people among these that are Ammi, my people, that have obtained mercy from me, mine eyes are upon them, my heart is toward them; there is a number who have kept their garments undefiled even in Sardis, and I will remember this for ever for their good. "Noah was a just man and perfect in his generations," Gen. vi. 9; and what then? chap. vii. 1, "Come thou and all thy house into the ark; for thee have I seen righteous before me in this generation."

Obs. 4. Such as keep themselves from the corruptions of the times wherein they live, they, and only they, are fit to exhort and reprove others. Those that are not guilty themselves as others are, are fit to speak to others, to say to their brethren and to their sisters. They are fit to exhort, who perform the duties themselves that they exhort unto. We say it is a shameful thing for one to be teaching, if he be guilty himself; he cannot with freedom of spirit say to his brethren and sisters, Ammi.

Obs. 5. It is the duty of those whom God has delivered from the corruption of the times, to seek to draw all others to God; to seek to convince others of their evil ways, and so bring them in to the truth. We read, Lev. xix. 17, "Thou shalt not hate thy brother in thine heart: thou shalt in any wise rebuke thy neighbour, and not suffer sin upon him." Surely those who have obtained mercy, and have the impression of God's mercy upon their spirits, are far from having hateful hearts; now it is hatred for any to suffer sin to lie upon his brother, and not to do what in him lies to help him. It is desperate pride for men to triumph over others in their falls, and it is wicked cruelty to suffer others to lie down when they are fallen, if they can raise them. Seafaring men, who are delivered themselves from shipwreck, and all is safe with them, if they see another ship ready to sink in the sea, and those on ship-board cry out to them to come to help to save them, though they be never so far remote, yet if it should be known that they decline to go out to help them, all the seamen would cry out shame on such, and be ready to stone them for letting a ship sink when they might have helped. Certainly it is the same case with those to whom God has showed mercy, if others lie in their sins, and they do not what they can for their help.

Obs. 6. The nearer the relation of any persons is to us, the more should our compassion be towards them, in seeking to deliver them from their sins. "Say to your brethren, and to your sisters." There is more likelihood of prevailing with your brethren and sisters. Has God converted you, and have you a brother or a sister not converted, or any of your kindred? go, and tell them of the danger of their evil ways, tell them of the excellency of the ways of God, exhort them to come in, and to make trial of the blessed ways of God. When a brother speaks to a brother, or a sister to a sister, it is the bringing a hammer of gold to work upon gold, and of silver to work upon silver.

Obs. 7. Exhortations to and reprehensions of others, should be given with much love and meekness. "Say to your brethren and sisters." Look upon them as brethren and sisters, though they have not yet obtained the like mercy that you have. St. Paul, 2 Thess. iii. 15, speaking of one that walks inordinately, from whom we are to withdraw in familiar society, yet, saith he, "admonish him as a brother." Those who reprove and admonish others with bitterness of spirit and evil speaking, are like a foolish fowler, who seeks to get the fowl, but goes boisterously, and makes a noise: the way, if he would get it, is to go on quietly, softly, and gently; so the way to gain a brother, is not by boisterousness and violence, but softness, and gentleness. It is observed by some of the Jews concerning Exod. xxv. 3, where the matter of the tabernacle is said to be gold, and silver, and brass, still you do not hear of iron required for the building of it; no, iron, rigid, severe, hard dispositions, are not fit either to be matter of the tabernacle themselves, or to draw others to be the matter of it.

Yea, but if saying will not be enough to do the deed, then follows pleading. That is the second. Say to them, admonish them, exhort them, but what if that will not do? do not leave them immediately, but "plead," yea, and "plead with your mother," too, not only with your brethren and with your sisters, but with your mother.

Ver. 2. Plead with your mother, plead: for she is not my wife, neither am I her husband: let her therefore put away her whoredoms out of her sight, and her adulteries from between her breasts;

יִבְרַח Plead, Litigate, so some, Contendite, Strive; the Vulgate reads Judicate, Judge your mother. It may seem to be a harsh phrase at first, but we shall labour to acquaint you with the mind of God in it. Here is an exhortation to the private members of the church, to all, one or other, to plead with their mother, to plead even with the church of which they are members, and so to plead as to deal plainly, and to tell her that she is not the wife of God.

Obs. 1. Here we see God's condescension, that he will have us plead the case betwixt others and himself, as Isa. v. 3, "Judge, I pray you, betwixt me and my vineyard." This shows the equity of God's dealing. Plead the case; perhaps some of you might think I deal hardly with your mother in so rejecting her, and in bringing such judgments upon her. No, not so, but plead you the case, plead rather with her, than complain of me for my dealing with her.

Obs. 2. When exhortations and admonitions will not do, we must strengthen ourselves by pleading. If there be any way more powerful than exhortation and admonition, we should take that way, and not presently give over; for though it is not said here, Plead with your brothers and sisters, yet they are included in this, when he saith "Plead with your mother."

Obs. 3. It is a hard thing to convince idolaters of their sin, and of the justice of God coming against them for their sin. "Plead with your mother, plead;" she will not acknowledge it, she will stand it out, and say she has not done so ill, she is not worthy to be cast off; you had need plead, and plead hard with her. Idolaters have so many distinctions, evasions, and pretences, that it is a thousand to one if you prevail with them. When you deal with papists about worshipping of images, they will have such distinctions of worship per se, and worship per accidens, of honouring the creature propter se, et propter aliud, proprie, improprie, and a hundred of such distinctions and evasions, till they distinguish away the truth, and scarce understand themselves what they mean by their distinctions. Hence, idolaters scorn at judgments threatened, they think only a company of foolish and timorous people fear such things; they cry out, Say they that we are idolaters, and that grievous judgements of God are coming upon us? a company of foolish, melancholy people, they fear their own fancies! Was it not so heretofore, when we were going on in the ways of idolatry apace? Was it not the jeer and scorn of all such spirits? If any seem but to question about idolatry, they would never be convinced of such a sin, nor ever fear any judgment hanging over our heads. Though God has prevented it through his grace, and has showed his prerogative in the ways of his mercy, yet certainly there was sign enough of dreadful wrath hanging over us, and what yet may be we know not.

Reliqui mihi septem milia, non autem reliqua sunt vel reliquarum se, sed reliqui; reliquum per electionem gratiae. August. de Bon. Pers. l. 2. c. 18.

Turpe est doctorem, cum culpa redarguit ipsum.

Obs. 4. God loves to have people dealt with in a convincing way. "Plead with your mother, plead." It is a forensic word, and carries with it such a kind of pleading as must be convincing and powerful. The Lord does not declare to the prophet, or to those other good people who were free from idolatry, that the people of Israel were generally corrupted; he does not bid them go and terrify them, and speak bitterly to them; but go and plead the cause with them, seek to convince them, not rail upon them, but convince them. God loves to have people dealt with in a convincing way. Let not therefore any one think it enough, either minister or layman, that he can speak terribly to people, and cry out against their sins; but let him labour to convince them, to deal with them as rational creatures, and to take away their secret objections and shifts, and to make their sins plain before their consciences. A convincing preacher, and a convincing Christian, is such a one as may be very useful, and do abundance of good to the church of God.

Obs. 5. It is very fit that God should have some to plead for him, to plead his cause, as well as Satan has to plead his. The devil never wants pleaders. When did there ever such a bad cause come to a bench, or to any society, but found some that would plead for it? A shame that the worst cause in the world should have pleaders for it, and many times the cause of God suffers by men being mute. God will take this very ill at their hands. It is true, God saith he will plead his own cause, and we are bound to pray, according to the psalmist, that God would "arise and plead his own cause." And indeed, if God had not risen and pleaded his own cause better than we did, his cause would have been in the dirt before this. God is raising up his own cause, no thanks to us; we have cause to lay our hands upon our mouths as guilty, in that we so basely and cowardly let the cause of God suffer; and God appearing so immediately and gloriously, is the rebuking of us because we did not, we would not, before stand up to plead his cause.

Obs. 6. When any have found mercy from God, the sweetness of that mercy so warms their hearts, that they cannot endure to see that blessed God dishonoured. Plead you, Ammi, Ruhamah: What, my people, those to whom I have showed mercy, what though it be your mother, what though it be any dear to you, what though they be great ones, what though they be a multitude, yet plead, plead for me against them. God's mercy is so sweet, it so inflames them, that they must plead for God against any in the world.

"Plead with your mother." That is, with the church, called a mother, because, as the mother is as it were the root from whence children come, and divides herself into branches; so the community of a commonwealth or a church is called in Scripture a mother, and the particular members are as several branches that grow from that root, they are as children. Therefore you have such expressions in Scripture, as "the daughters of Jerusalem;" and there is no great difference between calling Jerusalem which is the state, mother, or Jerusalem which is the church, mother; for indeed the church and state were mixed both together. Learn hence,

Obs. 7. It is lawful for children to plead with their parents. Though it is true, this aims at something higher than what is between natural children and their parents, yet from the expression this is intimated and implied, That it is lawful for children to plead with their parents. If children see their parents in an ungodly way, they may lawfully plead with them, and their parents are bound to hearken to their pleading God's cause. It is a speech of Tertullian's, The begetter is to be beloved, and we may add, he is to be honoured, but our Creator is to be preferred. Children must give due respect to their parents, yet so, as preferring the Lord before them; and if the parents go against God, even their children must plead against them. As it is a great sin for parents to prefer their children before God, so it is a great sin for children to prefer their parents before God.

Do not think I aim to set children against their parents, be but content to hear to the end, and you will be convinced that it is fit for children to plead with their parents when they go from God. Thus we see it was with Jonathan, 1 Sam. xix. 4; he pleaded with his father, when he saw him in such a passionate mood and cruel spirit toward poor David. "Let not the king sin against his servant, against David." "Let not the king," he gives him very respectful words, and shows his due honour to his father: "Let not the king sin against his servant," and then goes on and tells his father of the good service David had done, and that David did not deserve such ill usage from him. Thus, when children see their fathers or mothers in a passion, it is fit enough for them in a humble, submissive manner to say, I beseech you, father, or mother, consider that by these distempered passions, instead of helping yourself, you sin against God; you know by experience, that often in such passion many sins have broken from you, and you have grieved for it afterwards, oh do not again that which your conscience has so often checked you for. If children thus plead with their parents, they do no more than their duty, and their parents are bound to hearken to them. I confess, they should be very careful to preserve due respect to their parents, and not speak pertly, but with all reverence and submission; and privately too, if possible, not to divulge their parents' weaknesses. You know Ham was cursed for discovering his father's nakedness, though he was drunk, he did not show due respect at that time to him; but if he had sought to cover his father's nakedness, and after had come and pleaded the case with him, certainly he had not been cursed, but received a blessing.

Yea, and there is a great deal of reason that children should plead with their parents, and that you should give them leave so to do, because, you know, children are the worse for your sins, God threatens to "visit the sins of the parents upon the children, to the third and fourth generation;" there are many threatenings against children for the sins of their parents, therefore it concerns your children that they should plead with you, and that you should suffer them. For if you say, Sirrah, what have you to do with me? what does it concern you? Yes, the child, if he does it in modesty and humility, may say, O father, it does concern me, I may fare the worse for your sins; God may come upon me for them; therefore give me leave, I beseech you, to plead the cause of God with you. And if you will not give your children leave in this, they may rise up as witnesses against you another day.

It is a very suitable and powerful pleading, that when children cannot prevail by humble and submissive addresses, then to plead with tears. We read that when Cranmer and Ridley came to King Edward the Sixth, and were so earnest that he should give way to his sister, the Lady Mary, to have mass, he stood out and pleaded the case with them, and told them it was a sin against God. They used many carnal arguments to persuade the king, but he withstood them a great while. At length, when King Edward, who was but about fifteen years of age, saw he could not prevail by pleading with words against those grave men, he burst into tears, and that so prevailed with them, that they went away, and concluded that the king had more divinity in his little finger than they had in all their bodies, and so yielded to him. Certainly, in such pleadings, the heart of a parent must needs be much hardened if he will not break and yield to his child.

You that are parents, look upon your children's pleading with you, and consider with yourselves, What! does God send one of my children to come and plead the cause of God with me, to draw me from the ways of sin, and to do good to my soul for ever? surely it is a merey to have one out of my own bowels to stand for the cause of God; surely God is in it; I see this child in other things walks humbly and obediently unto me. As indeed you children, that plead with your parents, need be careful so much the rather to be obedient to them, and not use an unseemly manner to check and reprove them; and then it cannot but convince the heart of a parent. What a blessing will it be to you children, if you, who have received your natural life from your parents, should be a means of their spiritual and eternal life!

Obs. 9. The members of a state and church should behave towards it as children to a mother. They should have the affection of children to it, they should take much to heart those things that concern it, the sufferings of state or church should be the sufferings of all its members. There are children of Belial risen up among us, a viperous generation, who are even tearing the bowels of our mother; let our hearts break for this, as Psal. xxxv. 14, "I bowed down heavily, as one that mourneth for his mother." Let us not lift up our heads and be merry now, but for the present bow down heavily, as those that are called, though in some respects to rejoice, yet, in many others, to mourn this day for our mother. Yea, let our hearts rise against those vile monsters that join with a party to bring such woeful confusion and trouble to our mother. We may say to them justly, as Saul said to Jonathan passionately, "You children of the rebellious and perverse, why have you chosen to join with them to your own confusion, and to the confusion of your mother's nakedness?" Let us do what we can to help. Shall we see her bowels torn, and not stir at all? She calls now to us to come and help her, and lets us know that if it go ill with her it cannot go well with us. If the mother's breast, through some incurable disease, must be cut off, the tender father takes away the children, and will not suffer them to behold the torture of their mother. Who knows but that this has been God's end in taking away his dear children in former times, because he would not have their tender hearts see so much sorrow and evil as should befall their mother? And what God has reserved for us to see in the sufferings of our mother, we do not know. However, let her not suffer by us, let her not suffer for want of our help, let her not suffer without us, let us not be so unnatural as every one to be shifting for himself, neglecting our mother, that should be as dear to us as the bowels out of which we came.

Obs. 10. Those that are godly should not only devote themselves to do good to themselves or friends in private, but they are to labour to do good to the public also. Not only say to your sisters and your brethren, but "plead with your mother." There are many narrow-spirited men, who, if they can discharge, as they think, their consciences with their families, and can plead with their servants and children, or some of their own near acquaintance, they have done enough, though for the public they take no care at all.

Obs. 11. It is apparently implied, that all those who are members of any church ought to be men of knowledge. Why? because they are such as are called upon to plead with their mother. It is not for an ignorant sot to plead with a church of God. The members of every church, therefore, should be enlightened, as in some cases they must plead with their mother.

Obs. 12. God gives liberty to some private members of churches, yea, it is their duty in some cases to plead with the whole church. This we must speak of a little more. God's ways and his cause are so equal, that private Christians, though they are very weak, yet they may be able to plead with a church. It is true, a poor, weak, private Christian has a great disadvantage when he is to deal with a whole church, where there are many godly and learned; but if there is a disadvantage one way, the advantage is as much the other way, as the cause of God is on the one side, and not on the other. The goodness of the cause is as great an advantage, as the abilities and number on the other side is a disadvantage. And sometimes particular members of a church have no other way to free themselves from the guilt of the sins of the church, but by pleading with them.

Yea, and sometimes God has blessed the pleading of some few, and of weak ones too, with a multitude. Perhaps you may have heard of that notable story we have in ecclesiastical history of Paphnutius, who being in the council of Nice, where there were three hundred and eighteen bishops, and the business was about the marriage of ministers; generally they decided, that those who were single should not marry. Paphnutius alone pleads against them all in that case, and God so wrought, that he carried the cause, and he, one man, convinced all these three hundred and eighteen bishops. Therefore it is no discouragement for one man to stand up and plead against a great many. So Petrus Waldensis, in the story of the Waldenses, though he was but one at first, yet he stood against many thousands, and God blessed that which he did for the conversion of thousands. And Luther, you know, stood against almost all the world.

Yea, and though this one man may be but a private man, a weak man, God may bless that which he saith sometimes more than that which more learned men shall say. I have read in the Centuries this story: A company of bishops being met together, there was a philosopher that stood out against the Christian religion, and so reasoned against them all, that he seemed to have the better of it. Amongst them there was one very godly and holy man, but a very weak man; he, seeing the cause of God likely to suffer, desired leave to speak and encounter this philosopher. All the rest were troubled at it, thinking that God's cause would suffer more by him, knowing that he was a very weak man; but yet, knowing withal that he was a very holy man, none would oppose, but let him speak. So he began with the philosopher, reciting many articles of the faith; Tell me, said he, with majesty and authority, do you believe that these things are so? do not so reason the case about these articles of our faith, but do you believe? Presently the philosopher acknowledged himself overcome. Hitherto, said he, I have heard words, and returned words, but now I feel the Divine power, and I cannot further answer; and so yielded to be a Christian upon the pleading of this audivi et verba red-dididi, sed cum divina virtus accessit, ultra respondere

Hactenus verba
non potui.

poor weak man, yet a very holy and godly man. God has blessed the pleading of weak ones, though against those that are very strong, therefore they must not be contemned.

Ecclampadius saith,* Christ would be contemned and dishonoured, if we would not hear, were it but a child speaking with his Spirit, though all the world should be against it. And in Isa. xi. 6, there is a promise, that in the times of the gospel the spirits of men should be so brought down, that they should not stand upon their greatness and learning, but "a little child should lead them;" that is the humble temper that God would have under the gospel.

But it may be said, Will not this argue self-conceit? What! for one man, a private man, to plead with so many, with a church? It is a sign that such a one is very opinionated, that should think that what he apprehends is sufficient to stand against the apprehension of so many learned and godly men as are in the church. How can this be freed from arrogance and proud conceitedness? I answer, not so, it may be conscience, and not self-conceit, for the rule of conscience is not the abilities, nor the holiness, nor the multitude of others, but it is that light that God lets in to convince according to his word. Nay, further, I suppose I may convince you that this pleading for God may proceed from much self-denial, and the not pleading may proceed from vile, sinful self-respect. How will that appear? Thus: for a private man when he sees the truth of God suffer, if he be of a humble and an ingenuous spirit, it cannot but be exceeding grievous to him to think, that he must contest with such a multitude of able and godly men. He would rather a hundred times, if he looked at his own quiet and ease, sit down: For, thinks he, if I speak, by this I shall be endangered to be accounted self-conceited, I shall have the accusation of pride, I shall displease many of my friends, I shall make a great disturbance in myself; I am sure of my own peace, whatever I do to others, and how much better were it for me to sit still and be quiet. A humble spirit would reason thus, but conscience puts him upon it: I shall contract guilt to myself if I be not, at least, a witness for God's truth; therefore though I shall suffer so much in it, yet, rather than the truth shall suffer, rather than conscience shall plead against me, I will plead, though never so much to my disadvantage. Now, if such a one carry it humbly and quietly, certainly he is rather to be accounted a self-denying man; for it is a very hard task. Whereas, on the other side, self-love is more likely to think thus: It is true, these things are not right, I see they are not according to the truth of God. Conscience indeed would have me speak, but I shall trouble-myself, and what will they think of me on the other side, where there are so many able and godly men? surely I shall be thought a conceited fool, and therefore I were as good hold my peace, and sleep in a whole skin, and be quiet. Thus because they have so much self-respect, and love their own quiet, and cannot endure to suffer any trouble, they will leave the truth to suffer, and their consciences to be pleading against themselves, rather than thus plead for the cause of God.

* Contemneretur ecclesia Christi, si vel unum puellum ejus Divino Spiritu loquentem non audiremus, etiamsi omnes red- clament. Ecclampadius.

Certainly they that are charitable would rather take things in the better part, than in the evil. It is possible that a man may through pride of spirit plead with others, but yet you may perceive it in the general course of his conduct. Now if, in the general course of a man, he carries himself humbly and submissively, so that you see him yielding as much as he can in all lawful things, and when he pleads against an evil he is not sudden, nor rash, nor pleads against every light evil, but approaches it with trouble in his spirit, and carries it with all quietness and humility; it is your rigidness, and that spirit which does not besem a Christian, which is not the spirit of Christ in this thing, to judge this to be pride. For certainly under this false judgment the cause of God has suffered much.

You will say, How can it be imagined, that one man should see more than many, more than others equally able? To that I answer, In a community, where there are many, though they should be godly, yet many of them may have their spirits biassed with prejudice and self-ends, and so not come to see the truth, though they are more able. Again; perhaps, though they may be more able in most things, yet in some one thing God may leave them; yea, though they may be more able at other times, yet for some one time God may leave a man in a thing that he is very able in at another time. And perhaps a great many of them for the present may have so much distemper of spirit, as they may not speak according to what they think themselves. Therefore it may be useful for some one man to be pleading with many others.

I beseech you consider this, it is very useful. Men must not think that God dispenses the knowledge of his truth always according to natural abilities. For want of this consideration many are led into much evil. For they think with themselves, if a man have more ability to understand natural things than others have, therefore he must needs have more ability to understand spiritual things than others have. This is a mistake. A learned man may have great abilities, and understand the rules of nature, yet a poor weak man may have the mind of Christ more than he has. For the promise is to them that fear God: "The secret of the Lord is with them that fear him," Psal. xxv. 14. It may be another man has more abilities, but his spirit may be more distempered than the poor weak man's. "I thank thee, O Father, Lord of heaven and earth, because thou hast hid these things from the wise and prudent, and hast revealed them unto babes. Even so, Father: for so it seemed good in thy sight," Matt. xi. 25. 26.

If multitudes had been an argument against the truth, then in the primitive times, when the Christian religion began, certainly very few would have followed Jesus Christ. Yea, and there is not more disadvantage and disproportion between one or two private members of a church and the whole church, than there was at that time between the whole church and the world. St. John saith, "We know that we are of God, and the whole world lieth in wickedness," 1 John v. 19. "We know:" what a singular spirit was here! here was singularity indeed, if you talk of singularity; you are afraid you should be counted self-conceited and singular in differing from others. "We know that we are of God, and the whole world lieth in wickedness."

Thus we see the thing a little cleared, as this point had need be, but we have not yet done with it. There must be some rules given, or otherwise we should wrong the point in naming it.

Christians may plead with their mother, yet they must observe these rules.

First, They must not plead with her for every light thing; for the Scripture gives us this rule, "Love covereth a multitude of sins." We must not stand pleading for every infirmity with our brother, but rather pass by many and cover them; much less then with the church. But if there be that which is notorious, so that I cannot have communion with them, and I shall be wrapped up in the guilt except I testify the truth, certainly then I am bound to plead.

Secondly, It must be orderly done; that is, if possible, you must make the officers of the church to be your mouth in pleading. I say, if it can be. If it come to declaring the evil to the church, it should rather be by him whom God has appointed to be his mouth to the church; for you do it in God's name, therefore the most orderly way to do it, if it may be done, is by him that is God's mouth.

Thirdly, It must be so as you must manifest all due respect to the church; showing in your carriage, that you are apprehensive and sensible, even at this time, of that distance that is between you and that whole society whereof you are a member.

Fourthly, You must do it in a very peaceable way, so as to manifest that you desire peace, and not to be the least disturbance to the peace of the church, but that the peace of it is dear and precious to you. Therefore, when you have witnessed the truth, and discharged your conscience, you must be then content to sit down quiet, for so the rule is in that case; that the spirits of the prophets must be subject to the prophets. But if it should prove that the church continues the evil, after all means used and all patience exercised in such a case, you may desire to be dismissed from it, and depart; but in as peaceable a way as possible, continuing due respect to the church, though you should depart, only leaving your witness behind you.

The papists cry out against us for pleading against them, and say it is an ill bird that will defile its own nest, and they tell us the curse of Ham is upon us for discovering our parent's nakedness. They are to know this, that there is more liberty for a member of a church to plead with a church, than for a child to plead with his parent. Though there be liberty for a child, yet there is more liberty for the member of a church. For a parent, though he should be never so evil, yet he does not lose his right over his child. Though your parents should be very wicked, yet know, that their wickedness does not discharge you of your duty; that all children should take notice of. But a church may so fall off from God, as that the members of it may be free from their duty to it, and therefore may have more liberty to plead, than a child with his parent. And certainly, so far have they fallen from God, when they discharge those that plead against them.

Well, but if a member may plead with a church, with their mother; certainly, then, there is no one member of a church so high, but he may be pleaded with by another; yea, any that is an officer of a church may be pleaded with, even by private people in that church. Col. iv. 17, "Say to Archippus, Take heed to thy ministry." It is an exhortation to all the church, to say to Archippus, and admonish him to look to his ministry. For though the officer of a church be nearer to Christ the Head than other members are, as the arm is nearer the head than the hand; yet if the arm shall send forth any thing to the hand that it has not from the head, (as in a flux of putrid humours that rest in the arm,) then it would be the strength of the hand to resist those ill humours which the arm sends forth. So if any officer of the church shall send forth that which he did not receive from the Head, to any member, but some putrid humour of his own, it is the virtue of that member to resist the receiving of any such humour.

It is the pride of many that scorn any private person's pleading. Pride in men, which, through want of that right order which should be in all churches, is grown to such a height, that those who take to themselves, as proper, the name of clergy, think it a dishonour to them for any one who is not a clergyman to speak to them or admonish them, or to reason with them about any thing; or when they have preached, to come to them for further satisfaction in somewhat that they have delivered; or if they be negligent in their duty, to tell them of it, though never so submissively and meekly; their pride makes them rise so high. And observe, that they do so upon the ground that they are the clergy, which signifies God's inheritance and God's lot, and so contemn others as inferior. You shall find in Scripture, that the people are called clergy in distinction from the ministers, and never the ministers in the New Testament in distinction from the people, the word κληρος is not attributed to them to my remembrance, but I am sure it is attributed to the congregation, to the private members, by way of distinction from them. That you see in 1 Pet. v. 3, "Neither as being lords over God's heritage." Μηδ' ὡς κατακυριεύοντες τῶν κληρῶν, not lording it over God's clergy, over God's lot. Certainly, that exhortation is addressed to the officers of the church, that they must not lord it over God's inheritance, that is, over God's clergy. The word κληρός, therefore, from whence clergy comes, is, you see, attributed to the people. We find in Acts xviii. 24, that Apollos, "an eloquent man and mighty in the Scriptures," and a man of a fervent spirit, permitted Aquila and Priscilla, who were private people, to take him unto them, and expound to him the way of God more perfectly." Where have you an Apollos now, an eloquent man, a scholar, a great clergyman, but would scorn and contemn a poor man and his wife, who should attempt to take him home and instruct him in the way of God more perfectly? Yet Apollos, an eloquent man and mighty in the Scriptures, took it well, and was willing to receive further instruction from these people. And we find, Cant. v., that in the time of the reformation of the church, the church went to the watchmen, and the watchmen beat her, she had more relief from the daughters of Jerusalem than from them.

There may, however, be a notorious abuse of both these, and it is exceedingly difficult for a people to understand their liberty without abusing of it, either against the church, or against the officers of a church. This power may be abused by persons, who in pride, arrogance, and a spirit of contention, take delight in contradiction. There are many people of such a humour, that it is their very delight to contradict, and they think they are nobody except they have somewhat to say against their officers, or against what is delivered; and upon that very ground will quarrel not out of mere conscience, but that it may appear to others that they see farther than other men. And if they be in a community, they conceive that every one would think them nobody if they say nothing, therefore, that they may appear to be somebody, they will find fault, though they scarce understand what they say, or whereof they affirm, showing their disapprobation in a virulent spirit, and insulting those whom God has set over them. Certainly, this is a gross and abominable thing, whereas the rule of Christ is, "Rebuke not an elder, but entreat him as a father," 1 Tim. v. 1; do not think that because you may plead with them, and God's cause may suffer by your silence, that therefore you may rebuke them in an undecent and unseemly manner. You may indeed go in a humble manner, acknowledging the distance betwixt you and him, he being an officer, and so "entreat him as a father." Do many of you so when you go and reason the case with a minister, whom you yourselves will acknowledge to be an officer of Christ? It may be that sometimes, through bitterness of spirit, you cast them off from being officers of Christ before you have sufficient warrant for it; and therefore the apostle saith in the same chapter, ver. 19, "Against an elder receive not an accusation but before two or three witnesses:" mark, you must not "receive an accusation," much less a condemnation, for the credit and honour of the ministers of Christ are very dear and precious unto him; therefore take heed how, through a violent and turbulent spirit, you cast any dishonour upon those whom Christ has set over you.

Thus I have endeavoured to discover the truth to you, and so limited as I hope it may be for edification, and not for injury to any.

"She is not my wife, neither am I her husband." This pleading has much bitterness in it, yet it is in as fair terms as can be set out. "She is not my wife." He does not bid them say to their mother, she is a harlot, but, "she is not my wife." You will say, Why? what difference is there between her not being his wife, and her being a harlot? May we not call things as they are? True, the thing is the same, but hence the Spirit of God teaches us, that those who plead against others must not give ill terms, especially when they plead against superiors; you may declare your minds fully, but in as fair, modest, comely, and the least provoking terms possible. It is a foul evil in many, if they see ministers or churches act improperly, to give reviling speeches; they cry out, There is one of Baal's priests; every thing they dislike they call antichristian; whereas they should study if there be any term more mollifying than another, and use that: although the fault you plead against might bear a harsher term if rebuked by one in authority, yet they who are but private Christians should be very careful, in the fairest, gentlest terms to reprove what they dislike.

"She is not my wife." That a people who have been God's people, may prove not to be God's people, we have already met with in the former chapter. We shall not speak of it as then we did. Only now we have it more fully, that a church may come to be un-church'd. This is a difficult case. When I began this prophecy of Hosea, though I had spent some time in it before, I little thought to have met with so many things so fully presented to me as I have found, that, by God's providence, so nearly concern us and the times. I would not violently introduce any thing but what is so presented to us, but I should injure the Scripture, and you, not to notice it. We have already met with difficult points, and this also is exceeding difficult. I desire in this to interpret as I have done, your own consciences witnessing with me as in the other, without the least spirit of contention and division, or meddling with controversies, but laying the truth in the principles of it plainly before you.

When may a church, that had God before to be her Husband, come not to have God to be her Husband?

I confess that I cannot find any thing to pitch upon certainly, when the Jewish church ceased to be a church, but this; either when God sent them a bill of divorce by some extraordinary men, (as they always had some prophets amongst them,) or when they wholly left off the schoolmaster which God put them under; for I find that their idolatry was not enough actually to cut them off from being a church. It is true their idolatry deserved it; they broke the marriage bond by their idolatry, but God did not always take advantage of that, and always send them a bill of divorce when they committed idolatry. These ten tribes had been idolaters a long time before God said to them they were not his wife. Therefore, idolatry merely did not cut off the Jews. Neither do I think that all idolatry (if it be through ignorance) cuts off a church now in the time of the Christians. The Lutherans are certainly guilty of idolatry by consequence, and so other churches may be through ignorance, and yet they do not cease to be churches. Therefore, in the time of the Jews, I say I do not find any particular sin that actually cut them off, so long as they kept under the pedagogy of the law; unless God by some extraordinary messenger sent them a bill of divorce, they yet remained the people of God. "Where is the bill of your mother's divorcement?" saith God, Isa. l. i. It is true you have deserved it; but where is it? I have not given you a bill of divorce; therefore they were a church.

But for the time of the gospel, this I think may very safely be asserted, that so long as there is a communion of saints embodied, holding forth the profession of all fundamental truths, and joining in all ordinances as far as they are convinced, this multitude, though it should have abundance of corruptions, though many wicked be mingled amongst them, yet they are a church of God. Though they should not set up all ordinances, though perhaps, through ignorance, they are not convinced that such an ordinance is an ordinance of God; yea, though they be convinced that it is an ordinance, and yet perhaps they are not convinced that it is God's mind they should set it up, though this should be their error, yet this communion of saints embodied remains a true church of Christ. Yet, though it be a true church of Christ, it may be such a church, that perhaps you, or I, or another, cannot have communion with.

You will say, How is that possible for any church to be a true church of Christ, and yet we may not have communion with it? I answer, communion we may have, so far as to acknowledge it to be a church, and to have communion in some duties; but it may be a true church of Christ, and I may acknowledge it so, and yet not have communion in all ordinances. In what cases may that be? First, if this church shall so mingle any ordinance, any work of their public communion, as I for the present cannot join without contracting guilt upon me, as not seeing God's will in it, I cannot have communion with them in such ordinances. Yea, secondly, if a church shall require me to yield in my judgment, and subscribe to such things as I cannot satisfy my conscience in, they put me off communion with them. It is not my fault, but they violently keep me off. Thirdly, when they shall not suffer me to do the duty that God requires of me, I cannot have communion with them; because if I should join with them, not doing my duty which my conscience tells me I am bound to do, I thereby contract guilt. Nay, further, a man may be of a church, and perhaps they may not be so ill, but it may be lawful to have communion with them in many ordinances, and yet, for those who are free, and are not by any special call of God tied to such a place, they are bound in conscience in some cases not to join with them, as members, in a constant way. As thus:

(1.) When I cannot enjoy all ordinances with them, but God opens a door to another place where I may have communion in all ordinances, I may receive sacraments with them occasionally, and yet not be constantly with them as a member of that church. If God did shut the door that I could not enjoy all ordinances any where, then it were better to join with a church that has not all, though I do but enjoy some.

(2.) When God offers me elsewhere that I may enjoy the ordinances with more power, purity, and freedom of spirit, and I am not tied; then, if there be nothing but outward accommodations that shall cast the balance on the one hand, and the purity and power of the ordinances on the other, if I shall rather choose the one than the other, it will be apparent that I love my body better than my soul. In this case conscience bids me to show more respect to my soul than my body. This can be no controversy, for it is generally acknowledged by all, that if one will but remove his residence from one parish to another, he may go and join with that parish. But that which I affirm is not so far as that; I only suppose that a man is free, and not yet actually joined; then he should regard more the purity and power of the ordinances than outward accommodations.

Obs. 1. The end of all pleading and exhortation, is reformation, and not contention.

Plead with her; to what end? "let her put away her whoredoms." Plead with her that she may reform, do not plead for contention's sake. There are many men who will rebuke others, and plead with others, but what for? merely in a spirit of contention, merely that they may triumph over them, and shame them; not out of love, to reform them, they care not whether they reform or not; if they have vented their gall and malice, they have what they wish.

But how will you know that? How can you know a man's heart?

First, You shall know that men plead not for reformation, but for contention, if they rather make it appear that they are glad of the sins of their brethren, and do not grieve for them. Many a man comes in a fury to rebuke those against whom he has advantage, but not with a spirit of sorrow and mourning; if he came to plead and rebuke them for reformation, he should have come with a mourning spirit. Ye should have mourned, that such a one "might be taken away from among you," saith the apostle to the Corinthians, 1 Cor. v. 2. You should mourn at your very hearts, that the church, or the member of it, has offended.

Secondly, When men are partial in their pleading, when they will sharply rebuke others who are distant, but are careless of such as are near.

Turn ye, turn ye, that ye may not die, Ezek. xviii. 32, "turn yourselves, and live." Now the word is השיבו do you make to return, for so the Hiphil form may well be translated. Arias Montanus renders it reverti facite, make others to return. You must plead so as to desire reformation, not that you may get the victory and have the better of it by your pleading, but with bowels of compassion seek reformation; you must not cut as an enemy to conquer, but as a surgeon to heal. Therefore before you go to rebuke and to plead, you must go to prayer, that God would bless your rebuking and your exhortation to your brethren; and when you have done, pray again to God for a blessing upon it. And look after your reprehensions, and see what becomes of them; and if they do not prosper to reformation, then mourn, and cry to God for your brethren; and if they prosper, then bless God that you have converted a soul. Thus when the tribes on this side Jordan pleaded with the tribes on the other side Jordan, you find that the answer of their brethren "pleased the children of Israel; and the children of Israel blessed God, and did not intend to go up against them in battle," Josh. xxii. 33. So you should go and plead with your brethren; perhaps your brethren may plead best, and convince you that that which you apprehend to be a sin is not a sin. Now many men perhaps are angry, and will not be convinced that it is a sin; Shall I go away with the shame? shall I rebuke him of a sin, and is it no sin? Many a man holds on in an argument which he has begun, and is loth to yield that it is not a sin, whereas he should be glad to yield it. If a minister plead or preach that men commit that which he conceives is a sin, and another come and convince him that it was no sin, it is a vile spirit in any minister not to bless God that he is mistaken: why? because the guilt of his brother is removed from his heart. If I had not been mistaken, my credit had been greater; but I am mistaken, the sin is removed from my brother; oh blessed be God that my brother is not guilty, though I am mistaken. If we plead against others with such a spirit as this, God will bless it.

"Let her therefore put away her whoredoms out of her sight, and her adulteries from between her breasts." "Plead with your mother," and plead so as to tell her plainly that she is no more my wife, she has her bill of divorce, she is now none of mine. Well, it seems then there is no hope, no help, God has forsaken us, he has said we are no more his wife, we have our bill of divorce, and must be gone. Not so either, but now it follows, "let her put away her whoredoms out of her sight, and her adulteries from between her breasts." Hereby insinuating at least, that her condition, notwithstanding the greatness of her sin, and the fearfulness of the threat, is not altogether hopeless, but he would have those that plead with her, exhort her and bid her even then to put away her whoredoms. It is true, when a man puts away his wife for whoredom, and gives a bill of divorce, he will never take her again upon any terms. Jer. iii. 1, Will a man, when he putteth away his wife, return unto her again? As if he should say, No, certainly, no man will do it. "But thou hast played the harlot with many lovers; yet return again to me, saith the Lord."

Obs. 1. God mercies are beyond man's. There is no dreadful threatening against any sinner in the word of God for any sins, (if we except the sin against the Holy Ghost,) but there is a door of hope left. Here seems to be the greatest sin, idolatry and forsaking of God; and the most dreadful threatening, "she is not my wife," she is divorced from me. Yet here is insinuated a hope of mercy. See that notable text, Judg. x. 13, 14, compared with ver. 16. In the 13th and 14th verses, saith God, "Ye have forsaken me, and served other gods; what then? "I will deliver you no more." I am resolved against you now; I have delivered you often, but now "I will deliver you no more. Go and cry unto the gods which ye have chosen; let them deliver you in the time of your tribulation." One would think this people to be in an ill case, to whom God thus spake; for observe these four things: First, God charges them with the greatest sin, they had forsaken God and turned themselves to idols. Secondly, This great sin is aggravated with the most aggravating circumstance, they had done it notwithstanding God was wonderfully merciful to them, and had often delivered them. Thirdly, Here is one of the most peremptory resolutions against showing mercy that we can imagine, "I will deliver you no more," now I have delivered you so oft. Fourthly, Here is a most bitter sarcasm, a biting, upbraiding, taunting speech for their serving other gods. As if he should say, What! do you come now? do you cry and howl to me now you are in your trouble? In your prosperity I was no God for you, you left me then for other gods, and now I will be no God to you; to other gods I leave you; go now and cry to those other gods, and see whether they will help you. Put these together, and one would think this people were in a hopeless condition. Is there any help for this people yet? are they not a lost people? Is not repentance too late for them? No, for all this, repentance is not too late; for mark the 15th verse, "And the children of Israel said unto the Lord, We have sinned; do thou unto us whatsoever seemeth good unto thee; deliver us only this day;" and ver. 16, "They put away the strange gods from among them, and served the Lord." They do not lie down sullenly in their sins, and say, There is no help, therefore we may as well go on in our sinful ways; but they venture to put away their strange gods, and cry unto the Lord, and tell him that they had sinned. What then? The "soul" of the Lord "was grieved for the misery of Israel." Though he had thus pronounced against them, yet his soul was grieved for them. It is true he said, "I will deliver you no more,"

you impotent ones; but God did not say he would not give them repentance; but when they had put away their strange gods, though they had grieved God's Spirit with their sins, God was grieved for their affliction; though God had thus threatened them, yet his bowels now yearn towards them; he comes again with mercy, subdues their enemies under them, he conquers the children of Ammon, and gives them twenty of their cities, Judg. xi. 33.

God never threatens any people, but the condition of mercy upon repentance is either expressed or implied. It is therefore the frowardness and sullenness of the hearts of sinners to give up hope, upon the thought of the greatness of their sins, or the severity of God's threatening against them. Oh no, you great sinners, who have been guilty of many horrible sins, come in and repent. I may say to you, as Schemanin did to the people in another case, of a grievous sin, "There is hope in Israel concerning this thing," Ezra x. 2.

Many carnal hearts cavil against many faithful and zealous ministers, that they do nothing but preach judgment and threaten damnation, and say people shall be damned, and go to hell, and the like. This they speak against them, not mentioning the conditions upon which damnation and hell is threatened. Certainly, there can scarce a minister in the world be found that threatens damnation or hell absolutely, but upon the terms of impenitence. I will give you one scripture, to show how the perverse spirits of men will take a piece of the words of the prophets, and separate the threatening from the condition, on purpose that they may cavil at the word. In Jer. xxvi. 4, 5, saith God to the prophet, "Thou shalt say unto them, Thus saith the Lord; If ye will not hearken to me, to walk in my law, which I have set before you, to hearken to the words of my servants the prophets, whom I sent unto you; then will I make this house like Shiloh, and will make this city a curse to all the nations of the earth." See how fairly the words of the prophet go, "If ye will not hearken to me, to walk in my law, which I have set before you, to hearken to the words of my servants the prophets, whom I sent unto you," then I will do so and so. The prophet delivers his message fairly. But see now their perverseness in the 8th verse, "It came to pass, that when Jeremiah had made an end of speaking all that the Lord had commanded him to speak unto all the people, that the priests and the prophets and all the people took him, saying, Thou shalt surely die." What is the matter? "Why hast thou prophesied in the name of the Lord, saying, This house shall be like Shiloh?" They leave out "if," whereas he said, "If you will not return and hear the words of the Lord, this house shall be as Shiloh." They lay hold upon him with violence. "Why hast thou said, This house shall be like Shiloh?" and leave out the other. This is the perverseness of the hearts of men. Well then, the conclusion of this observation is this, that the best pleading against any for their sins, is not to sink them in despair, but to turn their hearts towards God that they may receive mercy. "Let her put away her whoredoms."

Obs. 2. While God is pleased to speak to a people, and exhort them to turn to him, the condition of that people is not desperate. After such pleading, that included in it a most dreadful threatening, "She is not my wife," yet God exhorts, "Let her put away her whoredoms." Exhortations from God argue that the condition of a people may be hopeful. So long as the king is but speaking to a traitor, especially giving him good counsel, there may be hope. If he turn his back upon him, and will speak no more, then he looks upon himself as a lost man. Many people are troubled, that God continues exhorting so constantly by his ministers and others, and they cannot be at rest. If thou hadst such a quiet, as that God should leave exhorting and drawing thee from thy sins, woe to thee, thou wert a lost creature! Make much of exhortations and threatenings.

Come we now to the exhortation itself, "Let her therefore put away her whoredoms out of her sight, and her adulteries from between her breasts." "Her whoredoms," and "her adulteries," in the plural number, they were many, she must put them all away. If a wife who has been naught, shall be contented to forsake divers of her lovers, and retain but one, there is no reconciliation, all her adulteries must be put away.

Let her put them away out of her sight. The eye is the receiver of much uncleanness into the heart, and by it the uncleanness of the heart is much expressed. The Scripture speaks of eyes full of adultery. "Let her put her whoredoms out of her sight," let them be abominable now in her eyes; those things that before were delectable, let them now be detestable. Let them cast away their idols, and with indignation say, Get ye hence.

Or, from before her face, so it is in the Hebrew, noting her impudence in her idolatry, that it appeared in her very face. Though men at first may be a little wary, yet at length they grow to manifest outwardly their idolatry in their very face.

And because Israel did not, according to the exhortation of those who pleaded with her, put her whoredoms out of her sight, God put Israel out of his sight, for so we have it, 2 Kings xvii. 22, 23. "The children of Israel walked in all the sins of Jeroboam which he did; they departed not from them;" promises could not draw them, threatenings could not deter them; "until the Lord removed Israel out of his sight." They might have prevented this; if they had put their whoredoms out of their sight, God would never have put them out of his sight.

"From between her breasts." Harlots used to discover their filthiness, either in the nakedness of their breasts, or in those ornaments which they hung about them, as they were wont to do in those countries, to entice their lovers.

The nakedness of the breasts has been condemned, not only in the churches of God, but amongst the heathen. Tertullian, in his book of Habitu Muliebri, has this expression: Women adorning themselves immoderately with gold, and silver, and precious apparel, is crimen ambitiosis, the sin of ambition; but for them to seek to adorn themselves solicitously about their hair and their skin, and those parts that draw the eyes, this is crimen prostitutionis, the sin of prostitution.

Yea, besides, Tertullian, in his De velandis Virginibus, introduces the heathen rebuking Christian women in those times. The very women of Arabia, saith he, shall judge you, for they not only cover their faces, but even their heads; rather than immodestly expose their whole face, they will let the light but into one eye. Now if the heathen did so, if they would not have their nakedness in any thing appear, much more should Christians cover those parts that are incitements to lust. That which is the maniac's madness, and the beggar's misery, namely, nakedness, that is the harlot's pride and glory.

"Let her therefore put away her whoredoms out of her sight, and her adulteries from between her breasts." That which is intended especially here, is, that they should not be content merely with a change of their hearts, to say, Well, we will acknowledge the Lord to be the true God, and our hearts shall wholly trust in him, but for these external things, what great sin is there in them? Oh no, they must abstain from all appearance of evil, from the badges of idolatry, there must not be so much as the garb and dress of a harlot upon them, they must take away their adulteries from between their breasts."

Tertul. de Hab. Mul. c. 4.

Judicabant vos Arabie formice Ethioes, quæ non caput sed faciem quoque ita totam tegunt ut, uno oculo liberato, contentæ sint luce frons dimissa, pelvis quam totam faciem prostituunt. Tertul. de vel. Virgin. c. 17.

The breasts of the church are her ordinances, for out of them the saints suck sweetness and spiritual nourishment; so they are called in Isa. lxvi. 11, "That ye may suck and be satisfied with the breasts of her consolations." Now certainly it is an evil thing, for any thing that is adulterous to be in the ordinances of the church. No, the breasts are so near the heart, that it is a pity any thing should be upon them but Christ himself; it is most fit that he should lie there. Cant. i. 13, "A bundle of myrrh is my well-beloved unto me, he shall lie all night between my breasts." Myrrh we know is a bitter thing, but though Christ were as a bundle of myrrh, and brought many afflictions which add bitterness to the flesh, yet the church would have Christ lie between her breasts, and she would rejoice in Christ; Christ was sweet to the church, though with afflictions, As "a bundle of myrrh is my well-beloved." So, many faithful ministers of God have been contented, yea, joyful, to keep Christ between their breasts, and in the ordinances, though as a bundle of myrrh: he has brought some afflictions to them; yet, rather than they would endure any expression of that which is adulterous upon the ordinances, the word and sacraments, Christ Jesus, a bundle of myrrh between their breasts, has been delightful to them.

I find another reading of the words in the Septuagint translation. Whereas we render it, "Let her put away her whoredoms out of her sight;" they regard it as a speech of God, and translate it, ἔξαρον τὴν πορνείαν αὐτῆς ἐκ προσώπου μου, I will take away her whoredoms from my face. And Cyril, reading the words thus, has an excellent remark: God, saith he, threatens that he will take away her whoredoms from his face; as when a member of a body is so putrified that it cannot be cured by medicine, it is cut off, and the disease removed: so God labours to cure the people of Israel by admonitions, by exhortations, by threatenings, by promises of mercy, and when all would not do, he threatens to cure them another way, that is, by cutting them off by the Assyrians; I will send an enemy against them, and he shall take them out of their own land, and carry them into a strange land, and then they shall be far enough from their selves, far enough from Dan and Bethel; so I will take their whoredoms from before my face. Thus, many times God takes away the sins of a people, or of a particular person, from before his face. As for instance, thou drunkard, thou unclean person, hast had exhortations, threatenings, and many merciful expressions from God to draw thee from thy sins; they will not do; God comes with some noisome disease upon thy body, that thou shalt not be able to act thy sin any more, and God takes away the act of thy sin in such a violent manner by his judgments. Sometimes men and women who have estates will be proud, and vain, and make their estates the fuel of their lusts; when the word cannot take away their sins and the expressions of their wickedness, God by some violent judgment takes away their estates, that they shall not be able to commit those sins they did before, though they would never so fain. This is a dreadful taking away of sin. Yea, God shall so take away the sin of men and women, as to take away their souls together with their sin: for so it is threatened, Job xxvii. 8, "What is the hope of the hypocrite, though he hath gained, when God taketh away his soul?" Thou that wouldst not suffer the word to take away thy sin, must expect that God will take it away another way, even by taking away thy soul. It may be said of some sinners, as in Ezek. xxi. 29 God threatens, their "day is come, when their iniquity shall have an end." God will suffer them to live no longer to sin against him: he will take away their sins, but so as to take away their souls, they shall not sin any more against God in this world.

Ὁ μὲν γὰρ τρίτον τὴν ἐν τοῖς ὀφθαλμοῖς τὴν πορνείαν τῆς δικαιοσύνης ἢ διαφόρων τύξεων τὴν ἑκείνου κινήσει πρὸς τὸν Κύριον. in Nov. c. 2.

Ver. 3. Lest I strip her naked, and set her as in the day that she was born, and make her as a wilderness, and set her like a dry land, and slay her with thirst.

There is much in these words, and because they are so exceeding suitable unto us, you must give me liberty to insist a little upon them.

"Lest I strip her naked." It seems by this that Israel, when she was born, had been in a very low condition, in a very pitiful estate; but God had put many ornaments upon her; and now he threatens to bring her again into the same condition, and to strip her naked.

"In the day that she was born." This, I find, interpreters refer to divers conditions of Israel, but most to the time of their deliverance out of Egypt, called here by God, "the day that she was born." We must inquire, first, What was the condition of Israel "in the day that she was born." Secondly, What ornaments God had put upon her afterwards: and then we shall come to see the strength of the threat, that God would "strip her naked, and set her as in the day that she was born."

For the first two we shall not need to go far, we have them fully and most elegantly set out unto us in Ezek. xvi. That chapter may be a comment upon this, what Israel was in the day wherein she was born, and what ornaments God had put upon her. In the third verse, "Thus saith the Lord God unto Jerusalem; thy birth and thy nativity is of the land of Canaan; thy father was an Amorite, and thy mother an Hittite."

When thou wert born, thou wert in this condition. What! their father an Amorite, and their mother an Hittite? Abraham was their father, and Sarah their mother; why here an Amorite and an Hittite? Because there were other nations besides Amorites and Hittites, there were the Jebusites and the Perizzites; why rather an Amorite and Hittite, than a Jebusite and Perizzite? These two questions must be answered.

First, Though Abraham was their father, yet, because they were in such a disposition, so like the Amorites and Hittites, so vile and so wicked, they deserve not to have the honour of Abraham's being their father, but to be called the children of the Amorite and the Hittite. As John Baptist calls the Pharisees the viperous, the serpentine brood, so those that are like the devil, are called the children of the devil.

Secondly, Why the Amorite and Hittite rather than others? For the first, the Amorite; because the Amorites were the chiefest of those nations in Canaan which were driven out. All the five were called by the name of Amorite: "The sins of the Amorites are not yet full." Secondly, the Hittite, because they seemed to be the vilest of the five, and there is a text of Scripture that seems to infer so much. Gen. xxvii. 46, "I am weary of my life" (saith Rebekah) "because of the daughters of Heth." She only mentions the daughters of Heth, and those that were now called Hittites were of the daughters of Heth: and saith she, "What good will my life do me, if Jacob take a wife of the daughters of Heth?" Why, there were other daughters besides them, but those were the vilest, therefore she only mentions them. Yea, but what was Israel at this time, when they were delivered out of Egypt? for that is the time wherein she was born that is spoken of here. Were they in so ill a condition, as that their father was an Amorite and their mother an Hittite at that time? There are two most useful observations that flow from hence, before we proceed any further in the explication of the words.

Obs. 1. Israel, though they had been four hundred years in Egypt under grievous afflictions, yet they continued exceeding abominable and wicked. The fire of their afflictions seemed to harden their hearts, as much as the fire of the furnace hardened the bricks. Their hearts were clay, foul, dirty hearts, and were hardened by their afflictions.

Obs. 2. When God came to deliver Israel out of Egypt, God found them in a very wicked condition. Then their father was an Amorite, and their mother an Hittite. They were thus vile when God came to deliver them, in the day wherein they were born. Oh the freeness of God's grace! God often told them that his grace was free, and so indeed it was. Read the story of the people of Israel, and you find, when God sent Moses unto them, they were a very wicked and stubborn people, even at that very time when God came with his deliverance.

Let us then raise up our hearts, and look up to the free grace of God even toward us. We are vile, we are wicked; mercies and chastisements have hardened us; and yet all this hinders not the free grace of God for the deliverance of a people. God has begun to deliver us; and when did he begin? Certainly England, never since it was born, since it was delivered out of spiritual Egypt, out of the bondage of popery, was in a worse condition than when God came in lately with his mercies to us. Then, if ever, it might be said, that our father was an Amorite, and our mother an Hittite. We were in the very high way towards Egypt again, when God came with his free grace to deliver us. As he dealt with his own people, so he has dealt with us. Magnified be the free grace of God towards us, an unworthy people!

Further, Ezek. xvi. 4, "Thy navel was not cut." The loathsomeness of their condition is set out by that. Naturalists observe, that the nourishment which the child hath from the mother is by the navel: as afterward, the child sucks the breasts, and so is fattened; but all the while it is in the womb, by a string in the navel it draws nourishment from the mother. Now when God delivered Israel from Egypt, they had not their navel cut, that is, they drew their nourishment from Egypt; they fattened themselves, and sucked out the Egyptian manners, and customs, and superstitions; and in their growth up, they seemed rather to have their nourishment from Egypt than from God; so God himself charges them, Ezek. xxiii. 8, "Neither left she her whoredoms brought from Egypt."

Is it not thus in part with us? Let me a little speak of this, by way of allusion at least. Is our navel cut to this very day? It is true, God has delivered us from popery, from Egypt, as he did Israel, but still do not we continue sucking, drawing nourishment from our old superstitious ways of popery? We seem to live still upon them, and to have our hearts delighting in them. Oh how just were it with God, to come in a violent way and cut our navel, even by the sword! It is mercy he comes not thus to cut it, and so take from us all those secret hankerings that we have after the old Egyptian customs.

Yet again, seeing it is such a full allusion, we may apply it to those that seem to be born again; those that seem now to make very fair profession of religion, and to forsake many evil ways in which formerly they have delighted: but yet their navel is not cut; they secretly suck sweetness from their former lusts; the curse of the serpent is upon them, upon their bellies they go, and dust they eat; their souls even cleave to the dust.

"Neither wast thou washed in water." This also sets forth the woeful condition of Israel when he was born, he was not washed. When the infant comes into the world, it emerges from blood and pollution in which it was wrapped, so that (as Plutarch saith) it is rather like a child killed, than a child born; and were it not for a natural affection stirring in parents, they would even loathe the fruit of their bodies. It is true, parents may see that with their bodily eyes, but there is more pollution in their souls; they are wrapped up in original sin and filth, more than their bodies were wrapped up in blood and pollution in the womb. Therefore infants are washed; but thou wast not washed, thou wast let go in thy filth. The barbarous Lacedaemonians, when their children were born, used to throw them into the river, to consolidate their members and to make them strong.

"Thou wast cast out in the open field." What is the meaning of this? We cannot understand it fully, without examining the custom of the people in those times. We find in histories, that the custom of divers of the heathen was, when their children were born, to observe by their countenance, or by the structure of their members, whether they were likely to be useful to the commonwealth or not; if not, they threw them away, and if they were likely to be useful they nourished them up. They nourished up no other children but those that they judged by their countenance or shape would do good to the commonwealth.

Strabo tells us that the Indians and Brahmims had certain judges appointed for that very end; their office was, that when any child was born, to judge by the countenance and parts of the body of the child, whether it was likely to do any good in the commonwealth, and so either to save it or cast it out. So likewise Ælian tells us, that the Thebans made an express law among them in these words, That none of them should cast out their children; noting thereby that it was wont to be the custom amongst them. So Clemens Romanus tells us, as a thing peculiar to them, that amongst the Jews their children are not cast out.

So that the Holy Ghost alludes to the way of the Gentiles and barbarous people, and tells Israel that they were as a child cast out, such a one as the countenance promised no good. "Thou wast cast out in the open field," because they never hoped to have any good of thee; and indeed (as if God should say) if I had regarded what I saw in you, I might have passed this judgment upon you too, there was little hope of good from you.

But what though the child be cast out in the field, yet some may pass by accidentally, as Pharaoh's daughter did, who may pity the child, and have compassion on it. No, saith God, thou wast not only cast out, but worse than this, thou wast so cast out as "none eye pitied thee." You have sometimes poor children laid at your doors, and left there, some in baskets, or other ways, yet, when you open them and see a child, and a child weeping, there is some pity in you, and you will take care some way or other that it may be fed and brought up. But, saith God to Israel, "thou wast cast out in the open field," and "none eye pitied thee;" that is, all the heathen were against you, and others in the land rose against you; the Egyptians came out to destroy you, you had the sea before you, and them behind you, none had pity upon you. This was the condition wherein you were born.

Now see what ornaments God had put upon them. They were in a sorry condition, you see, when they were born. But mark, I took thee, "and entered into covenant with thee, saith the Lord God, and thou becamest mine," Ezek. xvi. 8. That is the way a people become God's, his entering into covenant with them. The Lord has begun to enter into covenant with us, and we with him in former protestations, and if any further

Αἰσινὰ περὶ φρεσὶν καὶ ἄλλοβροσικῶν, καὶ φουλομένων μάλλον ἢ τρεφόμενων
ἐκ τῆς ἀβυσθοῦ ἢ τοῦ φρεσὶ φι-λοῦτος. Plut.
de Animæ Proli.

*Strab. l. 15.

Ne cui Thebano licet infantem ex-ponere. Ælian variar. Hist. l. 11.

Nunquam apud eos infans natus exponitur.

covenant binding us more strictly to God be tendered to us, know that God in this deals with us as he did with his own people. We are as children cast out in the open field, and no eye pities us; but many plot against us and seek our ruin. If God will be pleased now to enter into covenant with us, and give all the people of the land hearts to come closer to the covenant, to renew their covenant with him, and that to more purpose than in former covenants, the Lord yet will own us. The covenant of God was the foundation of all the mercy the people of Israel had from God; and we are to look upon it as the foundation of our mercy; and therefore, as in the presence of God, willingly and cheerfully to renew it with him.

After God's taking this people to himself as his own, it follows, ver. 11—14, "I decked thee also with ornaments, and I put bracelets upon thy hands, and a chain on thy neck. And I put a jewel on thy forehead, and earrings in thine ears, and a beautiful crown upon thine head. Thus wast thou decked with gold and silver; and thy raiment was of fine linen, and silk, and brodered work; thou didst eat fine flour, and honey, and oil: and thou wast exceeding beautiful, and thou didst prosper into a kingdom. And thy renown went forth among the heathen for thy beauty." Thus God did with the people of Israel; he added to what they had when they were born. Miserable they were then; but the mercies of God toward them are thus set out. And now he threatens that he will strip them naked, and set them as in the day wherein they were born.

Yet further, for the opening of this, we must know that it was the custom among the Jews, when any married, that what dowry they brought their husbands was written down in a table; and if afterward he should divorce his wife, except there could be proved some gross and vile thing against the woman, though she should go away, yet she was to go away with her table, with her dowry, she must not go away naked. But if there could be proved some notorious villany that she had committed, then she was sent away sine tabulis, naked, without those tables wherein her dowry and other things were written, and destitute of all things, as being unworthy of them, because she had played the harlot. Thus God threatens this people. "She is not my wife;" but unless she put away her whoredoms from before her face, and her adulteries from between her breasts, I will strip her naked as in the day wherein she was born. She shall be sent away without any tables, naked and wholly destitute. Thus you have the opening of the words.

Obs. 1. The beginnings of great excellencies are sometimes very low and mean. This plainly rises from the opposition of her condition when she was born, and what she had gotten from God afterward; "lest I strip her naked, and set her as in the day that she was born." Therefore it is clear she was born in a very mean condition, and gotten up to a very excellent condition; though now high and glorious, yet once very low and mean. God many times raises up golden pillars upon leaden bases, and the most glorious works of God have had the lowest beginnings. This beautiful frame of heaven and earth was raised out of a chaos of confusion and darkness. This is true, both personally and nationally, and that in regard of outward conditions, or spiritual. How poor, and low, and mean have many of your beginnings been in the world! Who could ever have thought that such low beginnings could have been raised to such high things, as some of you have been raised to in the world? It was not long since when you came hither to this city, (which may be said to be the day wherein you were born for your civil estate, though not for your natural,) you were low enough, mean enough; you had but little to begin withal; you came hither "with your staff," and "now behold two bands."

It is sometimes so, likewise, in regard of the spiritual estate. You may remember, not long since, what darkness and confusion abounded in your minds and hearts; what poor, low, and mean thoughts had you of God, and the things of his kingdom; what unsavoury spirits, when at first God was pleased to work upon you! Oh what a poor condition were you in then! Though you had some light put into you, yet you were as a child new born, wrapped up in filth and blood, many noisome distempers there were in your hearts, as it is usual with new converts; like a fire newly kindled, where there is a great deal of smother and smoke, that afterward wears away. But now, behold the shining of God's face upon your souls. Oh the abilities that God has given you to know his mind and do his will! Oh the blessed communion that you have with God, and the sparkling of that Divine nature! The glory and beauty of the Divine nature is put upon you.

So for nations, we will not go farther than our own. How low and mean were we at the first! We were as rude, barbarous, and savage a people, almost, as lived upon the earth. Britons had their name from hence; in the old Britain language, Brith signifies blue-coloured, because those who lived here, instead of good clothes, as you have, with wood besmeared their bodies blue. Tania was added, as it is usual in other languages, for the signification of such a region, or country, as Mauritania, Lusitania, Aquitania, &c. So that Britannia is as much as to say, The region of the blue-coloured people; so called because they were thus painted. The best food they were wont to eat (historians tell us) was bark of trees and roots. Hollinshed in his Chronicle says, There were old men that he knew who told of times in England, that if the good man in the house had a mattress or flock-bed, and a sack of chaff to rest his head on, he thought himself as well lodged as the lord of the town, for ordinarily they lay upon straw pallets covered with canvass, and a round log under their heads instead of a bolster. They said pillows were fit only for women in child-bed; and in a good farmer's house it was rare to find four pieces of pewter, and it was accounted a great matter that a farmer could show five shillings or a noble in silver together.

Camden, in his Britannia, tells of Aylesbury, a town in Buckinghamshire, where there was a king's manor, and the condition of holding certain lands there was, that the possessor or holder of them should find straw for litter for the king's bed, when he came there. Latimer, in a sermon before King Edward, relates, that his father, who, he says, kept good hospitality for his poor neighbours, and found a horse for the king's service, brought him (Latimer) up at learning, and married his sisters with five pounds, or twenty nobles, apiece for their portions. This was the poor and mean condition of those times. And Jerome, contra Jovinianum, and Diodorus Siculus, tell us concerning the people in Ireland, our neighbours, that the best delicacies they used to eat in former times, was the flesh of young children; that the ships they used, were sailows wreathed together, and boughs twisted, and covered with the hides of beasts; and the wives they had, were common to all their brethren and parents. As for their religion, they offered to the devil man's flesh, they worshipped Apollo, and Jupiter, and Diana. And Gildas, one of the most ancient historians, who relates the condition of these British people, says the idols they had were horrible, devilish, monstrous things, and that they even surpassed the Egyptian idols in number. No people had so many idol-gods, and so monstrous, as the Egyptians, and yet these went beyond them.

Afterward, no people in the world were more rent and torn with civil wars than England has been. And in the times when popery was here professed and established, oh the outward and spiritual bondage we were under then! Our bodies, our souls, our estates, our consciences, were in miserable thralldom.

It is the most sordid and miserable slavery possible for a rational creature to be under, not only to be bound to practise, but to believe for truth, the dictates and determinations of men, yea, and that upon pain of eternal damnation. To believe what they say, as the articles of faith upon which salvation or damnation depends, and conscience must not question, or scruple anything; if any man that is a rational creature should think there is any such distance between man and man, he debases himself beneath a man, and advances the other above a man. Better it is to be in slavery to another, to scrape kennels, than to be in this slavery. And to have the Scriptures kept from us, the epistle that God has sent from heaven to us, that which enlightens the world, revealing the great counsels of God concerning eternal life, is worse bondage than to be chained up in dark holes all the days of our lives. To have no ordinances but according to the lusts and humours of vile men, how great a slavery is this! The manifestation of the least suspicion of the falseness of the vilest errors, dislike of the basest practices, was enough to confiscate estate, to imprison, yea, to take away life. Was not this a low condition, a base slavery, in which England was? could any bear it, but such as were slaves to their own lusts? But now, what ornaments has God put upon us! No nation under heaven more renowned than we have been, our renown has gone through the earth. England; its people, Angli, quasi Angeli; and itself, Albion, from the whiteness of its cliffs. From our happiness we see now, that glorious excellences have many times low beginnings.

Obs. 2. God's mercy is a people's beauty and glory. When we have any excellency, any beauty upon us, it is God's mercy that is all our beauty. "I will strip you naked, and set you as in the day wherein you were born." If you have any excellency, it is my mercy. We have nothing belonging to us but shame, confusion, and misery; if we have any ornaments, it is mercy, free mercy: therefore, in Ezek. xvi. 14, Thou wert perfect in beauty; how? "through my comeliness, which I had put upon thee, saith the Lord." Let God take away his mercy, we are quickly left naked, and poor, and miserable; like the rugged walls in the court, when the king goes away, and all the rich hangings are taken down, what a difference is there in their appearance! the beauty of the walls were the hangings, when the king was there. So, if we have any thing that makes us beautiful, they are the hangings that God has put upon us; his mercies are those hangings of gold, and silver, and needle-work; and when they are gone, we are poor, and ragged, and miserable.

Obs. 3. Though sinners deserve great evils, to be stripped of all comforts, yet God, in patience and clemency, continues them a long time. "Lest I strip her naked," God had said before, that she was not his wife, she was guilty of whoredoms, yet it seems she was not yet stripped naked; she was yet left with God's ornaments upon her, notwithstanding her sin. Sinners may be under fearful threatenings, and yet retain many comforts; yea, the truth is, it is possible for a people to be cast off from God, and yet to continue for a while in outward prosperity. The tree that is cut up by the roots, may have the leaves green for a while. Saul was rejected of God, 1 Sam. xiii. 14, yet, after that, God suffered Saul to prosper exceedingly in overcoming the Philistines and the Amalekites.

Obs. 4. The mercies that God bestows upon a nation, are but common favours, not spiritual graces, they are such ornaments as a people may be stripped of. The great mercies a people have, they may wholly lose. Here is the difference between true spiritual graces, in which Jesus Christ adorns his spouse. When Christ not only takes in an outward way a people to himself, but marries them to himself in a spiritual way, he decks the soul with such ornaments, bestows such mercies upon them, as shall never be taken away. Such a soul has no cause to fear that ever it can be stripped, as in the day wherein it was born, you need not fear that you shall ever lose the jewels given you at that marriage day. You may be stripped of common graces and gifts, as many professors are, who have not truth at heart. When they prove naught, God takes away their gifts from them; they have not that gift of prayer they were vent to have; though they have excellent words, yet a man may perceive such an unsavouriness mixed with their gifts, that it breeds loathing in others to join with them. As, when the king goeth away from his palace, the hangings are taken down; so, when God departeth from a soul, (as from such he may,) then their hangings, those excellent gifts, are taken from them. But of spiritual gifts they are never stripped. We read in Ezek. xvi. 17, when a king gave gifts to his servants, they were to return to him again at the year of jubilee; but when he gave them to his sons, they were to be their inheritance. There are many who are outwardly in the church as God's servants, they have many gifts, but God will take his gifts away, and strip them naked; but then there are his children, they shall have their gifts as an inheritance for ever. It is true, God may stay a while: as, when the king is gone from court, if there be any thought of his return the hangings continue, but if the message come, The king will not be here these twelve months, or a long time, or, it may be, never any more, then the hangings are taken down; so, though these gifts of the hypocrite may stay a while, yet they will vanish at last.

Obs. 5. Continuance in sin, and especially the sin of spiritual whoredom, is that which will strip a nation from all their excellences, from all their ornaments and beauty. The continuance in that sin especially; for so the words imply, "Let her put away her adulteries from between her breasts, lest I strip her naked." If she continue thus, certainly naked she shall be. This always brings nakedness meritoriously, but if continued in, effectually, it makes them naked. In Exod. xxxii. 25, you may see what made the people naked at that time: the text saith, that "Aaron had made them naked," that is, Aaron, by consenting to the people to make the calf, had made the people naked; that is, destitute now of God's gracious protection, deprived of those favours from God, which formerly they had. And as the priest had made them naked, so you may find, in 2 Chron. xxviii. 19, that the king made them naked too: "The Lord brought Judah low because of Ahaz king of Israel; for he made Judah naked, and transgressed sore against the Lord." "He made Judah naked," that is, by countenancing idolatry, by siding with those who were idolaters, he made Judah naked at that time.

Here we may see who they are that are likely to strip us, if ever God should come to strip us. We have many amongst us that see false burdens of all the miseries and troubles that come upon the nation; they blame the puritans, and others that they say are factious, seditious, and turbulent spirits, and all must be laid upon them. Certainly, whoever has eyes in his head, may easily see who makes us as naked as we are, and, if we be made more naked, who will be the cause of all. Those who stand against the way of reformation, those that will keep their whoredoms in their sight, and their adulteries between their breasts, those that will not be willing that the church should be purged from that filth and whorish attire it uses; these are they that make us naked. We read in Lam. ii. 14, "Thy prophets have seen vain and foolish things for thee: and they have not discovered thine iniquity to turn away thy captivity; but have seen for thee false burdens, and causes of banishment." Mark it, "Thy prophets have seen vain and foolish things, and they have not discovered thine iniquity;" they have not dealt plainly with thy people, neither have they told them the reason of their captivity; "but have seen for thee false burdens and causes of banishment." The prophets say, It is a company of these precise and strict ones, that will not be obedient to authority, and will not do what is commanded in such and such things, and (when there were corruptions in God's worship) they would not submit to such and such orders. The prophets lay the blame upon them; but they see false burdens, saith the text, and false causes of banishment. We have many such prophets amongst us, who see false burdens and causes of banishment, and they blame those who certainly are the causes of our peace, and of the good of the kingdom. Tertullian tells us, that in the primitive times, if they had any ill weather, or trouble, they would blame the Christians as the cause of it, and presently the voice was, Ad leones, Let the Christians be dragged to the lions, and devoured by the lions. It has been so amongst us. But may we not answer, as Elijah answered Ahab, when Ahab told him that he was the man that troubled Israel, "I have not troubled Israel, but thou and thy father's house." May we not well say to them, as Jehu to Jehoram, when he asked him whether there was peace, "What peace, so long as the whoredoms of thy mother Jezebel and her witchcrafts are so many?" Those that have been popish, certainly they have endangered us of being stripped of all. Who were the causers of the first disturbances amongst us, even of all the persecution here of God's saints, and of all the discontent among the people? who were they that persuaded the bringing in of an arbitrary government? who were the cause of laying such things upon the people, that they could not bear? who were the causers of the troubles in Scotland, and sending of books thither full of superstitious vanities? was it not that prelatical faction, who are those that hinder the reformation at this day? Certainly, if it were as apparent that they who are called puritans, had been the cause of such charge to the kingdom, and disturbance to the state, as the prelatical faction has been; it had been impossible for them to go in the streets, but they would have been stoned to death. I speak not this as though we should do the like, but to show what the virulence of their spirits would have been to them, if it had been apparent that they had been such charge to the kingdom, and such disturbers of the state. The truth is, we may charge our papists, and others that are of that way, (and we know who are next to them,) as the cause of stripping us so naked as we have been. It is clear enough, those that put not away their whoredoms from them, but continue still superstitious and idolaters, they are they who endanger a people to be stripped naked.

Obs. 6. That it is time for people to plead, when there is danger of desolation. "Plead with your mother, plead." Why so? why should we not be quiet? "Lest I strip her naked, and set her as in the day that she was born." What! you are in such a condition as you are in danger to be stripped naked, and to be left desolate as a wilderness? Is it not time then to plead? O plead with God, and plead with those that are in authority, and plead one with another, and plead with all; stir up yourselves, and do what you can; let there be no sluggish spirit, no neutralizing spirit. It is no time for any to be neuters now. It is time now for all to come and plead, not so much now to dispute of things, but for every one to stand, and appear, and plead, not only verbally, but otherwise, as God calls them to it. When John saith, "The axe is laid upon the root of the trees," Luke iii. 9; what then? Then every one cometh and saith, "What shall we do?" "He," saith he to some, "that hath two coats, let him impart to him that hath none;" and to the soldiers, when they say, "What shall we do?" "Do violence to no man, neither accuse any falsely; and be content with your wages." Mark, "when the axe is laid to the root of the trees, every one then comes in, and saith, 'What shall we do?'" You that are women and inferior, do you pray, and cry, and further your husbands in all good. Be not you backward, do not draw them away, through your extravagance and folly, when they would be liberal and forward, and adventure themselves. And you that are men of estates, if you ask what you should do, it is apparent; "He that hath two coats, let him impart to him that hath none," be willing to part with much of your estates in such a cause as this. And so, soldiers, if you ask what you should do; behave yourselves so as you may convince others; "Do violence to no man," but act according to an orderly way: and "be content with your wages;" perhaps it may not come in so fully afterwards, yet let it appear that it is the cause that strengthens you, rather than your wages. Thus, every one should be of an inquiring spirit when "the axe is laid to the root of the trees." When we are in danger to be stripped of all, it is not time then to stand about curiosities and niceties.

Obs. 7. Those who will not be convinced by the word, God has other means to convince them besides the word. If pleading and convincing arguments will not do it, well then, stripping naked shall do it. The expression is usual in the Scripture, "Then ye shall know that I am the Lord," when I do thus and thus. As you do with those who are of a sleepy disposition; if you call up a servant that is sluggish and sleepy, he answers, Anon, and then falls down and sleeps again; you call him again, and he answers, and sleeps again; at length you come up and pull the clothes off him, and leave him naked, and that will awake him. So God calls upon them to leave their whoredoms and idolatries, and to repent; he threatens, and offers mercy, and they seem a little to awake, but to it again. Well, saith God, I will come another way, and strip you naked, and that will do it.

Obs. 8. Whatever are the means of stripping a nation naked, it is God that doth it. "Lest I strip her naked, and set her as in the day wherein she was born." Lest I do it. It is God that gives, and it is God that takes away. But let that pass.

Obs. 9. It is a grievous judgment, for one that is advanced from a low to a high degree, to be brought down again. "Lest I strip her naked, and set her as in the day wherein she was born." Thus Job (chap. xxix. and xxx.) aggravates his misery: "The candle of God shined upon my head; I washed my steps with butter, and the rock poured me out rivers of oil; my glory was fresh in me, and my bow was renewed in my hand," &c. "But now, they that are younger than I have me in derision, whose fathers I would have disdained to have set with the dogs of my flock." Thus he aggravates his judgment, because he was brought into a low condition, having once been in a high one. The like aggravation of misery have we, Lam. iv. 2, "The precious sons of Zion, comparable to fine gold, how are they esteemed as earthen pitchers, the work of men's hands!" and ver. 5, "They that did feed delicately are desolate in the streets: they that were brought up in scarlet embrace dunghills." Thus the Scripture is clear, and your experience is enough to confirm it. For a man who has been a bond-slave in the galleys, and afterward ransomed by the liberality of his friends in England, if he should be taken and brought back again to the galleys, oh how tedious and grievous would it be! but if he had lived long here, and flourished, and gotten preferment, and had grown a great merchant, and after this to be brought again to the galleys, how much more terrible would this be to him! If some of you that have been beggars heretofore, if God by some way or other should bring you to your former poverty, oh how tedious would it be! We see that many men, who have been raised from a low estate to a high one, are so afraid of returning to a low estate again, that they will venture soul, and conscience, and God and all, rather than they will endanger themselves in the least degree in their estates.

Hence it is very observable, that the chief curse that God threatens the people of Israel, is that they should return to Egypt again, that the Lord would bring them back to the condition wherein once they were. That whole chapter, Deut. xxviii., is spent in denouncing most dreadful curses upon the people; now the conclusion of all is the chief curse of all the rest, ver. 68, "The Lord shall bring thee into Egypt again with ships, by the way wherof I spake unto thee, Thou shalt see it no more again, and there ye shall be sold unto your enemies for bondmen and bondwomen, and no man shall buy you."

Were it not a sad thing for us who have been acquainted with the glorious light of the gospel, and with the blessed privileges that come in thereby, for us to be brought into popish bondage and thraldom again? We may reason with Ezra, "Now for a little space grace hath been showed from the Lord our God, to leave us a remnant to escape, and to give us a nail in his holy place, that our God may lighten our eyes, and give us a little reviving in our bondage. Should we again break thy commandments, and join in affinity with the people of these abominations?" Ezra ix. 8, 14. As for ourselves, who have had of late a little taste of the sweetness of our outward privileges and liberties, who could endure to be under that bondage in which we were three or four years ago, under every apparitor, promoter, pursuivant, commissary, chancellor, and tyrannical prelate, as formerly? We could not have met together, and enjoyed the liberty of such exercises as these; no, you could not have met in your families to pray, but one or other would have been upon you and endangered your estates. The bondage was intolerable; we may well complain, it was a yoke that neither we nor our fathers could bear.

Obs. 9. When God has delivered a people out of misery, and bestowed upon them great mercies, it is their duty often to think of the poor condition in which they were, and to use all the means they can that they may not be brought thither again. God loves this, that we should remember and seriously take to heart what once we were. "Lest I strip her naked, and set her as in the day that she was born;" as if he should say, I would have you consider what a low condition you were in when you were born, and consider the danger you are in to be brought thither again, look then about you, and seek to prevent it, if you have the hearts of men in you. This we shall find in Deut. xxvi. 1, 2, 5, 6. When thou art come into the land which the Lord giveth thee for an inheritance, and dwellest therein, "thou shalt take of the first of all the fruit of the earth, which thou shalt bring of thy land that the Lord thy God giveth thee, and shalt put it in a basket, and shalt go unto the place which the Lord thy God shall choose, to place his name there. And thou shalt speak, and say before the Lord thy God, A Syrian ready to perish was my father, and he went down into Egypt, and sojourned there with a few, and became there a nation, great, mighty, and populous: and the Egyptians evil entreated us, and afflicted us, and laid upon us hard bondage." And Isa. li. 1, "Look unto the rock whence ye are hewn, and to the hole of the pit whence ye are digged." It is very useful for us to consider our former low condition. Mr. Deering, in a sermon preached before Queen Elizabeth, uses this bold expression to her, If there were a time that you thought yourself tanquam ovis, as a sheep ready to be slain, take heed that the words of the prophet be not now true, that you be not tanquam indomita juvenicula, as an untamed heifer. You may note the difference between the spirits of men in former times, in their plainness and boldness; and if there were an excess that way, how far the other way are our court sermons now! Queen Elizabeth was once in a very low condition, and she thought herself to be as a sheep appointed for the slaughter. It is usual for men raised up from a low condition to forget God and themselves, and to grow proud and scornful. Nothing is more sharp than a low thing when it gets up high; so there is none that have more proud and scornful spirits than those who are raised from the dunghill, they know not then where they are: as the proverb is, Set a beggar on horseback, and he knows not how nor whither to ride.

Asperius nihil est
humili cum surgit
in altum.

Thus it was with Saul: the way to humble Saul, was for him to consider what he once was; and that is the way to humble us all who are subject to be proud of our prosperity, to which God has raised us. When thou wast little in thine own sight, then thou wert made the head of the tribes of Israel. There was a time that he was little in his own eyes, and I beseech you observe the difference between the spirit of Saul when he was in a low condition, and his spirit when he was raised. When Saul was in a low condition, his spirit was low, therefore, in 1 Sam. x. 27, you find that though there were some children of Belial that would not have Saul to reign over them; What! say they, "how shall this man save us? And they despised him, and brought him no presents. But he held his peace." But, chap. xi. 12, when Saul had gotten some credit and honour by his victories, some of the people said, "Who is he that said, Shall Saul reign over us? bring the men that we may put them to death." No, saith Saul, "There shall not a man be put to death this day." Oh how meek was Saul! what a quiet spirit had he before he got up high! But afterward, when he had had many victories, what a furious and outrageous spirit had Saul! You know the story of the fourscore and five priests that must be slain in the city of Nob, and the whole city, men, women, and children, sucklings, oxen, asses, and sheep, must be put to the sword. Why? because one of them only gave a little refreshment to David. What a different spirit is here in Saul to that which he had when he was low!

Is it not so with many of you? When God has brought you low, you seem to be humble, meek, and quiet; then you are content with every thing, and prize every little mercy. Oh a hundred times more mercy will not serve your turn now, as you would have been glad of then, and blessed God if you had had it. But now you know not yourselves, your hearts are raised up as your estates are. Well, it is good for you to look to the condition you were in when you were low; as we read of Agathocles, that king, who was a potter's son, and after advanced to a kingdom, would always be served at his table in earthen vessels, to put him in mind of the condition he was in before. Certainly, if in any place in England it be seasonable to speak of this, it is in London, where many that have been potters' children, and in a low degree, have been raised up high, and acquired great estates. Let them remember in what condition they were, that they may be humbled, and so may prevent the danger of being brought thither again. Many put others in mind of it in a taunting way,—I know what you were not long ago,

I know what your father was! but do you put your own souls in mind of this in a humbling way? this is the way to continue mercies.

But now apply we it a little to ourselves generally, and then we shall conclude all. Let us work this upon our hearts. Look we back to what we were lately, and let us check our hearts for any discontent in our present estate. Not long since would not many of us have been willing to have laid down our lives, to have purchased that mercy we have had this year or two? God has granted to us our former mercies, and raised us from our low condition, of free cost hitherto. God has been beforehand with us; and what if those mercies that are to come, are at somewhat dearer rate than those we have had already? Those mercies we have had already have been very precious and sweet; but surely they that are to come are more precious and sweet, and therefore we may be content though they cost us dear. Yet how vile are the spirits of men in forgetting the sad condition they were in, the taxes, and monopolies, and uncertainty of enjoying any thing that was your own! and now, if there be but a little charge, you immediately murmur and repine: Oh these heavy burdens! the parliament burdens the kingdom and the country, and as good have ship-money and other taxes as these burdens. O, unworthy, unworthy are you to live to see the goodness of the Lord in these days! unworthy to have your eyes open to see what God has done, and thus to murmur! Thou shouldst magnify God's mercies, and not murmur at his proceedings. We have a notable parallel to this (Numb. xvi.) in the story of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram; those murmurers, when they were but in a little strait, came to Moses, and said, "Is it a small thing that thou hast brought us up out of a land that floweth with milk and honey?" ver. 13. What land was that, that Moses brought them up out of, that they said flowed with milk and honey? It was the land of Egypt, the land of their bondage. Indeed they were promised a land of Canaan, that should flow with milk and honey, and they put that upon the land of Egypt; though they had been in bondage and slavery in Egypt, and were now going to Canaan, yet when they endured some trouble in the way, and had but some opposition, and were put to some straits, then Egypt was the land that flowed with milk and honey, and who would come out of Egypt? So though God be bringing us to Canaan, to a blessed land that flows with milk and honey, yet because there are some straits in the way, some difficulties, some oppositions that may cost us something, how do men cry out, We were better before! you talked of reformation, but, for our part, would we might have but what we had before, and be as quiet as we were then! why will you bring us out of a land that flows with milk and honey? O base, murmuring, and discontented spirits, that forget what once they were, and rather prize the bondage they were in before, than are thankful for God's present mercies.

For us not to look back to God's former mercies, goes to the very heart of God. God has an expression in Ezek. xvi. 43, that it frets him to the very heart; "Because thou hast not remembered the days of thy youth, but hast fretted me in all these things." It is a thing that frets God to see a people so unworthy of mercy, when God comes in such ways of mercy to them. My brethren, God has done great things for us, whatever others say and think. Let them murmur, and repine, and say what they will; let us say God has done great things for us. Let us lay to heart our late condition, that so we may be stirred up now to seek after God, that we may never be brought into that condition again. If they would have it again, much good may it do them; but for us, let it be our care to seek God, and to use all lawful means to prevent our bringing back to it again.

For even our present straits are an aggravation of our former misery and present mercy, it should not therefore make our former misery, or present mercy, seem less, but greater. How is that? you will say. Thus; if now we have so much help and power to hinder a party that seek our ruin, yet they have so much strength and resolution, what would have become of us if this had been before, when we had no way nor means to help us? If men complain now, what would they have done then? Therefore, whereas some make use of our straits to lessen our former misery, and think we are now in a worse condition than before, rather let us make it an aggravation of God's mercy towards us; and if we be in such straits now, when God has raised up such means beyond all our thought to resist the flowing in of misery upon us, Lord, whither were we going? what would have become of us if the stream, which had been so long swelling, had broken in upon us when there was no means to have resisted it? We may well see now, that if their intentions and resolutions are so strong for mischief as will not be hindered, notwithstanding the present strength God has granted us to oppose them, surely they had most vile intentions, and dreadful things were determined against us, which would have brought us low indeed, and have made us the most miserable people upon the earth, if God had not come in so miraculously for our help, as he has done at this day.

Therefore, as we read in Jer. xxxvii. 20, "Let my supplication," saith he to the king, "I pray thee, be acceptable before thee, that thou cause me not to return to the house of Jonathan the scribe, lest I die there." So let us present our supplications to the King of heaven, that we may not be sent back to that condition we were once in, that God may not strip us and leave us naked. We have many blessings; Lord, do not strip us, do not strip us of all the ornaments thou hast put upon us.

And would you not have God strip you of your ornaments? be you willing to strip yourselves of your ornaments. Exod. xxxiii. 5, God calls upon the people there, "Put off thy ornaments from thee, that I may know what to do unto thee." This is true and seasonable at this time, in the literal sense, you are called now to strip you of your ornaments. Strip from your fingers your gold rings now when there is need of them; perhaps one of your gold rings would serve to maintain a soldier a month or five weeks, or more; and yet you may have the benefit of it again afterward. Strip your cupboards from your pompous show of plate. It is much if you should not be willing to have your fingers stripped naked, when we are in danger to have the state stripped naked of all our comforts and ornaments. Is it such a great matter to have your cupboard naked of plate now? what if a white cloth were upon it, and all that glittering show taken away, were that such a great sacrifice now, when God is about to strip us naked, and set us as in the day wherein we were born? Certainly all of you, who shall keep your plate now for the pompous adorning of cupboards, cannot but be ashamed of it. Surely you must rather keep it up in your trunks. It cannot but be both a sin and a shame to see such glittering pomp and glory in such times as these.

Strip yourselves of your ornaments, that God strip you not; and not only outwardly, but strip yourselves of your ornaments by your humiliation, for that is the meaning of that place in Exodus. O come and humble yourselves, and come now with naked hearts before the Lord; open your hearts before God, bring them naked and sincere before him, lest he strip you and the kingdom naked. Cry unto God for mercy: O Lord, thou knowest what a vile heart I have had, a base, time-serving heart; yet, Lord, I desire to take away all these cloaks now, and to rend and bring this heart naked before thee; though it be a filthy heart, yet open it. Lord, thou knowest those vile things, those innovations, those superstitions, those horrible wickednesses that were in danger to be let into the church and commonwealth, yet they were things that went down very well with me, and I had distinctions to colour them; but, Lord, it was my base heart that I could not trust thee, but now here I open it naked before thee. O Lord, these ordinances of thine, of the purity and power of which others spake so much, they have been things unsavoury to me, I had no skill in such things. Thou knowest I had a neutralizing spirit, I looked which way the wind blew; how just were it for thee to give me up to be of a desperate malignant spirit! Now, Lord, I come as a naked, wretched creature before thee, in the shame and guilt of my sin, and here I acknowledge thou mayst justly strip me naked of all the comforts of my estate, and leave me in the most miserable condition in which ever poor creature was left. My heart is open before thee, show me what I shall do; and if thou dost reserve any of my estate and comforts which I have forfeited, in testimony of my humiliation for my former sins, I bring it before thee, and am willing to give it up for the public good, and to prevent that evil and mischief that I am sure my sins call for, for my sins cry for wrath against the land, that thou shouldst strip it naked. If all had been such base spirits as I have been, what would have become of the land by this time? In testimony therefore of my humiliation for my sins, here I bring in this of my estate; though indeed, if I had not been guilty of such sins, yet, out of common prudence, and respect to my own security, I might bring in some part; but here is so much the more of my estate, because my conscience tells me of my former guilt. And, Lord, for the time to come, I am resolved to do the uttermost I can for thee and thy cause. And those worthies that carry their lives in their hands for me, God forbid that I should have the least hand in betraying them, in withdrawing my hand and assistance from them. Lord, here I give up myself to thee, and my estate, I surrender it to thee in an everlasting covenant. This is to come with a naked heart indeed before the Lord.

Were it not better that we should be willing to strip ourselves naked, than that God should do it by violence, that God should send soldiers into our houses to strip us naked, as they have dealt with our brethren in Ireland? they took not away their estates only, but all their clothes, and sent them in droves as naked as they were born. We know we have deserved the like. If you will not strip yourselves of your superfluities, God may justly by them strip you naked; and not only bring you into the same condition you were in, but into a far worse; for so he threatens in Dent, xviii., You shall not only be carried back again into Egypt, but "there you shall be sold unto your enemies for bondmen and bondwomen, and no man shall buy you;" they should be in a worse condition than when they were first in Egypt. So, if there be any of you willing to sell your consciences in hope of preferment, the other side may get power and prevail, and so, instead of being preferred, you may be disappointed, not only be brought into as ill, but into a far worse condition. And perhaps, though you would have sold yourselves, yet nobody will buy you; if the papists come to have the power of your bodies and estates, you may miss that preferment you think of. So saith Ezra, chap. ix. 14, after he had spoken of God's mercy in giving them liberty, and remitting their captivity, "Should we again break thy commandments, and join in affinity with the people of these abominations? wouldst thou not be angry with us till thou hadst consumed us, so that there should be no remnant nor escaping?" And, certainly, if God do not awaken the hearts of people now, if God do not give the people throughout the kingdom a heart to stick to the cause of truth, and to those whom they have intrusted with their estates, liberties, and lives, in every good way, it would be the heaviest judgment of God that ever was upon a nation since the beginning of the earth, it would never be paralleled; that a people should have such an opportunity put into their hands to help, and to vindicate themselves from slavery and bondage, yet, out of I know not what respects, to betray all those that have ventured their lives for them, I say it would be such an example as were not to be paralleled since the beginning of the world. Therefore I beseech you, my brethren, let us lay this to heart, and the Lord make known to us all what is to be done in such a time as this, that we may not be "stripped naked, and set as in the day wherein we were born."

"And make her as a wilderness, and set her like a dry land." God would bring this people, who dwell in the land of Canaan, flowing with milk and honey, and were, for the beauty which God had put upon them, "excellent for beauty," now to be "as a wilderness." In the former chapter, the state of the ten tribes was set out by Hosea's wife, whose name was "Gomer," and this Gomer was the "daughter of Diblaim." Gomer signifies perfection, and what Diblaim signifies I told you then. But there is another signification of this Diblaim, which we are to refer to this expression of the Lord in this place, that he will "make her as a wilderness;" for you find, Ezek. vi. 14, that mention is made of a desolate country, and a "wilderness towards Diblath," to which this that the prophet speaks of Gomer seems to have reference.

Diblath then, it appears, was a place where there was a very desolate wilderness, and Gomer was the daughter of this Diblath, from whence Diblaim; that is, though the ten tribes were as Gomer, in regard of their beauty, perfect, for so they were; yet she was the daughter of Diblath, or Diblaim, that is, she came forth out of a low and mean condition, and was even brought out of a wilderness; now she shall be brought again into the same estate wherein she was, for I will set her "as a wilderness."

"As a wilderness." The church of God is in itself God's garden, Cant. iv. 12, "A garden enclosed is my sister, my spouse." It is the place of God's delight, not a place for beasts to invade, but enclosed, they are to be kept out of it; a place where very precious fruits grow, which are very pleasing to God; a place that has the dew, the showers of God's blessing, "the dew of Hermon," the dew "that descended upon the mountains of Zion; there God commanded his blessing, even life for evermore," Psal. cxxxiii. 3. But now she must come to be "a wilderness."

For, first, the hedge, the pale, the wall of God's protection shall be taken away from her, and she shall be laid open, liable for all wild beasts to come in and devour her. They loved liberty, and were loth to be enclosed, though it were in God's garden, though it was with the pale and wall of God's protection; well, seeing you will have liberty, you shall have liberty, and this pale and wall of my garden shall be taken away, and your condition shall be like the condition of the beasts in the wilderness.

Again, you shall be "as a wilderness." There shall no good grow among you. No good thing grew amongst you, that was your sin; and there shall no good grow among you, that shall be your plague and punishment. The blessing of God shall be taken away from you, you shall not have those showers of blessing as formerly you were wont to have, but you shall be "as a wilderness." "Cursed be the man that trusteth in man, and maketh flesh his arm, and whose heart departeth from the Lord." Why? "For he shall be like the heath in the desert, and shall not see when good cometh; but shall inhabit the parched places in the wilderness, in a salt land and not inhabited," Jer. xvii. 5, 6. Vatablus interprets this judgment upon the hearts of idolaters; they are dry, unsavoury; they are destitute of all spiritual good.

"And I will set her like a dry land."

The Septuagint read it, I will order her as a dry land. Your sins bring you out of order; but God's plagues order that which sin disorders. "As a dry land." This is contrary to the blessing of the godly man, for he is said to be as the "tree planted by the rivers of waters," Psal. i. 3. The graces and comforts of God's Spirit are compared to waters in the Scripture: "All my springs are in thee," Psal. lxxxvii. 7; all my comforts, all my gifts, all the graces that I have, are in thee. But now God will set them as a dry land, he will take away his gifts and their comforts from them, and so leave them waste and desolate.

Obs. That sin is of a wasting nature: sin lays waste countries and places in which people live. We have a most remarkable place of Scripture for that, Zech. vii. 14, "They laid the pleasant land desolate." They; who are they? you shall find it, ver. 12, those that "made their hearts as an adamant stone, lest they should hear the law, and the words which the Lord of hosts hath sent in his spirit by the former prophets;" they made the pleasant land desolate. We not only blame those that strip and waste, but commence actions against them. O let us not lay waste this pleasant land, this good land of ours, this garden of the Lord. It is indeed as an Eden, as a paradise; our forefathers have left us this our land, as God's garden; let not us, through our sins, leave it to our posterities as a wilderness, and a dry land. In Psal. cvii. 34, there is a threatening that God will turn "a fruitful land into barrenness, for the wickedness of them that dwell therein." Sin has heretofore laid waste as pleasant and fruitful countries as ours. Those who travel in Germany, their hearts bleed within them to see the spots where famous towns have stood, now overgrown with nettles, and laid waste as a wilderness. And in this God acts after the manner of great kings, who, when their subjects obey them not, threaten to lay their countries waste, and to destroy their cities. Ecclesiastical stories tell us of Theodosius, who laid great taxes upon the city of Antioch, at which the inhabitants were much grieved, and imagining, it seems, that the queen had a special hand in it, they pulled down the brazen statue of the queen, that was in the city, in anger. Upon this, Theodosius threatened to lay the city and country waste, as a fruit of his displeasure. It is a fruit of the anger of kings, according to their power, to manifest it, not only upon particular men, but to lay whole countries waste. God is the great King, and he threatens this against his people for their sins, that he will lay them waste as a wilderness. God had rather that the wild beasts should eat up the good of the land, than that wicked, stubborn sinners should enjoy it: God had rather have a land under his curse, to have nothing but thorns and briars brought forth of it, than that wicked wretches should partake of the sweetness and fruit of it; for sin not only pollutes the sinner, but the land, and puts both the sinner and the land under a curse.

"And slay them with thirst." In Psal. xxxvi. 8, we have a full expression of the plentiful provision of God's people that dwell in the house of the Lord; "They shall be abundantly satisfied with the fatness of thy house; and thou shalt make them drink of the river of thy pleasures." Oh what a sweet promise to those that dwell in God's house, and walk with God as besicms those that are in his house! they shall have fatness, and drink of the river of his pleasures; but here is threatened, that God will not only take away those rivers, but even drops of water; they shall not have a drop to cool their tongues, but shall be slain with thirst. There was a time when God had such pity upon his people that he would cause water to gush out of the rock, rather than their thirst should not be satisfied: but now God threatens that he will make "the heavens as brass, and the earth as iron;" and though a little water might save their lives, they should not have it, he will slay them with thirst. Oh what an alteration does sin make in God's administration of his ways towards us!

It is a great judgment thus to be slain with thirst. I knew a man once, lying in a burning fever, profess, that if he had all the world at his disposal he would give it all for one draught of beer: at so low a rate is the world at such a time as that. If the want of a little beer or water to satisfy thirst for a little while, be so great a judgment, what is it for all good to be eternally withdrawn from all the faculties! I have read that when Darius fled from his enemies, and being in great thirst, (though those kings had a delicate drink that was peculiar to them, which they called coaspis, and others, ἕδωρ βασιλικόν.) he met with a dirty puddle of water, with carrion lying in it, but he drank very heartily of it, and professed, that it was the sweetest draught that ever he drank. If a little dirty water can afford so much comfort when the faculties are in such a disposition as fits them to draw comfort out of it, oh, then, what comfort and goodness are there in an infinite God, when he shall communicate to his creature all that good which is communicable! and when all the faculties of soul and body shall be in a full disposition to receive all the good that is communicated; and not put into a disposition by reason of want, but by reason of the excellency of the faculty raised to such a height, and enlarged to receive what good God himself has to communicate to his creature.

Cum in fuga quam turbidam et calidam verbis iniquitatem bibisset, negavit unquam se haurire jucundius, nunquam scilicet (ut Cicero lib. 1. Tusce, ait) sitiens bibisset.

But further, it is observable, though God brought them into a wilderness, and set them in a dry land; yet if they might have some drink, though but water, to refresh them in the wilderness, and in this dry land, it were not so much. Though they were in a scorching country, in the wilderness, parched with heat, might they have but some refreshment there, the judgment were not so great; but they shall be in a wilderness, in a dry land, and there they shall be scorched with heat, and then God shall deny them all succour. He will slay them with thirst.

Obs. God brings wicked men into extremity, and there leaves them destitute of all succour. We have an excellent scripture for this, in Ezek. xxii. 20, "I will gather you in mine anger and in my fury;" and what then? "I will leave you there, and melt you," saith God. This may be a comment upon this text, I will bring into the wilderness, and set them in a dry land, and slay them with thirst. The saints may be brought into great extremity, but God leaves them not there. God makes their extremity his opportunity for mercy, he brings refreshing to them then. They never have more sweet refreshings from God than when they are in the greatest extremities in regard of trouble and affliction. God promises that he will be "a shadow for them in the day time from the heat, and for a place of refuge, and for a covert from storm and from rain," Isa. iv. 6. This is God's peculiar mercy to the saints; perhaps they have no shelter now, but when the storm comes they have a shelter then; and they have a shadow when the heat comes; in their extremity they have comfort. But it is otherwise with the wicked; the wicked perhaps may have many shelters before the storm comes, but when it arrives they are destitute; they may have many shady places before the heat comes, but when it is felt they are left succourless, then they are slain with thirst. When wicked men are in prosperity, there may come one blessing after another (I mean that which is in itself a blessing) heaped upon them, but when they come into adversity, when they have most need of comfort, they are left destitute.

This slaying "with thirst" is applied by some spiritually; I will bring a spiritual famine upon them. When they shall be in a wilderness, in a dry land, when they shall have most need of comfort for their souls, they shall be deprived of it. Many men, in the time of their health and prosperity, have sweet promises of the gospel revealed to them, many blessed manifestations of God's free grace and goodness in his Christ made known to them, but they slight and disregard them. But when God brings them into the wilderness, and causes them to be under the torment of a scorching conscience, then perhaps they may long, Oh that I had one drop of water, one promise out of the word to comfort me! Oh that I might have but never so little refreshing! Oh that I might hear again those things I have heretofore heard and neglected! But then God may deny one drop of water to cool their scorching consciences, and slay their souls with thirst at that time: and thus many poor creatures are slain with thirst, who so little regarded those rivers of consolation, which in the time of their prosperity they might have had.

Ver. 4. And I will not have mercy upon her children, for they be the children of whoredoms.

I confess, at the first view, looking upon this verse, I thought I might quickly pass it over; the rather, because we had some such expressions in the former chapter, where God threatened that he would have no mercy upon them: but the Scripture is a vast depth, and there are many excellent treasures in it, there is always aliquid revisentibus, something for those that come and look again, and this something will appear to be much more than before had been observed.

"And I will not have mercy." This particle and has much in it, it is a most terrible and. This conjunction many times in Scripture is as a pleonasm, and does not serve for much use; but in this place it is of great use, and is filled with terror, as full as it is possible for such a little particle to hold.

I know there may be many curious observations of particles and conjunctions; but we shall not meddle with any curiosity, but speak of that which is plain, and the intention of the Holy Ghost here. I say this and is most dreadful; mark the conjunction, you had four ands before; saith God, I will "strip her naked, and set her as in the day wherein she was born, and make her as a wilderness, and set her as a dry land, and slay her with thirst." Is not here enough? O no, there comes a fifth, and that is more terrible than all the former four; "And I will have no mercy upon her children." This adds terror to all the rest. Suppose that all the other four had been executed, "I will strip her naked, and set her as in the day that she was born, and I will make her as a wilderness, and set her as a dry land, and slay her with thirst," yet if there might be mercy in all this, their condition had not been so miserable; but (saith God) I will do all these, "and I will not have mercy upon them." O this has terror in it, impossible for the heart of a man that apprehends it to stand under.

And for the opening of this, I shall show you that all the former four, not only may stand with God's mercy, but that they have stood with God's mercy; that God had heretofore showed mercy to them when they were in the low condition in which they were born, when they were in the wilderness, when they were in a dry land, yea, when he did slay them, he showed mercy unto them. But now he saith, he will do thus and thus, and show no mercy unto them. So that then, though this and be conjunctive in grammar, yet in divinity it is a disjunctive, and a most dreadful disjunctive, to part them and mercy asunder, yea, to part many of them and mercy eternally asunder. To show you, therefore, that in the four former God showed them mercy; and that this is a more dreadful condition in which God will show them no mercy,—observe,

First, "In the day wherein they were born," they were "cast out in the open field," and they were "in their blood," and "not washed," and the like: but mark, "I passed by thee, and looked upon thee; behold, thy time was the time of love; and I spread my skirt over thee, and covered thy nakedness: yea, I swear unto thee, and entered into a covenant with thee, and thou becamest mine," Ezek. xvi. 8. Here are the highest and fullest expressions of God's grace; first, "I looked upon thee," and then, "the time was a time of love," and then, "I spread my skirt over thee, and I entered into covenant with thee, and thou becamest mine:" here are all these expressions of mercy, at that time when they were cast out as forlorn in the open field, and no eye pitied them; but now they are threatened to be cast out into the field again, and no eye to pity them in heaven or in earth; no, nor the eye of God to pity them: now God threatens to cast them off for ever, so that he will see them in their blood, but it shall be no more a time of love, but a time of wrath, and he will no more enter into covenant with them, neither shall they be his.

Secondly, When God brought them into the wilderness, he there showed them mercy: see Deut. xxxii. 10, "He found him in a desert land, and in the waste howling wilderness;" but mark, "he led him about, he instructed him, he kept him as the apple of his eye." Though they were in a waste howling wilderness, yet they were as dear to God "as the apple of his eye." Yea further, ver. 11, "As an eagle stirreth up her nest, fluttereth over her young, spreadeth abroad her wings, taketh them, beareth them on her wings, so the Lord alone did lead him." Paulus Fagius, citing Rabbi Solomon upon this verse, observes, The eagle carries her young ones not as other birds, for other birds carry their young ones in their claws, the eagle bears hers upon her wings; and this is the reason, because the eagle is more tender of her young ones than other birds are; why? for the other birds carrying their young ones in their claws, if any shoot at them, they hit the young ones and kill them first, and may miss the old one, but the eagle carries hers upon her wings, that whoever shoots her young ones, they must shoot through her first. So saith God, I carried you in the wilderness, as the eagle carries her young ones upon her wings, that if any shoot at you to hurt you, they must shoot through me before they can come at you. This was God's mercy to them when they were in the waste howling wilderness; here is not such an and.

Thirdly, God brought them into a dry land. In this wilderness they wanted water, yet (though they were ready to murmur) "he made them suck honey out of the rock, and oil out of the flinty rock," Deut. xxxii. 13. You will say, When did God make them suck honey out of the rock? we read indeed, that water gushed out of the rock in a dry land, but here the Scripture speaks, that "he made them suck honey out of the rock, and oil out of the flinty rock." Chrysostom, speaking upon God's making them suck honey and oil out of the rock, remarks: Not, saith he, that indeed honey or oil came out of the rock, but because they being in the wilderness, and in such great want, the water that came out of the rock was to them as sweet and delightful, as if it had been honey or oil. Thence he gathers, that want and necessity will make every thing very sweet and comfortable, water will be as honey and oil to them that want. When you are at your full tables, this wine pleases you not, and that beer gratifies you not; but if you were in necessity, water would be as wine, it would be as honey and oil to you.

Yea, but what say you to the fourth and, "He will slay them with thirst?" Can you show us any place wherein God slew his people, yet showed mercy to them? Yes, I can. There is a place where it is said, God slew his people, yet at that very time he showed abundance of mercy to them; God came with his sword in his hand, yet with abundance of compassion in his heart. The scripture is Psal. lxxviii. 34, 35, "When he slew them, then they sought him: and they returned and inquired early after God, and they remembered that God was their rock, and the high God their redeemer." Well, "they sought him;" and "they remembered" this, that "the high God was their redeemer;" but did God redeem them at that time? Yes; ver. 38, "He, being full of compassion, forgave their iniquity, and destroyed them not: yea, many a time turned he his anger away, and did not stir up all his wrath;" or, as the old translation has it, He called back his anger, which here he will not do. He was "full of compassion," and "forgave their iniquity," and called back his anger, though he slew them at that time. He denies to do so here, he lets out his anger to the full, and will not call it back; "I will have no mercy upon them." And it is observable, that the psalm declares before that, they did but flatter God with their mouth: though they did but flatter God with their mouth, yet such was God's mercy toward them, that he called back his anger. My brethren, God has a high esteem of his worship in a nation; though it should be but external, (but we must not rest in that,) yet external humiliation and worshipping of God in a nation, has been effectual to deliver them from external judgments. Therefore we have much cause to be encouraged, in that God stirs up our nation at this day, and those particularly who are going in that expedition and service for the kingdom, to worship him. Our adversaries come against them with oaths and curses, and they go against them with fasting and prayer, not externally only, but we hope many of them internally, and thousands that join with them in our nation. And if God will show so much mercy to them when they did but flatter him with their mouth, surely, when there are so many true worshippers of him, yea, those that are the instruments of the work, we have much cause to think that God will show mercy to us, and that if anger were come out against us, yet God will call it back.

Thus then we see, that so long as God's people be God's people, though they may be brought to great troubles, yet still there is mercy for them; so long as the knot is between God and them, and they are in covenant, there is mercy for them. But now when they are cast off, there comes an and, I will do thus and thus, bring them into these extremities, and I will show no mercy to them, there shall be judgment without mercy.

Obs. The observation then from hence is, When God comes upon the wicked with wrath, he comes with pure wrath, wrath without mixture of mercy; and this is intolerable. We have a remarkable passage in Ezek. vii. 5, "An evil, an only evil, behold, is come." Mark, there may come an evil to the people of God, that which materially is evil, but it can never be said of God's people, that an evil, an only evil, is coming; if an evil come, there comes a great good with that evil; but upon the wicked an evil, and an only evil, is coming. God threatens, Psal. lxxv. 8, that he has "a cup" in his hand, "full of mixture;" the mixture is an aggra-vation of the wrath in it: but here there is a cup in God's hand without mixture, and the want of mixture is the aggravation of the evil of this cup.

1. When wrath is pure, then it is grown beyond anger, and grown to hatred. So long as it is but mere anger, it admits of mixture of love, but when once it is (as we may speak) grown to that height of sourness, that all the mixture of love is gone, then it is turned to hatred. There was a time when Israel spake in a murmuring way, that God brought them into the wilderness because he hated them, Deut. i. 27. But now God threatens to bring them into the wilderness, and to hate them indeed, according to Hosea ix. 15, "All their wickedness is in Gilgal, for there I hated them." David prays, Psal. vi. 1, that God would not "rebuke him in his anger, neither chasten him in his hot displeasure;" but what then? "Have mercy upon me, O Lord." So long as God shows mercy, he does not chasten in his sore displeasure; but when God comes with afflictions, and denies mercy, then he comes in sore displeasure indeed, it is hatred.

2. When God comes without mercy, he comes upon the wicked in the most unseasonable time for them. That is the difference betwixt the evils that come upon the godly and the wicked. There may be evils (that materially are so) upon the godly, yet they shall come upon them when it shall be seasonable for them; but when they come upon the wicked, it shall be when they are most unseasonable for them. As a husbandman, if he would cut his tree so as only to lop it that it may grow and flourish again, he will be sure to do it in due time, as in January or February, but if he would cut it that it may die, he will lop it when it flourisheth most, at midsummer. God indeed lets wicked men grow up and flourish to the height of their prosperity, and then he lops them, because then he knows they must die and perish. It were better to be lopped in January, in winter time before you flourish, then you may live for your good; but if you stay till the summer, you die for it. You have an excellent scripture, Zeph. ii. 4, "They shall drive out Ashdod at the noon day." In those countries where the sun was exceedingly hot and scorching, shepherds, and others who had their business abroad, used to keep within their houses at noon day, or get into some shady places and sleep. Now when God threatens a judgment in wrath, and denies mercy, he saith, "They shall drive out Ashdod at noon day," in the worst time that Ashdod can be driven out, in the midst of scorching. Because God intended to destroy them, he drives them out at noon day.

3. When God comes upon the wicked and denies mercy, he regards not the proportion of any affliction or any evil; whether it be enough or not enough for them, what is that to him? When he comes upon his own people he weighs out his wrath. Never did any skilful apothecary more carefully weigh every dram of the potion which is to be given to a child, than God weighs out every affliction which he sends upon his children. The difference is, just as if you should go to the apothecary's to take ratsbane to poison vermin; you do not weigh out how much you should take, but give them it at an adventure, and let them take as much as they will, and die: but if you take any thing for your child, if it have any strong virtue in it, or without composition may poison, you will take heed not to take a dram or a grain too much, but will be sure to weigh it out exactly. Thus, though when God comes to his children, he weighs out their afflictions, yet when he comes with judgments upon the wicked, he cares not how much, how many or great they be, whether suitable to their conditions or no, whether they can bear them or no, whether their backs break or no; he comes with judgments upon them to destroy them.

4. When affliction comes without mercy upon the wicked, God stops his ears at their cries. If they cry when God comes with judgments against them, he calls their crying howling; he tells them, though they cry aloud, yea, cry with tears, he will not hear them, Hos. vii. 14; Ezek. viii. 18.

5. God commands all creatures that they shall deny help to them. They may stand and be amazed, but help them they cannot. They all say, How can we help, seeing God helps not?

6. There is the curse of God mixed with every judgment to drive them further from God, and to harden them more in their sins.

7. One judgment is but the making way for another; yea, all judgments in this world are but the forerunners of eternal judgments. This is the portion of the cup of the wicked, when God saith he will show them no mercy. The afflictions of the saints may seem to be more grievous outwardly, but thus God never afflicts them, there is mercy always for them. Wherefore, all ye saints of God who are under any affliction at any time, be patient and contented under it, for though your afflictions are sore and grievous, yet God delivers you from such afflictions as these, wherein he saith he will show no mercy.

"I will not have mercy upon her children." "Her children." The judgment of God in punishing the sin of the fathers upon the children, we spoke somewhat of in the chapter before; we will wholly let that pass now, and only consider children politically, for certainly that is the meaning of the text; "I will not have mercy upon her children," that is, I will not have mercy upon the particular people that belong to Jezreel. Private persons are called the daughters of Jerusalem, the daughters of such a country. So that the whole community together, with the officers and governors, are as the mother, and private persons are as the children. So that when God saith he will have no mercy upon her children, he not only threatens the state and the church, the governors and the whole community thus, but he threatens every particular person of them. Though you that are in the multitude perhaps think you may escape in the crowd; No, saith God, I will look to every one of the private and particular persons of Israel, and my wrath shall not only come out against those that are in higher place, but it shall come out against you also, I will slay her children. It is true, indeed, the heads and governors of places are usually most involved in the guilt of the sins of nations, and their judgments are usually most dreadful when God comes with national judgments; as Numb. xxv. 3, 4, "Israel joined herself to Baal-Peor, and the anger of the Lord was kindled against Israel, and the Lord said unto Moses, Take all the heads of the people, and hang them up before the Lord, against the sun." The Lord's anger was kindled against the people, but he bade Moses especially look to the heads, and take them and hang them up before the Lord, that the fierce anger of the Lord might be turned away from Israel. Certainly execution of wrath upon such as have been heads in evil, is a sacrifice exceedingly well pleasing to God. But though God aim at them especially in national judgments, yet private persons must not think to escape; and that upon these grounds.

First, Because for their sins God often suffers their governors to do so much evil as they do. As Israel had sinned, and God was wroth with Israel, therefore David did what he did in numbering the people. When you see your governors do that which is naught, lament for your own sins; do not spend your time only in crying out against them, but look to yourselves, it is for your sins that God has left them to do as they have done.

Secondly, The reason why governors do not reform, may be the perverseness of people, that they are not in a preparation to receive that good which, otherwise, our governors had in their hands and hearts to accomplish. As 2 Chron. xx. 33, "Howbeit the high places were not taken away:" why? "for as yet the people had not prepared their hearts unto the God of their fathers." Should they have pulled down the high places? No; but they should have been in a preparation for the pulling of them down. Certainly this is the great cause why our high places are not pulled down, why reformation has gone on no better than it has, and why we have so much evil remaining amongst us, because the people have not prepared their hearts, are not in a disposition to receive the mercy that our governors have hearts to bring to us. They have hearts to work for us, but when we speak to them of what is fit to be done, their answer is, But is England in a fit disposition to receive such a thing? So that the truth is, although you are ready to blame your governors, and to say, They have power in their hands, why do they not reform things? yet the guilt, in great part, devolves upon the people, they are not in a fit disposition to receive such reformation; therefore God threatens the children, the people, here.

Again, further, It may be that the governors who are evil, are so much encouraged and abetted in that which is evil by you; though you do it not, yet you so much encourage them that the guilt redounds upon you.

Yea, lastly, If you obey them in any thing that is evil, the guilt devolves upon you, for you should not do it, but rather obey God than man. Many think to make this their plea, they are commanded to do thus, and governors would have them do it, and it is a law, and the like; and they think upon this plea they may do any thing in the world. This will not secure you, God may come with judgment without mercy upon the children, as well as upon the mother. And if God's wrath should come in national judgments against England, let the people know that they are likely to smart most dreadfully, for never was there a time in our days, nor in our forefathers' days, that so much depended upon the people as at this day; never were they called to afford such help as they are now. So that the people now may have reformation and blessings, if it be not through their own fault. As in Cant. vii. 1, the church is described in her beauty, and it begins at her feet, "How beautiful are thy feet!" And in Cant. v. 11, Christ is described in his beauty, and it begins at the head, "His head is as the most fine gold." God sometimes makes use of the people to be great means, and perhaps the beginning of means, to bring beauty to the church, though they cannot perfect it. Heretofore private persons could do little; alas, they were under grievous oppressions, they knew not how to help themselves. Many men that had purses, and strength, and heads, and hearts, and all, knew not what to do, but make their moan one to another, and to Heaven; but now it is otherwise, you may do somewhat besides making your moan one to another, yea, besides making your moan to Heaven: you that have purses may see ways to employ them for the public good, for religion, for liberty; you that have strength of body may know what to do; you that have parts, you are called to help, you may join together for good, and the good of your country, you may do much more than heretofore could be done. Wherefore now, if you should desert the cause of God, and those you have trusted, you must expect the most dreadful wrath of God upon the people, and that without mercy, that ever was upon any nation since the beginning of the world; for never any nation had more depending upon the people, than there is at this day upon the people of England. Consider it, and oh that all the people of the land did but know what God would have them to do in such a time as this!

"I will not have mercy upon her children;" upon particular private persons in the society. One note more upon that, It is a dangerous thing for men in any society to do as the most do. If they be in a civil society, or in a church, to give their votes, and to act as the greater part act, without any examination, is dangerous. For though the community may do that which is evil, you shall not be excused by saying, Why, what could I help it, when the most did the same? God comes upon private and particular men, upon the children, even every one of them: and why?

“For they are the children of whoredoms;” that is, either passively or actively: passively, because they were begotten of whoredoms, and brought up, their education had been in whoredom, they had it from their parents: or else they are “the children of whoredoms” actively, they live in the same whoredoms their mother did. From hence,

Obs. 1. There is little hope of children who are educated wickedly. If the dye has been in the wool, it is hard to get it out of the cloth. If evil principles have been dropped into children, there is little hope of them for good, especially of those children who have been brought up in ways of superstition and idolatry, their hearts being so defiled and hardened in superstitious and idolatrous ways, that they seldom come to any good. Therefore that which has been proposed is very good, namely, to take the children of papists, and to bring them up in the education and knowledge of the truth.

Obs. 2. This shall not excuse children, though they be “children of whoredoms.” It is no excuse for them to say, they had it from their parents, and they did as their parents have done, and as they commanded them, and according as they brought them up, for the wrath of God cometh upon “the children of disobedience.” Then what a mercy is it for us to be brought up in the truth; to have parents that profess the truth, and for our education to be in the way of truth! It is a mercy of which we do not consider to give God the glory. How dangerous is it to have superstitious, idolatrous parents, and to have such kind of education! If they have Turks, or Jews, or papists to their parents, and such education, it is not one of ten thousand that alters his religion. Therefore it is likely our condition would have been the same, if God had not ordered it, that our parents should be such as profess the truth, and our education be according to the truth. Bless God for this. And you that are parents, look to your children, and bring them up in the truth. Children who have gracious principles dropped into them, and watered by prayers and tears, there is hope of them; and not of them alone, but of the nation where they live.

Obs. 3. When God’s judgments are abroad in the world, let “the children of whoredoms” look to it, God threatens “he will have no mercy upon them, for they are the children of whoredoms.” They are the butt of God’s wrath when his judgments come. God saith in Isa. xxvii. 4, “Fury is not in me,” that is, it is not in me toward my saints; though I come out in fury, yet it is not in me towards them. What then? “Who would set the briars and thorns against me in battle? I would go through them, I would burn them together.” When my wrath comes against the briars and thorns, I will go through them and burn them together: but toward my children, “fury is not in me.” When God’s wrath is abroad in the world, let not the children of the bride-chamber fear, but let the children of whoredoms tremble. Let briars and thorns fear, but not the fruitful trees in God’s garden. God’s judgments know how to make a difference between men, they are distinguishing things when they come abroad: God sends not his judgments hand over head, but puts into them a distinguishing quality. God has a chamber of rest and safety for his people, wherein he will hide them till his indignation be overpast; but for the children of whoredoms, superstitious, idolatrous, wicked, and ungodly people, they are the people of God’s indignation, they are like Idumca, the people of God’s curse, as you have it in Isa. xxxiv. 5.

There are a people this day amongst us who are certainly the people of God’s curse, and let them look to it well. Rev. xiv. 8, “Babylon is fallen, is fallen,” saith an angel; and mark what follows, ver. 9, 10, “And the third angel followed them, saying, with a loud voice, If any man worship the beast and his image, and receive his mark in his forehead or in his hand, the same shall drink of the wine of the wrath of God, which is poured out without mixture into the cup of his indignation.” According to this text, God will have no mercy, they shall drink of the wine of the wrath of God, without mixture of any mercy at all. And further, “He shall be tormented with fire and brimstone in the presence of the holy angels, and in the presence of the Lamb; and the smoke of their torment ascendeth up for ever and ever; and they have no rest day nor night, who worship the beast and his image, and whosoever receiveth the mark of his name.” Here is a dreadful threat against such as follow the ways of that great whore of Babylon. Blessed are they that in these times have testimony in their own consciences, that it has been their care above all things to draw themselves out from the guilt of all superstitious and idolatrous vanities, and to keep themselves, according to the light that God has discovered to them, pure from the pollutions of that man of sin. Blessed, I say, are these, they need not fear this day; but for those who have involved themselves in the guilt of those pollutions, they have need to humble their souls before God, and to cry mightily, for wrath is going out against the children of whoredoms. It is not meant only of hell hereafter, but of judgment even in this world. And above all times that have been since antichrist began, it is a most desperate thing to be a papist in these days, because now is the time for God to make these children of whoredoms the very butt of his wrath and indignation.

We hear of wars, and rumours of wars: my brethren, keep your hearts chaste to God, and fear not, for God has another manner of people to deal with than you; you shall be sealed first, before the wrath come out. Though I cannot excuse you altogether from suffering some afflictions, these children of whoredoms may bring some trouble upon the saints for the present, yea, perhaps some of you may have your blood spilt, but God has mercy to bestow upon you: but for them there is wrath, and wrath without mixture, God saith he will have no mercy upon the children of whoredoms.

Let such as are going forth then in the service of religion and liberty, go forth with courage and undauntedness of spirit; why? for they fight against none but those whom God fights against. Who are they, but those who have showed themselves fighters against God, most abominable swearers and blasphemers, such as make no other use of the light of the gospel, but to scorn and condemn it; such as are open despisers of God and his truth, and of his people? Certainly, if there be a cursed generation upon the face of the earth, these are the people, whose mouths are full of curses; and God’s curse is upon them, who are so full of cursings themselves. If there be any of you here that are now going, or hereafter may go forth in this service, your spirits should rise with indignation against such monsters upon earth, and go against them as David against Goliath, What! shall this uncircumcised Philistine defy the host of the living God? Thus your hearts should rise if you have any love to God and his truth; Shall a company of cursed monsters, that do nothing but blasphemous, and curse, and swear, and defy God, and his servants, and his tabernacle, and worship; shall these uncircumcised Philistines go on thus, defying God and his truth? If you have the hearts of men within you, especially of Christians, methinks you should not be able to bear it, but go forth against them with fulness of spirit and resolution. Certainly, God will make them a prey to you; they are such as not only have put off Christianity, and are become atheists, but they have put off all kind of humanity, and are rather turned monstrous beasts, or devils. Fear them not, though their hearts be full of pride and rage, and though they boast never so much what they are, or what they have done, or what they will do; I say, fear them not, for this is part of the curse of God upon them, that though God fights against them, they will not see it, they shall not see it because God intends to destroy them; though judgments are out against them, yet they will not repent. You find divers times in the book of the Revelation, that those who followed anti-christ, though they were tormented, and all the judgments of God were against them, yet they repented not. Rev. ix. 21; xvi. 9, 11. This, I say, is the curse of God upon such, God will not give them repentance unto life, for they are the children of whoredoms, upon whom God intends to have no mercy: therefore the higher their rage rises, the higher your hearts should rise against them.

Ver. 5. For their mother hath played the harlot: she that conceived them hath done shamefully: for she said, I will go after my lovers, that give me my bread and my water, my wool and my flax, mine oil and my drink.

"Their mother," that is, the state and the church, for they were both involved in one, "hath played the harlot." This "for" has reference two ways; either it may have reference to those words, "I will not have mercy upon them," for not only they are defiled with whoredoms, but their mother also, she has played the harlot; or secondly, it has reference only to the latter part, "they are the children of whoredoms, for their mother hath played the harlot:" either it refers to the reason why God will not have mercy upon them, because their mother hath played the harlot; or to the reason why they are the children of whoredoms, for their mother hath played the harlot. And from both these references we have very useful observations.

Obs. 1. God cannot endure a succession in wickedness. I will not have mercy upon them, "their mother hath played the harlot," and they are children of whoredoms themselves, there is a succession of wickedness among them, and that I cannot bear. The ground is, because those that keep up a succession of wickedness from the mother to the children downward, are guilty of all the wickednesses that went before them in that line: else, how can that be understood, where Christ saith he will require all the blood from Abel to Zacharias upon that generation, but because they, continuing in that way of sin, kept up the succession of that sin; and so that generation was guilty of all the sins of that kind that went before, even unto Abel. The father is a whoremonger, and the child proves to be one too, and so it descends; the child is not only guilty of his own sin, but of his father's, and of his grandfather's, and of all that kind of sin committed before, even up to the beginning of the world; why? because he keeps up the succession of that sin in the world. This is a most terrible thing to consider, enough to wound the strongest heart in the world, especially of those that know they have had wicked parents.

Obs. 2. Children usually follow the example of their parents. "For their mother hath played the harlot," is assigned as the reason why they are children of whoredoms. It is a usual thing where there are profane parents, to have profane children; if the parents swear, to have swearing children; if parents be superstitious, to have superstitious children; if parents be scorners at religion, to have children scorners too. That new nick-name brought against the godly in room of the former, is as frequent in the mouths of children as in others, because children follow their fathers. 2 Kings ii. 23, when Elisha the prophet was going up to Bethel, "there came forth little children out of the city, and said unto him, Go up, thou bald-head; go up, thou bald-head." The thing that I note it for is this, that not only the children did it, and so were destroyed, (for two she-bears came out of the wilderness, and tare forty-two of them,) but what children were they? If you observe the text, you find that they were the children of Bethel; and what place was that? one of the places where the calves were set up, a place of much superstition, and the children were as superstitious as their parents. A place that had the name, The house of God; but no place degenerated more from the name than it, it was a Beth-aven, a house of vanity and wickedness. The place was most superstitious, and its children were those who scorned at the prophet. Again, the prophet saith, Jer. vii. 18, "The children gather wood, and the fathers kindle the fire, and the women knead their dough:" the children joined, you see. Pelagius thought that there was no sin came into the world, but by children imitating their parents. Certainly, imitation is of great power and force to prevail with the hearts of children. You that are wicked parents, had need look to what you do before your children. He that sins before a child, especially a parent, sins doubly, for a child will be ready to imitate it.

What! will you not only sin against God, and be enemies unto him, but will you leave a succession, part of yourselves, to blaspheme God after you are dead? Suppose, parents, you had a plague-sore upon you, would you go amongst your children and breathe upon them? This cruelty is much worse: will you go into your families, and breathe infection into your children, and so make them like you, and guilty of your sins, and of the plagues of God together with you? O cruel parents!

On the other hand, as they were children of whoredoms, because "their mother hath played the harlot," why then should not children be gracious and godly, who have gracious and godly parents? Why should it not be said, This child is a godly child, for his mother was a gracious woman, his father was a godly man? Children, let this be your encomium, You are godly and gracious children, because you had godly and gracious parents; this will be your honour before the saints. But how vile is it, when it may be said, Here is a wicked wretch, yet he had a godly father and mother; here is an unclean and filthy liver, yet he had gracious parents! It is no wonder to say, This man is filthy, for his father was unclean, and his mother was a harlot; but to look upon one and say, Here is an adulterer, yet his father was a godly, gracious man; here is a harlot, yet her mother was a holy woman: oh how vile is this! The reverend Mr. Bolton, upon his death-bed, called his children to come to him, and thus addressed them, "I do believe not one of you will dare to meet me at the tribunal of Christ in an unregenerate condition." You that are evil children of godly parents, let me, in their names, speak to you: With what face do you think you shall dare to meet your godly father and gracious mother before the judgment-seat of Christ Jesus? at that day, if your godly father stand at the right hand of Christ, how can you appear before that face in the guilt of those horrible wickednesses in which you now live? Certainly, the thought of this has power to daunt your hearts.

Qui peccat coram
patre bis peccat.

"She hath done shamefully." The word היבשה is in Hiphil, and may be translated transitively, she hath made ashamed, as well as done shamefully; and by some it is thus interpreted, she has made ashamed her husband, she has made ashamed her children, she has made ashamed herself: and all these three may be meant; yea, I conceive the intent of the Holy Ghost is to express them all.

Her husband first. The church is the spouse of Jesus Christ; Christ is the husband of the church; and you know the Scripture saith that "the woman is the glory of the man:" so the church, being the spouse of Christ, should be the glory of Christ. The woman should be the glory of the man, but yet, being wicked, she makes her husband ashamed. The evil of the wife is a shame to the husband; so the evil of the church is a shame to Jesus Christ. The church in Scripture is called the glory of Christ: If "our brethren be inquired of, they are the messengers of the churches, and the glory of Christ," 2 Cor. viii. 23. "Upon all the glory shall be a defence," Isa. iv. 5. It should be so; but when it is defiled it shames Christ, its wickedness reflects upon Christ. Christ is said to "walk in the midst of the seven golden candlesticks," Rev. ii. 1. Every church is a candlestick, and it should be a golden candlestick; but if it be a filthy and rusty candlestick, it is a dishonour to Christ who walks amongst them. Wicked men do not shame Christ, but the godly do. My brethren, let us take heed of that; it is an evil thing to bring shame to ourselves and one another, but to bring a shame upon Jesus Christ is the greatest evil. Many of you perhaps are ashamed of Christ, take heed that you be not a shame to Christ. They are ashamed of Christ that are ashamed to appear in the cause of Christ; but as for you that are so, Christ has more cause to be ashamed of you, for you are a shame to him. I cannot deny, but many churches of God of late have brought shame to Jesus Christ by their dissensions and factions. They have taken shame to themselves, and have acknowledged it to the glory of Christ, and thus, in some measure, have washed off that shame which they have brought to Christ.

Again, wicked parents are a shame to their children. When a child appears in a place, and is known to be very hopeful, some who knew his family say, I wonder to see him so forward, for his father is a drunkard, and his mother of a vile and malignant spirit: how the child is ashamed to hear of the evil of his father, and of the evil of his mother! As foolish children are a shame to their parents, so wicked parents are a shame to their children. You that have gracious children, take heed you be not a shame to them, and so a shame to yourselves.

And then a shame to herself. "She hath played the harlot: she hath done shamefully." Wherein had she done shamefully? I will only mention one particular. Her shame was especially in subjecting religion to carnal policy. For what was the great sin of the ten tribes? It was this, they were afraid, if they went up to Jerusalem to worship, the people would then depart from the house of Jeroboam to the house of David, therefore out of political regards they would have worship set up at Dan and Bethel; there they would have calves, and they would not go up to Jerusalem, the place which God had appointed for worship. This was a mere politic fetch, for they could not but acknowledge that God required them to worship at Jerusalem where the temple was. Here then they did shamefully.

Obs. 1. For governors, or any other persons, to subject religion to policy is a shameful thing. (1.) It is shameful to make religion an underling, and to make policy the head. Perhaps they call this wisdom, prudent conduct. We must, say they, be careful and wise to foresee inconveniences that may follow. But what if God give it another name? God may give it a name of base temporizing, a name of folly and wickedness. To subject religion to policy is shameful, because it abases that which is the great honour of any country, and makes it an underling. What is the excellency of man but religion? what is the excellency of a country but religion? and what has England been glorious for more than for religion? Now to put an excellent thing under an inferior, is to put the crown, which is for the head, under one's foot; although a thing has in itself but little excellency, if it be brought beneath itself under other things which have not so great an excellency in them, it makes it vile.

(2.) Shameful, because it holds forth this, that we dare not trust God for our civil estate, and for our peace, therefore religion must come under.

(3.) Shameful, because it is gross folly; for there is no such way to breed disturbance, or to undo a state, as to make religion an underling to policy. Was it not so here? That very way which they took to uphold their policy, was the way to destroy their state; and did destroy it at last. What cause had they then to be ashamed, when God took that by which they thought to help themselves, and made that the very thing that caused their ruin! And certainly it will be so; they that use the most deep and politic artifices, if they think to secure themselves, and preserve their peace, by the principle, that religion must come under, God will make them ashamed one way or other, it will be the only way to undo themselves and us. In matters of religion some commands are affirmative precepts; these, though they ligare semper, yet not ad semper, there is not a necessity that at every time and instant they should be urged; so that a people may be in such a frame that men cannot but by degrees bring in a reformation, and then it is not carnal policy to bring in such ways of God gradually, as are commanded by affirmative precepts: but negative precepts bind semper and ad semper; and the state must see, that they do nothing against Christ out of policy, that they do not hinder the gospel of Christ by any positive law; for though Christ may be willing to forbear some ordinances for a time, and out of mercy to a people, and will have mercy and not sacrifice, yet he will never allow any thing done against him in that time. If, out of any state policy to preserve peace, or to gratify an evil party, they sacrifice any part of religion, or any godly person, Christ accounts this a shameful thing; and whoever does so will be ashamed of it at the last. Now, my brethren, why should not God be trusted? Let us look at religion in the first place, and pray that those who are reformers, who have power in their hands, may never prove guilty of putting religion under policy. When Joshua had brought the people of Israel over Jordan, which you know was the beginning of their entrance into Canaan, they were to encounter all their enemies. You may imagine, that when Joshua had passed the river, Israel might suppose that all the country would be about their ears. One would think, that policy would have taught them to lay aside all thoughts of religion then, and to look to their enemies who were at hand; if ever they are outrageous it will be now, therefore now let us mind nothing but arming ourselves against them. But mark, God goes another way to work; as soon as they were gone over Jordan, and were upon the borders of the land of Canaan, they must circumcise themselves, and when they were circumcised they could not fight. Simeon and Levi destroyed a whole city when they were circumcised, because they were not then able to fight or defend themselves, but lay at the mercy of their enemies. But this was God's wisdom. Nay further, they must keep the passover too, they must mind and attend to religion: and mark the latter end of the chapter, that after they had been circumcised and kept the passover, then appeareth one to Joshua with a drawn sword, and saith, "I am the Captain of the host of the Lord." The Captain of the Lord's host appeared to fight for them when they had obeyed; whereas, had they neglected circumcision and the passover, and thought of fighting only, they might have missed the Captain of the Lord's host to have fought for them, and what would have become of them then? So you see, God would have us mind religion in the most dangerous times; and though we think we must mind our peace and safety, and lay our hands upon our swords for our defence, yet let us be careful of our religion, and then we shall have a Captain of the Lord's host come and fight for us.

In Mark viii. 15, we are charged to take heed of two sorts of leaven, "the leaven of the Pharisees, and the leaven of Herod." The leaven of the scribes and Pharisees is corruption in church affairs; the leaven of Herod is corruption in religion, in bringing the things of God under the affairs of the state: for in this Herod was like Jeroboam, he was afraid of his kingdom, as Jeroboam was; he had many ways and plots to keep himself in that kingdom, as Jeroboam had; and many cleaved to Herod in his plots, as Israel clave to Jeroboam in his; therefore says Christ, Take heed not only of the leaven of the scribes and Pharisees, but of the leaven of Herod. And it may be, the Lord saw us too prone to ways of sinful compliances, even ready to have sacrificed much of his worship and many of his saints, for obtaining peace in the state, and so to have fallen off from that reformation that both God and his people expected; hence he has taken the work into his own hands; he will bring about his own work, though it may cost us dear, who knows how much blood?

Obs. 2. That sin, but especially whoredom, is a shameful thing. Prov. xiii. 5, "A wicked man is loathsome, and cometh to shame." Prov. xiv. 34, "Sin is a reproach to any people." Sin, of its own nature, let it be what it will, is shameful. All sin brings a man beneath the excellency of a man, it is contrary to the image of God in man, to that wherein true honour, beauty, glory, consist. It makes men vile: Dan. xi. 21, "And in his estate shall stand up a vile person." Who was that? It was, according to interpreters, Antiochus Epiphanes, the great king of Assyria, and yet a vile person. Josephus tells us, when the Samaritans were in danger of suffering from him, because he thought them to be Jews, they wrote to him in this manner, To Antiochus the mighty god; and his very epithet, Epiphanes, is in English as much as illustrious, Antiochus the illustrious, the famous, bright in his glory. He that was so illustrious and great a prince, as to be addressed as the mighty god, yet in Scripture language, being wicked, is "a vile person." It is a special mark of one that is fit to dwell in God's mountain, Psal. xv. 4, that he is able to see the vileness of sin through all the glory of the world; "in whose eyes a vile person is contemned." Sin is a shame, because it deceives a man: "The way of the wicked shall deceive him." "What fruit had ye then of those things, whereof ye are now ashamed?" It is a good sign of grace, to be able to see into the deceits of sin, so as to be ashamed of it. But, though all sin be shameful, yet whoredom especially, and that either bodily or spiritual.

First, bodily. The expression of shamefulfulness, though it especially aims at their idolatry, yet has its rise from bodily whoredom; if that were not shameful, the expression could not be appropriate, that she had played the harlot, and done shamefully. Prov. vi. 32, 33, "Whoso committeth adultery with a woman, lacketh understanding, he that doeth it destroyeth his own soul. A wound and dishonour shall he get; and his reproach shall not be wiped away." It makes one to be as one of the fools in Israel: "And I," (saith Tamar, when Amnon defiled her,) "whither shall I cause my shame to go? and as for thee, thou shalt be as one of the fools in Israel," 2 Sam. xiii. 13. Amnon, though a king's son, yet by his uncleanness makes himself as one of the fools in Israel. Deut. xxiii. 18, "Thou shalt not bring the hire of a whore, or the price of a dog, into the house of the Lord;" they are joined together, for Scripture makes those to be dogs who are unclean and filthy. When Ishboseth charged Abner with the sin of uncleanness, 2 Sam. iii. 8, "Am I a dog's head," saith he, "that thou chargest me to-day with a fault concerning this woman?" Many adulterers go very fine and spruce, many young wantons are bravely dressed, but in God's esteem they are as dogs for their uncleanness. It is not a harsher title than the Spirit of God gives them. I have read of a people amongst the heathen, who condemned this sin with a shameful death, according to its nature. The adulterer's or adulteress's head was put into the paunch of a beast, and stifled to death; a punishment fit for so filthy a sin. This sin is ever shameful, but especially the more lovely any yoke-fellow is who is forsaken, and the more vile and foul the harlot is, so much the more shameful is the sin. Athenæus introduces Plato, hewing himself and his own condition, that he was taken so much with a filthy harlot. It is more shameful for Christians than for heathens, because they know that the covenant of marriage is the "covenant of God," Prov. ii. 17.

But further, corruption in God's worship is most shameful, for that is aimed at especially here. The shamefulfulness of corrupting the worship of God is expressed in Exod. xxxii. 25. Aaron made the people naked unto their shame; how was that, but by false worship, though it was of the true God? In false worship there is shame, because in that a man subjects his conscience to vile things. Conscience, which is not to be subject to any creature, only to God himself, is here made subject to low and vile things. It is not shameful to subject our consciences to God in the use of creatures, though never so mean, if appointed by himself; but those that subject them to creatures in ways of false worship not appointed by God, subject not their consciences to God but to those creatures, and that is shameful. In false worship, though there may seem to be a great deal of humility, yet there is notorious pride and presumption, and therefore much shame. For a creature to take upon him, by his own fancy and conceit, to raise up creatures higher than God has raised them, to put higher respects upon creatures than God has done, is boldness and presumption. Yea, he presumes, by his own conceit, to raise up the creature so high, that God himself must come nearer to men, and be more present with these creatures than otherwise he would. Thus men presume to bring God under their fancies; and is not this shameful?

Further, it is extreme folly, for we contradict ourselves when we think to honour God, and yet go against him, when we put high esteem upon such things as are abominable and detestable. "I sent unto you all my servants the prophets, rising early and sending them, saying, Oh, do not this abominable thing that I hate," Jer. xlv. 4. Mark, God cries out with energy, All my servants the prophets I sent, saying, "Oh, do not this abominable thing;" it is a delightful thing in your eyes, but abominable in God's. And, Ezek. xxii. 3, they are denominated גִּילְיָם a word that signifies the very excrements of a man; they glory in them, but he saith, they defile themselves by them. When God opens their eyes they will see false worship a shameful thing; and when they do so God will show them the excellency of his own. "Son of man, show the house to the house of Israel, that they may be ashamed of their iniquities: and let them measure the pattern.

And if they be ashamed of all that they have done," that is, of all their false worship; what then? "show them the form of the house, and the fashion thereof, and the goings out thereof, and the comings in thereof, and all the forms thereof, and all the ordinances thereof, and all the forms thereof, and all the laws thereof: and write it in their sight, that they may keep the whole form thereof, and all the ordinances thereof, and do them," Ezek. xliii. 10, 11. Mark, my brethren, you see how God stands upon forms, "all the forms thereof," and "all the forms thereof," and "the whole form thereof." Let us not slightly account any thing in God's worship, for God stands much upon his own form in his own worship. Many who have no religion but a form, yet neglect God's form. Men love to stand much upon their own forms; let them know God stands much upon his forms, and it is no hindrance, but a furtherance, to the power in religion, to keep close to God's form. If we would know what are God's ordinances, for many cry out, Oh that we could but know what is the right way, this is one way for you to know: First, be ashamed of what you have done, be ashamed of your former false worship, and then God will show you the ordinances of his house, and the true beauty of his worship: till then there are so many distinctions, and evasions, and objections, that you never come to understand it. When God humbles the heart, and makes it ashamed of what has been naught before, all the distinctions, and evasions, and objections, vanish away as the mist before the sun.

And the more excellent the Lord is, and those ordinances are, from which we depart, the more shameful is that false worship to which our hearts decline. "She hath done shamefully:" why? she has forsaken such a Husband, the Lord Jesus Christ, who is so lovely; she has forsaken the blessed ordinances that God has appointed, and turned herself to vanities of her own. Christ is said, Cant. v. 16, to be altogether lovely, there is loveliness enough in Christ to satisfy the soul for ever. Ezekiel says, chap. vii. 20, "As for the beauty of his ornament," (speaking of God's ordinances in his temple,) "he set it in majesty: but they made the images of their abominations and of their detestable things therein." Oh how shameful was this! This shows the shameful of it, because God set the beauty of his ornament in majesty. The ordinances of God which he appointed himself, are God's "ornament," they are "the beauty of his ornament," they are "the beauty of his ornament set in majesty;" and shall these beautiful and glorious things be forsaken for vanities of our own inventions? This is shameful.

Obs. 3. Sin, especially whoredom, either bodily or spiritual, if suffered to grow, will make those who commit it not only shameful, but shameless in their doings. "She hath done shamefully, for she hath said." Here it is implied, that the thing done was not only shameful, but that she was shameless. "Were they ashamed when they had committed abomination? Nay, they were not at all ashamed, neither could they blush," Jer. vi. 15. At first, sin may seem to be a little shame-faced, but afterward it grows brazen-faced; modest a little at first, but bold, impudent, and daring afterward. If men were told beforehand what they would do afterward, they would be ready to say, as Hazeal to the prophet, "But what! is thy servant a dog, that he should do this great thing?" their hearts would even shake at the thought of it: yet, when sin has hardened their hearts, they will do it, and that with open face too. Whoredom, you know, at first, is that at which every man blushes; but, within a while, unclean ones can boast of their filthiness. But especially spiritual whoredom, the corruption of God's worship, at first may be a little modest, but see to what a height it grows if in time it be not prevented. I will give you a notable example of this. At first we find Solomon very modest in the matter of idolatry. 2 Chron. viii. 11, saith, that he "brought up the daughter of Pharaoh out of the city of David, to the house he had built for her, for he said, My wife shall not dwell in the house of David king of Israel;" why? "because the places are holy, whereunto the ark of the Lord hath come." Mark, how careful Solomon was not to pollute any thing that had any seeming holiness in it. I have so much respect to the ark of God, to the worship of God, and to those places that are holy, that my wife shall not so much as dwell there. But oh what did Solomon grow to afterward! he suffered idolatry most shamefully, he "went after Ashtaroth the goddess of the Zidonians, and after Milcom the abomination of the Ammonites,—and built a high place for Chemosh, the abomination of Moab, in the hill that is before Jerusalem," 1 Kings xi. 5, 7; just there he built it too, as if it had been in defiance to the temple of God and his true worship; and that "for Molech the abomination of the children of Ammon; and likewise did he," saith ver. 8, "for all his strange wives, which burnt incense and sacrificed unto their gods." Thus shameless was he grown! And thus we see it in experience. How fair are men in their ways of superstition at first! decency is all they plead for. Well, afterward it rises from decency to significance, that is a little higher, to put men in mind. Thirdly, from significance it rises to efficacy, to stir up the dull mind of man. Fourthly, from efficacy it rises to necessity, that now it must be done, and the worship of God cannot be without it, and there shall be no ordinance, no administration at all without it. Decency, significance, efficacy, and necessity; thus it rises to be shameful at last. So, amongst the papists in their traditions, at first they came with this argument, What! will you not regard them as you would other books and histories? they are the traditions of our forefathers; but at length they came to this, in the fourth session of the council of Trent, the synod "doth take and honour the books of the Old and New Testament, and the traditions of the fathers, with equal affection of piety and reverence." To this shamefulness they grew at last. And so for worshipping of images, why, it is for the decency of churches to have them, and they are but to put you in mind, at the most; but at length these are the very words, "the same honour is due to the image and to the exemplar."

Omnes libros tam Veteris tam Novi Testamenti necnon traditiones ipsas pari pietatis affectu ac reverentia suscipi ac venerari.

idem honor debetur imagini et exemplari.

Obs. 4. When men grow shameless in evil, there is little hope of them. "I will have no mercy upon them;" why? for they have done thus, they are grown thus impudent. It is a good thing to keep the bridle of shame as long as we can upon our children, servants, and any of our inferiors; therefore take this one instruction, be not too ready to rebuke and chastise your servants, or your children, in a reproachful manner before others, lest you bring them to see that they have no honour to lose, and then there is little hope of them: evermore keep such a hand over your children and servants that they may see they have some respect to lose; that they may not be so shamed by you, as for them to think they cannot be worse, or more disgraced; there is no such way to make them desperate as that. It is very great wisdom in governors to keep the bridle of shame. Your bridewell or jail-birds seldom or never come to good; why? because they have no bridle to keep them in, they have lost all their honour, and they can lose no more; and there is no rational creature but would have honour. Not the meanest servant you have but has a respect to honour, and that will do more than blows, except they are become very beasts.

But how does he prove that it is shameful? Thus:

“For she said, I will go after my lovers, that give me my bread and my water, my wool and my flax, mine oil and my drink.”

Obs. 1. Deliberate sins are most shameful sins. She hath said. This is a proof of her shamefulness, because that which she has done, she has done upon deliberation; she said she would do thus and thus, she considered before what she would do, and yet she did it. Wickedness committed de industria, ex consilio, of purpose resolved upon, is very shameful. Godly men may be overtaken with a fault: “If a man be overtaken with a fault,” Gal. vi. 1. It is one thing to be overtaken with a sin, and another thing to overtake a sin; a gracious heart may have sin overtake it, but it is a shameless heart that overtakes sin.

Obs. 2. Those who are guilty of whoredom usually grow extremely wilful. “She said, I will go.” As if she had said, Let all the prophets say what they can, let them talk out their very hearts, I will have my mind, I will follow my lovers still. Of those who commit this sin bodily, it is said, Prov. ii. 19, “None that go unto her return again, neither take they hold of the paths of life.” It is a most dreadful scripture against all adulterers and unclean persons: make it out how you will, there is “none that go unto her return again, neither take they hold of the paths of life.” These are the words of the Holy Ghost: I leave the words with you. So Prov. xxiii. 27, “A whore is a deep ditch, and a strange woman is a narrow pit;” they cannot easily get out, nor will they easily get out, they are so plunged in. “Having eyes full of adultery, and that cannot cease from sin,” 2 Pet. ii. 14. Why cannot they cease to sin? it is not because they have a heart but no power, but their wills are brought into that bondage and subjection that they cannot will otherwise; therefore in Ezek. xlvii. 11, we find that though the waters of the sanctuary were very healing, yet the miry places and the marshes were not healed: miry, filthy, unclean hearts are very seldom healed by the waters of the sanctuary.

Ælian reports, that there was a harlot who boasted she could easily get scholars away from Socrates, but Socrates could get no scholars from her, none of her followers. It is true that a harlot is prevalent, and when she has once overcome, it is almost impossible to get away from her. Therefore Heb. vi. 6, which speaks of that sin from which it is impossible to be renewed again to repentance, is interpreted by Tertullian to be no other than the sin of uncleanness. The author of this Epistle (saith he) knew no promise of second repentance to the adulterer and fornicator; showing how ordinarily those that are guilty of that sin, and are given up to it, grow wilful in it. And therefore in Eph. iv. 19, these two are put together, “being past feeling,” and “having given themselves over unto lasciviousness.” Wantons usually grow past feeling.

And for spiritual adultery, that usually is very wilful too, for those who are left by God to superstition and idolatry, seldom return again, but grow exceeding wilful in that wickedness. You have a notable text for that, Jer. xlv. 16, 17; the people say there, “As for the word thou hast spoken to us in the name of the Lord, we will not hearken unto thee; but we will do whatsoever cometh out of our own mouth, to burn incense to the queen of heaven.” We will go on to burn incense to the queen of heaven, talk as long as you will. And so Jer. ii. 10—12, “Pass over,” saith God, “the isles of Chittim, and see; and send unto Kedar, and consider diligently, and see if there be such a thing. Hath a nation changed their gods, which are yet no gods?” Men are settled in the ways of idolatry, and will never give over worshipping their gods: “but my people have changed their glory for that which doth not profit:” therefore “be astonished, O ye heavens, at this, and be horribly afraid, be ye very desolate, saith the Lord.” So Micah iv. 5, “All people will walk every one in the name of his god.” Their hearts are set upon it, they will do it. Spiritual whoredom mightily besots the heart. Isa. xlv. 19, 20, “None considereth in his heart, neither is there knowledge and understanding to say, I have burned part of it in the fire; yea, also I have baked bread upon the coals thereof; I have roasted flesh, and eaten it; and shall I make the residue thereof an abomination? shall I fall down to the stock of a tree? He feedeth on ashes: a deceived heart hath turned him aside, that he cannot deliver his soul, nor say, Is there not a lie in my right hand?” And so Rev. xvi. 11, where those who were given up to anti-christ, though they were tormented they “blasphemed the God of heaven, because of their pains and their sores, and they repented not of their deeds.”

Obs. 3. Wilfulness in any sin, but especially in this sin, is a very great aggravation of it. “I will have no mercy upon them,” I will give them up; why? they have done shamefully, and they have said, “I will go after my lovers.” There are many who, in their passion, think it a brave spirit to say, I will, and I will, and I care not, say what you can, or whatever becomes of it, I will do, or I will have this. Especially men in place, and of estates, are not able to endure the controlling of their will in any thing; and therefore when their wills are but crossed, they burst out into outrageous speeches, and fall blaspheming, and swearing, and saying they will have their will, though it cost them their lives. Thus we find it in the people of Israel, 1 Sam. viii. 19, when Samuel came from God and told them in a long narration what hardship they should endure in having a king, for that was not then according to God’s mind; they heard him all that he said, and they do not stand to answer any of Samuel’s arguments, but presently they break out into this resolution, “Nay, but we will have a king.” Those whom God leaves to hardness of heart, and intends to ruin, he usually gives them up to this wilfulness in their evil ways. The Scripture records Pharaoh as a famous example of one hardened and prepared for ruin. He was of a most wilful spirit. Exod. xv. 9, you shall find his wilfulness expressed four times in that one verse: “I will pursue,” saith he; and then again, “I will overtake;” and, thirdly, “I will divide the spoil;” and then, fourthly, “I will draw my sword.” There are two other expressions to the same effect, which are equivalent to the former, even in the same verse, “My lust shall be satisfied, my hand shall destroy them.” Put all these six expressions, which you have in that one verse, together, and where have you such an exhibition of a wilful creature as Pharaoh was? and what became of him you all know. Only one more example I find in Scripture parallel to this, and that is the king of Babylon: Egypt and Babylon were two countries most eminent for idolatry, and the persecution of the church, and these are the two most famous examples for wilfulness. In Isa. xiv. 13, 14, you have in those two verses five times I will: 1. “I will ascend into heaven.” 2. “I will exalt my throne above the stars of God.” 3. “I will sit also upon the mount of the congregation.” 4. “I will ascend above the height of the clouds.” 5. “I will be like the Most High.” And what became of him you likewise know; yea, the next words tell you, “Yet thou shalt be brought down to hell.”

These two little words, I and will, do a great deal of mischief in the world. Luther, upon Psal. cxvii., saith, I am of that opinion, and verily persuaded, monarchies would far longer endure, if those who are high monarchs would but omit this one pronoun, I. It is true, in public ways they ἁμαρτίαν.

Ἐάν τις ἐπιλάβῃ

Ælianus varior.
Histor.

Ego in ea opinione sum, monarchias longe diutius duraturas, si monarchias hoc unum pronomen ego omiserint.
Luther in Psal.
cxvii.

express themselves in the plural number, we, but private resolutions are in the singular number, I. The second is will, "I will," that is a little word too; but I may say of this will, as James saith concerning the tongue, It is indeed "a little member" in the body, but "it setteth on fire the course of nature, and it is set on fire of hell." So it is true that this little will is but a little word, but it sets whole kingdoms on fire, towns and cities on fire, and is itself set on fire of hell. Bernard remarks, Take away will once, and there will be no hell. Oh the mischief that it does in the world! I will only say these two things to those that keep such ado with these two little words, I, will.

First, That which thou usest with so much pride, and thinkest thyself such a man that canst say, I will, know, it may be as heavy a judgment of God as can befall thee in this world, for God to give thee up to thy will. There is nothing wherein God pours out his wrath upon the children of men in this world, more than in giving them up to their will. Therefore, tremble when thou usest so many expressions, I will, and I will do this. Observe what the Scripture saith of those who had their will in ways of false worship; "Go ye, serve ye every one his idols, and hereafter also, if you will not hearken unto me," Ezek. xx. 39. God, saith God, you will not hearken to me; you hear out of the word what should be the way of my worship in its purity, but you say, I love novelty, and you will not have it thus; you answer not God's arguments, but you cast off his worship, and say you will not have it: Well, saith God, if you will not hear me, if you are set upon your will, go and serve your idols, and take your fill of your own ways. And Psal. lxxxi. 11, "My people would not hearken to my voice, and Israel would none of me;" they were all upon their will, they would not and they would not. Mark what follows; "so I gave them up unto their own hearts' lusts, and they walked in their own counsels." You will have your own counsels, and your own will, and so God gives you up to them; and then woe to you, you are undone!

Secondly, You that are set upon your will in that which is evil, know, God is and will be as willful toward you as you can be toward him. Mark that notable text, Jer. xlv. 25, which sets out the notorious height of wickedness that was in the people of those times: "Ye and your wives have both spoken with your mouths, and fulfilled with your hand," that which is evil; you will not only say you will do it, but will do it indeed. Well, saith God, you have done so, "ye and your wives have both spoken with your mouths, and fulfilled with your hand, saying, We will surely perform our vows that we have vowed, to burn incense to the queen of heaven, and to pour out drink offerings unto her: ye will surely accomplish your vows, and surely perform your vows." You will go on in your false ways of worship. Mark what follows in ver. 26, "Therefore hear ye the word of the Lord, all Judah that dwell in the land of Egypt; Behold, I have sworn," you have vowed, and I have sworn, "I have sworn by my great name, saith the Lord, that my name shall no more be named in the mouth of any man of Judah in all the land of Egypt:" and ver. 27, "Behold, I will watch over them for evil, and not for good: and all the men of Judah that are in the land of Egypt shall be consumed by the sword and by the famine, until there be an end of them." God will be as resolute as the stoutest sinner: you will, and God will; who shall have their will, think you? Answer to this, you stout-hearted that are away from God; answer to this, you stout-hearted children, and servants, and wives. A wilful man never wants woe. If you will be resolute in any thing, my brethren, be resolute in that which is good; be resolute in the work of repentance, with David, Psal. xxxii. 5, "I will confess my transgressions:" indeed I had many thoughts to come and shame myself, and open all unto God, but I could not get it off; at length I grew resolute and said, I will, and I have sworn to keep thy righteous precepts: and as they, Micah iv. 5, "We will walk in the name of the Lord our God:" and as Joshua, I and my house will serve the Lord; do you what you will, we are resolute that we will serve the Lord. This is a blessed wilfulness indeed. Oh that the stoutness and wilfulness of many people might be turned to this resolution for God and for his truth! Especially, carry this note home with you, you that give such often expressions of your will, and turn it to the willing of that which is good. I will follow my lovers, says the apostate from God: I will follow my beloved, who is altogether lovely, let every gracious soul say.

Obs. 4. Professed sins are shameful sins. "She said," she professed what she would do. It is an evil for sin to be lurking in any one's heart, but for sin to break out into open profession, is a greater evil. This is to prove that she had done shamefully, because she said she would do it. There is a great deceit in the hearts of many men, they are ready to say, I may as well say so as think so; I say so, and perhaps others think so, it were as well for me to speak it as to keep it in my heart. My brethren, there are two deceits in this kind of speaking.

First, You suppose that when you speak so, it is not in your heart, and you make the comparison of what is in other men's hearts and in your mouths; as if the evil were in your mouths only, and in their hearts only; as if the comparison lay thus, they think and do not speak, and you speak and do not think. Here is the deceit, for if you speak you have it in your hearts too, you both speak and think, for so the Scripture assures us, that "out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh:" if you speak maliciously, you have a malicious heart; if you speak uncleanly, you have an unclean heart; if oaths be in your mouths, you have a profane heart.

Secondly, Here likewise lies the deceit, as if you should have less in your heart because you vent it; as passionate people will say, I may as well vent my mind, and then I shall be quiet. Thou deceivest thyself; the venting of corruption that lies in thy heart will never lessen it, but increase it. It is not with the corruption of our hearts as it is with liquor in a vessel, that the more it is let out the less is within; but as it is with a fire in a house, that when it is kindled within, and bursts out, there is not less within because it bursts out; no, the more it flames out, the more it burns within: and as it is with water in a fountain, when it flows out of the fountain, there is not the less water in the fountain; it may rather have the less by stopping, and fire may be lessened by smothering. Know, therefore, that professed wickedness is aggravated wickedness. Secret sins may be more dangerous in regard of the cure, but these are more abominable to God in regard of the open dishonour that is done to him by them. The aggravation of the blood that was shed by the people is described, The blood that was shed, "she poured it not upon the ground, to cover it with dust; that it might cause fury to come up to take vengeance," Ezek. xxiv. 7, 8; you did not conceal the blood, you did not cover it, but set it "upon the top of a rock." What then? Not being covered, but being professed and laid open, this causes fury to come up with vengeance against them. God's anger would have been against them if they had shed blood, though they had covered it; but to shed blood and not to cover it, causes the fury of the Lord to come with vengeance. So you know he saith in Isa. iii. 9; "They declare their sin as Sodom, they hide it not. Woe unto their soul!" woe et non est infernus.

*Tolle voluntatem
Bern.*

unto them when they shall presume to declare their sin as Sodom. And as I said before, God will be as wilful in punishing a sinner, as a sinner is wilful in sinning; so here, God will be as professed in plaguing, as thou shalt be professed in sinning. In that forenamed place of Ezekiel, they did not cover the blood; well, mark it: saith God, "I have set her blood upon the top of a rock, that it should not be covered. Therefore thus saith the Lord God; Woe to the bloody city! I will even make the pile for fire great." I will be as professed in my plagues and punishments as you are professed in your sins.

My brethren, if we will profess any thing, let us profess that which is good, let us do that as openly as we can. 2 Cor. ix. 13, saith, that God is glorified for their professed subjection to the gospel; for their subjection of profession, so the words are. It is not enough to be subject to the gospel, but there must be a professed subjection to it: therefore, in Rom. x. 10, confession with the mouth is made as necessary to salvation as believing with the heart, they are put together. There may be times that confession may be called for, as well as believing, and as necessary to salvation. When the friends of Gordius, a martyr, came to him, and would have him keep his heart to himself, and only with his mouth deny what in his heart he believed was true; O no, saith he, it is fit that my mouth, which was made for God, should speak for God. And Zuinglius is of the opinion, that we may as well worship the altar of Jupiter, or Venus, as hide our faith and profession when we live under

Ad aras Jovis aut
Veneris adorare ac sub antichristo
fidem occultare.
Zuin. ep. 3.

antichrist. The way to honour religion and bring it into credit, is for those who are godly to profess what they know. I knew one that was noble both in birth and grace, and who had to act often with those of his rank, who scorned at religion under the name of puritanism: he would usually take this course,—when he entered into such company, he would begin and own himself to be one of those whom they called puritans, and by that means prevented much sin in them, and much scorn of religion, by thus avowing it. It is certain, that the best way to honour religion is for every one to own it, though ignominious terms are put upon it. If ever we were called to profess what we believe, we are now called to it in these days. Certainly, God professes for us; God not only respects us, but he does it professedly, in the eyes and before the faces of our adversaries. Let us not only have God in our hearts, but profess his name openly before the faces of our adversaries. It is time now to do it. It had been well, if you had professed heretofore when God's truth called for it. It may be, many of you are found guilty of betraying the truth of God, for professing no sooner than you did; but, however, betray it not now for want of profession; be willing now to profess of what party you are, that, as we read of Jonah, chap. i. 9, when he was in the storm, and the mariners awoke him, he said unto them, "I am an Hebrew, and I fear the Lord, the God of heaven, which hath made the sea and the dry land," making an open profession of himself. My brethren, if we be not in a present storm, yet the clouds grow black; therefore, awake, you sluggards, you that are secure, awake out of your security, and now profess what you are. I am a Hebrew that fears God; however they give such men ignominious terms and titles, I am one of them, and I am willing to appear so. Like Nicodemus, many of you come to Jesus by night, you are afraid to be seen. You would give money to the parliament, and help forward that work which God has in hand, but you are afraid to be seen. I know there may be possibly some reason why some men should not appear, but not many, the cases are very rare; ordinarily, it is not enough to do it, but to do it professedly, let it be declared who you are, and what side you take.

If you say, We live in evil and wicked times, it is dangerous to appear; I may not only keep my heart right, but I will do as much as another, but why should I appear? 1. The worse the times are, the more thou shouldst appear. Mark viii. 38, "Whosoever therefore shall be ashamed of me and of my words in this adulterous and sinful generation; of him also shall the Son of man be ashamed, when he cometh in the glory of his Father with the holy angels." If the generation were holy, it were nothing to appear, not to be ashamed or afraid; but we must not be either ashamed or afraid in the midst of an adulterous generation. 2. Why should wickedness have this advantage, that it dares appear, but godliness dares not? 3. If all should reason as you do, what would become of the cause? Why should others venture themselves more than you? What is your flesh, your estate, your liberty, more than theirs? 4. You must appear for example sake, to provoke others. This is a duty as well as any. 5. If the adversaries prevail, they will find you out, except you mean to give up your consciences to them, and then you will escape no more than others; to be sure, you will not have so much peace as others who have most appeared.

Obs. 5. It is a very dangerous and sinful thing for the people of God to join in association with foreigners who are of an idolatrous religion, and to expect help from them. "I will go after my lovers;"—who are they? either the Egyptians or Assyrians with whom they associated, or their idols. Let us suppose the former: the people of God, Jer. xlii, were determined to have association with Egypt, and they could not be brought from it: if you read that story, their conduct will appear very vile and dangerous; they seemed to yield to God, that they would do what he would have them, and they would not go into Egypt if he forbade it; but in chap. xliiii, when Jeremiah told them the mind of God, that they should continue in the land of Judah, and not go down into Egypt, "Then spake Azariah the son of Hoshaiah, and Johanan the son of Kareah, and all the proud men, saying unto Jeremiah, Thou speakest falsely: the Lord our God hath not sent thee to say, Go not into Egypt to sojourn there." They are loth to break off their association with Egypt. Gualter, in his comment upon Hosea, though not upon this text, states that the Grecian churches, who in the year 1438 were afraid of the Turks breaking in upon them, sent to the bishop of Rome, and offered to be under his subjection, merely that they might have the help of the Latin churches to keep them from the rage and tyranny of their adversaries; but within a few years they were destroyed, Constantinople and the empire were subdued, so that heathenism and atheism prevailed; and this is the fruit, saith he, of seeking the association of others in a sinful way. But because this is not the chief thing that is aimed at, we pass it by. She said she would go after her lovers, that is, her idols. Hence,

Obs. 6. Idolaters usually keep good thoughts of their idols. They call them their lovers, they look upon their idols as those that love them; and hence they used to call them Baalim, from Baal, a husband. So it should be the care of the saints evermore to keep good thoughts of God, to look upon God as their lover, as one that attends to their good. My brethren, let us not be ready to entertain hard thoughts of God, it is a dangerous thing. God's great care is to manifest to us and to all the world that he loves us. He has done much to manifest to us in England, and to our brethren of Scotland, that he loves us and them. In Rev. iii. 9, Christ saith of the church of Philadelphia, that God loved them. Forty years ago, Mr. Brightman interpreted that text of the church of Scotland. Philadelphia signifies brotherly love. You know how they are joined in covenant one with another, and we see that those who said they were Jews, that they were the church, but proved themselves to be of the synagogue of Satan, are forced to bow before them; and if they were not mad with malice, they must needs acknowledge that God has loved that church. And since God has done great things for us, to manifest that he is the lover of England, let us keep good thoughts of God.

Obs. 7. Idolaters highly prize the love of their idols. They do not only maintain good thoughts of their idols, or think that their idols are their lovers, but they set a price upon them. She said, I will follow my lovers; I make account of their love, they will do me good, for aught I know, more than any thing you speak of. It is true both of bodily and spiritual whoredom. I will only make use of one scripture, to daunt the heart of unclean persons, who so much prize the love of their harlots. You prize their love, but what get you by it? you get God's hatred by it. You rejoice that you have their love; and for that God hates and abhors you. Make that good, you will say. I will: "The mouth of a strange woman is a deep pit: he that is abhorred of the Lord shall fall therein," Prov. xxii. 14. What get you by this? your harlots embrace you, and God abhors you. If there be any unclean wretch in this congregation, either thou art an atheist, or this text must strike thee at thy heart. Art thou in that way, and yet not repenting, thou art the man whom this day God tells thee to thy face, that he abhors thee.

But how then should we prize the love of Jesus Christ our Husband! "We will remember thy love more than wine," Cant. i. 4. The church prizes the love of Jesus Christ, more than men in the world prize their delight in wine. And, my brethren, do you prize Christ's love; then Christ will prize yours: and it is observable, that according to the degree and way of your prizing Christ's love, so Christ will prize your love. In Cant. iv. 10, you have the same expression of Christ's love to his church, answerable to hers before: "Thy love is better than wine," saith the church to Christ; "How much better is thy love than wine!" saith Christ to the church.

Obs. 8. The hearts of whoremongers and idolaters follow hard after their uncleanness in bodily and spiritual filthiness. "I will follow them;" not only say they are lovers, but I will express it by following them. For bodily filthiness, observe how unclean men follow their lovers. Josephus, in his Antiquities, states, that Decius Mundus offered to give many hundred thousand drachms, which amounted to six thousand pounds sterling, to satisfy his lust one night with a harlot, yet could not obtain his desire. Will not ye be content now who have been guilty of spending a great part of your estate in uncleanness, now to do as much for religion, for God, and Christ, and his kingdom, as ever you have done for that sin? If there be any in this place who have been profuse for their uncleanness, and yet now are strait-handed in these public affairs, such are fitter to be taken out of Christian congregations, and to be shut up in prisons.

For spiritual whoredom, I shall show you how superstitious and idolatrous people, as they prize their idols, so they follow hard after them. When the calf was to be set up, upon proclamation all the men and women took off their earrings and their jewels, and brought them to Aaron to make the calf. What a shame will it be to us if we should keep our earrings, and our jewels, and things perhaps that have not seen the sun a great while, now when God calls for them! Let women do that for God and his truth, for their own liberties and posterities, that they did for their idol. Though you have earrings, and jewels, and rings, that you prize much, yet let them be given up to this public cause. And it were a shame that gold rings should be kept merely to adorn the fingers, when the church and state are in such necessity as they are. Away with your niceties, your fineness, and bravery, now, and look to necessities, to the preservation of the lives and liberties both of yourselves and your children. If you should see a malignant party come with their spears and pikes, and your children writhing upon the tops of them, and their blood gushing out, what good would your gold rings and all your ornaments do you?

The Scripture strikingly describes the eagerness and earnestness of spirit which idolaters manifest in following after their idols. Isa. lvii. 5, exhibits them "inflaming themselves with idols." In Jer. l. 38, God says, "they are mad upon their idols." In Isa. xli. 6, it is said, "they lavish gold out of the bag." They not only gave their gold rings which were of no use, and parted with that which they could well spare, but they lavished gold that was in the bag; they would not only bring some of it, but they lavished it; and they lavished not their silver, but their gold; and that not a piece or two out of a paper, but out of the bag, they brought their bags of gold, and lavished gold out of them. This they did for their idols: oh what a shame is it then that any should be penurious, and not act generously, in the public cause of the church and commonwealth!

In Jer. viii. 2, we have five expressions in one verse, describing the pursuance of the heart of idolaters after their idols; the like we have not in all the book of God. First, he saith, "whom they have loved." Secondly, "whom they have served." Thirdly, "after whom they have walked." Fourthly, "whom they have sought." And, fifthly, "whom they have worshipped." Oh how are the hearts of people set upon the ways of idolatry! Camden reports that Canute, king of England, spent as much upon one cross, as the revenues of the crown came to in a whole year, he was so profusely liberal about his superstitious vanities. Calvin, in a sermon upon that text, "Seek ye my face," remarks: Foolish idolaters! they endure much in their pilgrimages, spend their money, waste their bodies, and are abused in their journey; yet they go on, and think all sufficiently recompensed, if they may see and worship some image of a saint, or holy relic. Shall the beholding some dead carrion, or apish idol, have more power to strengthen them, than the face of God in his ordinances shall have to strengthen us?

"My lovers, that give me my bread and my water, my wool and my flax, mine oil and my drink." What were these idols? The idol that gave their bread was Ceres, she was the goddess whom the heathens worshipped for corn. Luna, the moon, was the idol they worshipped for their drink, and all moist things. For their wool and flax, Ashtaroth was their god; and for their oil, Priapus. The Seventy translate that "clothes" which we call here "wool;" and that which we term "flax" they translate "linen."

Obs. 1. Idolaters have a great many idols to supply their several wants. "My lovers," in the plural number. The idols of the heathen do not supply all good, but one one thing, and another another thing. And that is the difference between the true God and idols. The excellency of the true God is, that he is a universal good; we have all good, flax, oil, bread, and wine, and all in one, in our God, in our lover. And that is the reason why God challenges the whole heart. Idols are content with a partial obedience, because they are but partial in bestowing good things; but God justly requires the whole heart of his worshippers, because he is a universal good to them.

Obs. 2. The end at which idolaters aim in their worship is very low. They follow their lovers, and are very earnest; for what, I pray? for their wool and their flax, and their bread and their water, their oil and their drink. They desire no more, they look no higher; satisfy their flesh, give them but liberty to sport on the Lord's day, to have their feasts, their wakes, and merry meetings, and they care for no more. Their spirits are vile, and so accordingly is their worship. Therefore their worship is external, it is bodily, because their aims are at external and bodily things. As a man's end is, either base or honourable, so is he. There are some men who seem as if they aimed at God and religion in many things they do, they make a noise about religion, and God, and Christ, and his ordinances, and the public good; but the truth is, their aims are at gain and credit, at their wool and their flax; and herein they show the baseness of their spirits; like lapwings, that scream aloud as if they were come near their nests, when their nests are some where else. Whatever their cry be, for God or the public good, if you mark them, their nest is in their wool, in their flax, in their profit, in their honour and preferment, in these outward things. But the end of the true worshippers of God is higher, they soar aloft, there is a spiritual height of soul whereby they are raised upwards by the grace of God. A godly man's feet are where a wicked man's head is; that which he accounts his chief good, a godly man can trample under his feet. He looks at God himself, and his service. He worships the high God: he is a child of Abraham; not Abram, but Abraham; what is the signification of that? Pater excelsum, A high father, for he is the father of children of high spirits, not only of children that are believers, but of those that have high and raised spirits. Cleopatra told Marcus Antonius, that he was not to angle for gudgeons and trout, but for castles, and forts, and towns; so I may say of a Christian, he does not angle, especially in matters of religion, for wool, and flax, and oil, he has no such low and base ends, but at God, and Christ, and heaven, and glory, and immortality. He desires these things only that by them he may be fitted more to serve God. One who has been acquainted with the free grace of God in Christ, will serve God for himself without bargaining with him, he will be willing to go into God's vineyard, and not indent for a penny a day. You that will indent with God in his service, and have your penny, you who have such low and mean spirits, God may give you your penny, and there's an end of you.

Obs. 3. That way of religion by which we can get most bread, and wool, and flax, and oil, is the religion that most people will follow, because the hearts of most people are low and base, and aim at no higher things. That religion which brings the largest estate, and can please the sense, is the religion that pleases most people.

Pamchius, a heathen, once said, Make me a bishop, and though I be now a heathen yet I will be a Christian as well as any other. He saw in what pomp the bishops lived, and by that he thought it was a fine thing to be a Christian. By outward pomp and glory antichrist draws many followers; they go where they can have most wool and flax; they can get most preferment that way. Aeneas Silvius observed, the reason why the pope prevailed against the council, though it was a general council, which was above the pope, was this, that the pope had a great many places of preferment and honour to give, the general council had none: the general council can inquire after truth, and present its decision, and can tell what is God's mind, but it has no honour, no promotion, no preferment to give; therefore, alas, the general council prevails little, the pope gets all, and all because he has bishoprics, and cardinals' places, and livings, and great honours, to bestow. Luther, in ferments, when excellent bread and wine were brought to the table, pointing to them, said, These are the things that make me that I cannot leave this kind of life. These are the arguments that prevail most in the world; arguments taken from bread, and flax, and wool, and oil, are stronger arguments than any taken from the Scripture, than any thing taken from the honour of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost. When men come with Saul's arguments, 1 Sam. xxii. 7, "Will the son of Jesse give every one of you fields and vineyards, and make you all captains of thousands, and captains of hundreds?" will you follow him? can he prefer you? O no, he can do little for you. And when men argue, I pray what will this way bring you in? what preferment will you get by this? you may get preferment in the other way; this draws, this prevails. In a speech delivered by the vice-chancellor, not many years ago, in a public commencement at Cambridge, speaking to the young scholars, and wishing them to take heed of being puritans, he said, What can you get in that way? you shall live poorly, perhaps you may have some three-halfpenny benefice in following them; but come to be children of the church, and then you may be sure of good benefices, you may come to be prebends, to be deans, to be bishops. Thus he persuaded the young scholars to take heed of puritanism. There is mighty strength in this argument upon the hearts of most.

Novi hominem non ex uno conuocato concilio commo- strantem digito de-

Hence the poverty of Christ is a great scandal and offence to most people. When they see that religion will not bring them flax, and wool, and oil, but that they must live poorly, they are offended at this exceedingly. Charles the Great, having war with Aygolandus, king of Africa, who, being anxious to make peace with Charles, made some profession to become a Christian; Charles was very glad of this, and brought him to his court to parley with him. There he saw thirty poor persons whom Charles fed, who were halt, and maimed, and blind, and in a very poor garb. Charles the Great did this, because he would have poverty before his eyes continually, that he might not be too high in and proud of his prosperity. When Aygolandus saw them, he said, Who are these? These, saith Charles, are the servants of God. Nay then, replied he, if your God keep his servants no better, I will be none of his; I thought to be a Christian, and to serve your God, but seeing those that serve him have no better food or raiment than these, I will be none of those servants. Thus it is with many, though their consciences are convinced which is the best way, yet, because of the want of flax, and wool, and oil, they will not decide for Christ.

Obs. 4. It is a shameful thing for men to put religion in subjection to their wool, and corn, and oil. Before I showed, that it is shameful to subject religion to the political affairs of a kingdom, but to subject religion to our own base sensualities, for profit and preferment, this is very shameful. Gain gotten this way, is filthy lucre, as the Scripture calls it, yet hujusmodi lucris dulcis odor, the smell of this gain is very sweet to many. Is thy religion serviceable only to gain a trade, to gratify sensual lusts? what is this, but to stop the hole of a mud wall with diamonds and precious pearls? That were a folly, you will say, to make such precious things serviceable to such base ends: thou dost as much, thou wouldst make religion subject to that which only satisfies the flesh. Religion, my brethren, is the glory of a man, and the glory of a nation; and shall we turn this glory into shame? It is a base thing in magistrates, to subject the acts of justice to their base ends, for gain and profit; for a judge, or a justice of peace, or a prelate, to show most favour where there is most flax, and wool, and oil, where butts of beer or licatorem panem, et vitium quod praesentissimum erit appositum. Hæc, inquit, sunt que faciunt ut hoc vitium deservere non libet. Triaulare Beneficium.

Magis solliciti de merito quam de vero, Philistæorum iudæi non in philætheis magis amant mutui delectare quam, Christi divitiis.

rundlets of sack are to be gained, this is baseness in them. But to subject religion to such ends as these, this is the villany of all baseness. A generous spirit is far from this. It is observed of the generous spirit of Luther, that when a papist was vexed at him for his preaching and writing, one bishop remarked to another, There is such a stir with this Luther, why do you not stop his mouth with preferment? He presently answered, That German beast cares not for money, he is above money. He called him beast in his anger, whereas he might have called him an angel, because his spirit was above these things, his mouth would not be stopped with them. A bishop in this land, hearing that a kinsman, of his was a zealous preacher; Well, saith he, let me alone, I will silence him; and indeed he did; how? he gave him two livings, and they silenced him presently. Some men's lust of malice goes beyond their lust of covetousness, like those cockatrices, Jer. viii. 17, that "will not be charmed." It is a shameful thing then, that our zeal for God should not go beyond our lust for gain. To subject your religion to flax, and wool, and oil, springs from a base diffidence in God, as if he would not provide for us such outward things; therefore Luther saith in his comment upon Hosea,

Germana illa bestia non curat aurum.

Quasi vero Deus nolit dare lanam ecclesie sue, aut saluum sit a Sathana petere.

They followed their idols for bread, and wool, and flax, and oil, as if God would not give bread to his church, or as if it were more safe to go to Satan for it. O let us trust God for all, for our clothes, for our meat and drink, for our estates, for our children; God certainly will feed his church. And yet the men who have hearts so base themselves, think it impossible for any man not to be taken with such arguments; They may talk of religion and conscience, say they, but I will warrant you they may be bought with money, and preferment, and places of profit and honour. They think it impossible for men to stand against these arguments. It reminds me of that speech that Balak used to Balaam, "Did not I earnestly send unto thee to call thee, wherefore camest thou not unto me? Am I not able to promote thee to honour?" As if he had said, Thou art a strange man indeed; did not I send thee word that I would promote thee to great honour, and give thee silver and gold, or whatever thou wouldst have? What! will not preferment and money tempt you? I thought this would have tempted any man in the world. And thus many men think: but let all such know that there is a generation of men in the world of true generous spirits, who are above these things, and take as much delight, and have as much sweetness, in denying these places of honour, and preferment, and gain, as those that offer them have in enjoying them. It was a notable speech that Pliny made concerning Cato, in his Epistle Dedicated to his Natural History, Cato took as much glory in those dignities and honours which he refused, as he did in those which he enjoyed. Certainly it is so with the saints, the true generous spirit of Christians take as much content in those places of preferment they deny for Christ, as in any gain they enjoy. There is no tempting such men.

Let us pray therefore for those who are intrusted by us, not only for civil things, but for matters of religion, that bread, and corn, and wool, and flax, and wine, and oil may never tempt them; that preferment and gain may never bias their spirits. Such ways have not been left untried by some, and have prevailed; but through God's mercy he has preserved others, and made the world know that Christ has a people to whom religion and the public good are more dear than all the flax, and wool, and wine, and oil in the world; than all the estates, and high places, and great preferments that can be offered them. And now, the Lord our God keep this in their and in our hearts for ever.

Obs. 5. Prosperity and success in an evil way, harden the hearts of men in sin. I will follow after my lovers, for they give me bread, and water, and wool, and flax. Eusebius reports that Maximilian the emperor, in an edict against the Christians, vilifying the Christian religion as an execrable vanity, and seeking to confirm the heathens in the worship of their idols, remarks, Behold, how the earth brings forth fruit for the husbandman in abundance, how our meadows are adorned with flowers and herbs, and moistened with the dews of heaven, what health we have, and what quiet and peaceable lives. Thus, by their prosperity, he seeks to confirm the hearts of idolaters in their wicked ways. Prosperity in a wicked way is exceedingly hardening. Dionysius, having committed sacrilege against the idols, by robbing their temples, yet his voyage being prosperous, boasted that though he did not worship the gods as others did, he prospered as much as they. In that year when those innovations in God's worship were principally brought in amongst us, especially in the diocese of Norwich, it proved to be a very fruitful year; and one commissary, among the rest in his court, after the harvest was taken in, addressed the countrymen in this way, Do you not see how God prospers us? What a plentiful harvest have we had this year! This is since you began to worship God with more decency than you were wont to do. Thus attributing all the goodness of God to that way. Let it be all our prayer, that God would never prosper us in a sinful way.

Obs. 6. Carnal hearts look upon what they enjoy as their own, and think they may use it as their own; and especially such as are idolaters. It is very observable, how often this word "my" is iterated: give me my bread, and my water, and my flax, and my oil, and my wool; nothing but my. Though they will acknowledge that what they have comes from the idols, as here they did, for they said their lovers gave it them, yet when they had these things, they thought they might do with them what they would; they were theirs, Mine, mine, all is mine. Thus it is usual for carnal spirits to acknowledge in general, that what they have comes from God; but when they have it, they think it is their own, not that God reserves the propriety of what they have after he has given it them. You mistake, if you think that that is all the acknowledgment you owe to God for what you enjoy, that you had it from God; but you must acknowledge likewise, that God reserves his propriety after he has given it you. God never gives any thing in the way that one friend gives to another. A friend may give you a gift, yet, when you have it, it is your own, and you may use it as you please, your friend parts with his own propriety. God never gives any thing so as to part with his own propriety; though he has given it you, yet you cannot say, It is mine; in respect of God, it is still his.

There is no such bond upon conscience to use all the comforts we have for God as this, to look up to God, and see that all comes from him in the way of the covenant of grace. I say, that will lay a bond upon conscience, to make use of your estates, and of all you enjoy, for God, and not think to employ them for your own ends. It is not the slight acknowledgment idolaters make, that all comes from God, will do it. Carnal men look upon what they have coming from God through second causes, and no further; but a Christian looks upon that which he has as coming from God in a covenant of grace, and this engages the heart strongly to use all for God, from whom all is received in such a way.

Ver. 6. Therefore, behold, I will hedge up thy way with thorns, and make a wall, that she shall not find her paths.

This verse and the following are the workings of God's bowels of mercy, a parenthesis of grace to the elct, though mingled with some severity. They are indeed the epitome of the whole chapter, declaring Israel's sin, with threatening judgment, and yet promising mercy unto the elect, the penitent amongst them.

"Therefore." This has reference to somewhat before, and answers to wherefore: Because I have dealt with you by the way of my prophets, in convincing, in admonishing, in threatening, and all this will not do, "therefore" I will deal with you in another way.

"Therefore, behold." That way of mine of which I now speak, is a singular way; you shall find much of my grace in it, the way in which I will deal with you is full of wonders, "Behold."

"I will hedge up thy way." There is a two-fold hedge that God makes about his people. There is the hedge of protection to keep evil from them, and there is the hedge of affliction to keep them from evil. The hedge of protection you have, Isa. v. 5, where God threatens that he "will take away the hedge" from his vineyard, that is, he will take away his protection; and it is said of Job, that "God had hedged him about." But the hedge here meant, is the hedge of affliction. "I will hedge up thy way," that is, I will bring sore and heavy afflictions upon you, but yet in a way of mercy; these afflictions shall be but as a hedge to keep you from evil, they shall not do evil to you, or bring evil upon you.

"I will hedge up thy way with thorns." That is, I see you will go on in these ways of idolatry and false worship, I will make them difficult to you, you shall go through thorns; if you will get to your idols, you shall be pricked. It is a metaphor taken from a husbandman, who, when the cattle will break over pastures, makes thick and prickly hedges to prevent them, and to distress them if they attempt it: so I will deal with you, saith God. Or, when a husbandman observes passengers make a path in his ground where they ought not, and spoil the grass or the corn, he lays thorns in the way that they cannot go into his corn; or if they do, they shall go with some pain and trouble: so saith God, "I will hedge up thy way with thorns."

"And make a wall." I will wall a wall, so the words are. It may be they will get through the thorns, but if they do, I have another way to deal with them, I will come with stronger afflictions, and they shall be of more power to keep them from their sin, they shall be as a wall; and though they get through the thorns, they shall not get over the wall.

"That she shall not find her paths." Mark the change of the person, "I will hedge up thy way," first; and then I will "make a wall, and she shall not find her paths." It often occurs in Scripture, and signifies some perturbation of spirit. That manner of speech is usual amongst men when their spirits are troubled, they speak sometimes in one person, sometimes in another; and indeed, the Lord here speaks after the manner of men, as if his spirit were troubled with the perverseness of his people. Besides, the change of the person is to express some indignation of God against their perverseness, therefore he speaks as if he would turn from them, and rather speak to somebody else; as if he should say, I speak to these, yet they are stubborn; well, I will speak to all the beholders, Take notice of their stubbornness and perverseness, and judge between them and me.

Obs. 1. Though such as are in covenant with God, may for their sins be involved in the same judgment with others, yet God will make a difference between them and others that are not in covenant with him. God will have other ends in his afflictions towards his people, than he has towards the wicked; though the difference be not in the things they suffer, yet it is very broad in the ends for which they suffer. When the briers and thorns, Isa. xxvii. 4, are set before God, the fire of God's anger passes through them to destroy them; but when God comes to his people, though some anger be stirred up for a while, yet all the fruit thereof is to take away their sin, ver. 9. See what difference God makes between persons even under the same affliction. In Jer. xxiv. 5, God saith, "Like these good figs, so will I acknowledge them that are carried away captive of Judah, whom I have sent out of this place into the land of the Chaldeans for their good." Though they be carried into the land of the Chaldeans, I will acknowledge them there to be my people, and it shall be for their good. Well, now there was likewise a basket that had "very naughty figs," and they were carried away captive too, both went into captivity; what does he say of them? ver. 9, "I will deliver them to be removed into all the kingdoms of the earth for their hurt;" I will aim at their hurt when I deliver them into captivity.

This should be a mighty support to the saints under all their afflictions, though the affliction be the same to sense and view with that of the wicked, yet you see the difference is broad. It is true, may the troubled heart say, there may be different ends of God's afflicting some and others; he may afflict some for trial, and others for their sins; but what will you say if an affliction come upon us for our sins? Is there a difference here? Yes, my brethren, though your afflictions come upon you for your sins, if you be in covenant with God, the difference still may hold: so it is here; those afflictions which God calls the hedge and the wall, were sore afflictions, and they were for their sins, yet God intended good and mercy to them in those afflictions. This is the virtue of the covenant of grace, that it takes out the sting and curse even of afflictions, which are not only for trial, but for sin. If God bring some misery upon you, yet being in covenant with him, his blessing causes those troubles to keep you from greater misery that else would befall you.

Obs. 2. There is even in the saints such a slavish disposition remaining, that they will stand out against God a long time, even against the admonitions, exhortations, convictions, and threatenings of his word. Not only the reprobate, but such is the perverseness of the hearts of men, that even the elect of God will many times do so; this is a sore and a grievous evil, that it should be said so of them. If there be ingenuousness in the spirits of men, the very intimation of the mind of God is enough to cause the heart to yield; and surely grace makes the heart of a man ingenuous. God expects that there should be melting of spirit at the very notice given of his displeasure; yet, behold, even in the hearts of the godly there remains so much slavishness, that they will not return but upon God's dealing very hardly with them. They must have many afflictions, they must be whipped home before they will return home; God must send the dog many times to worry his sheep before they will come into the fold. This God complains of; Jer. ii. 14, "Is Israel a servant? is he a home-born slave? why is he spoiled?" ver. 17, "Hast thou not procured this unto thyself?" So it may be said of many of the saints, when we see the dealings of God towards them; yea, even God himself speaks thus, What! is such a one a servant? is he a slave? is not such a one my child? how is it then that he must be dealt with like a slave, like a servant?

Obs. 3. When one means will not keep ourselves or others from sin, we must not rest there, but look after other means to prevent it. What! will not this do it? Is there any thing else that possibly may do it? That means then shall be used. Thus God (we speak with reverence) studies his administrations towards his people, when he is frustrated in one, if that will not do, he thinks with himself, Is there any thing else will do it? if there be any thing in the world can do it, it shall not be left unattempted. God does not presently cast off his people, because they stand out against him in the use of one means. It is true, for others that are not in covenant with him, God is quick with them, and if they come not in presently, he cuts them off, and will have no more to do with them; but for his own people, though they stand out long, yet God tries one means after another. This is the grace of God towards his own.

It should be our care to imitate God in this. When you are to deal with others who are under you, with your children or servants, do not satisfy yourselves with, I have admonished them, and threatened them, and persuaded them, yet they will not come in; what, then, will you have no more to do with them? will you cast them off presently? You should study what further course may be taken, study their dispositions; What do I think will work upon them, if this do not? will fair means? will foul means? will any thing do it? If any thing will, you should labour to deal with them that way. So for your own hearts, when you are convinced of the evil of your sin, your consciences will not be quiet unless you use some means against it. Well, but I have used means, I have laid the threatenings, the promises, to my heart, and I have followed God's ordinances. Will they not do? will not thy heart come off? is there no other means to be used? What do you say to the afflicting of your soul? Try that: you have laid the word to your heart, and you find it does not work; try the afflicting of your souls in humiliation, fasting, and prayer, for the overcoming of your sins. "This kind goeth not out but by prayer and fasting." Thus, when admonitions and exhortations of the prophet will not do, God saith, I will try another way, I will bethink me of some other course; "I will hedge up their way with thorns," and I will see whether I can bring them in that way.

Obs. 4. For God to make the way of sin difficult to sinners, is a most singular mercy. "Behold!" It is better for the way of sin to be hedged with thorns, and to be made difficult to us, than to have the smoothest path for its commission. As it is one of the greatest judgments of God upon wicked men to lay stumblingblocks before them in the way of righteousness; so it is one of the greatest mercies of God to his children to lay stumblingblocks and difficulties before them in the way of sin. It is usual with God in dealing with reprobates, to make their sins, and his providences, stumblingblocks to them in the way of life. They hate godliness, and therefore the hedge of thorns compasses about the way of righteousness to the wicked. In Prov. xv. 19, it is said that "the way of the slothful man is an hedge of thorns;" that is, a slothful man looks upon any duty that he should perform, as compassed about with a hedge of thorns. God, in his just judgment, suffers such difficulties at least to appear to the wicked in the way of his duties as make him have no mind to them. Now this is a grievous judgment of God, to cause the way of his fear to appear so difficult, and to scare them from it: What should I do meddling with such ways? I see I must suffer much; there are these stumblingblocks that I must go over, these troubles that I must meet; I had better sit still and be quiet, I shall never be able to go through them. Such stumblingblocks God lays in the way of godliness before the wicked, and they stumble at them, and fall, and ruin their souls. On the other hand, God, in abundance of mercy, casts stumblingblocks in the way of sin before his people, which they cannot get over; if they stumble, it is but to break their shins, and to save their souls. But when the wicked stumble, they break their necks, and damn their souls. But the ways of God "are all plain to him that understandeth, and right to them that find knowledge," Prov. viii. 9. God's ways are very plain to the godly, and sin's ways are very difficult; but on the other side, to the wicked God's ways are very difficult, and the ways of sin are very plain. O unhappy men, says Luther, when God leaves them to themselves, and does not resist them in their lusts! but woe to them, at whose sins God winks! When God lets the way to hell be a smooth and pleasant way, it is a heavy judgment, and a sign of God's indignation against men, a token of his rejection of them, that he does not intend good unto them. You bless yourselves many times, that in the way of sin you find no difficulty; if a lewd or a malicious man, who would accomplish his own ends, find all things go on as he desires, so that he has not in his way so much as a thorn, he blesses himself. Bless thyself! if thou knowest all, thou hast cause to howl, and wring thy hands, for the curse of God is upon thee, a dreadful curse to make the way of sin pleasant. On the other side, perhaps many of God's saints, when they find the ways of sin somewhat difficult to them, are troubled that they cannot have their will. Troubled! thou hast cause to bless God who has thus crossed thee, for it is an argument of much love to thee. There is a "Behold" put to this, that God should be so merciful to make their ways of idolatry and superstition difficult to them.

Obs. 5. There is much brutishness in the hearts of backsliders. "I will hedge up her way with thorns." Not only slavishness, but brutishness. That is, they must not only be dealt hardly with, as slaves, and so be brought home, but, as brute beasts, they must have some present evil put upon them. They will not return from their evil way, except their sin be grievous and troublesome to them. It is not enough, you know, to threaten beasts, but if we would keep them from the place to which we would not have them go, we must use something that will give them pain when they attempt to enter it. A man who has some understanding, though he has a slavish spirit, may be kept from sin by fear of future evils; but when nothing but present evils will keep him off, he is worse than a slave; he cannot be kept from sin by the exercise of his reason, God must deal with him then as a brute beast, God must make some hedge prick him, or else he will go on in an evil way. This is brutishness, even in the hearts of the saints.

Obs. 6. See the proneness of men's natures to idolatry. The way must be hedged up to keep them from it. It is not enough to forewarn men of it, for all means that can be used are little enough to deter them. How wicked then is the way of many amongst us, who seek to make the way to idolatry as smooth, plain, and open as they can! Yea, instead of stopping such as have inclinations to it, they lay before them the inciting and enticing occasions, which add to their own propensity such delectation as puts them forward with a swift facility.

Obs. 7. Afflictions to the people of God, are God's hedges to keep them from sin. The command of God is one hedge, and affliction is another. Therefore sin is called by the name of transgression; that is, going beyond our bounds, going over the hedge; a man that sins goes over the hedge. We find, Eccl. x. 8, "Whoso breaketh an hedge, a serpent shall bite him:" it is true in regard of the hedge of God's command, he that will venture to break that hedge, must expect the biting of conscience, its anguish and horror. But when that hedge is broke, God comes with another hedge to keep his people from sin; so you have it expressed in Job xxxiii. 17, 18: speaking of afflictions, By them "he withdraweth man from his purpose," and "he keepeth back his soul from the pit." Suppose a beast running in a pasture, bounded by a hedge at the brink of a precipice, perhaps he does not see the hedge; if he should run a little further, he would fall over and be destroyed; but the husbandman sets a hedge there, that when the beast comes to the thorns, they may withdraw him from his purpose, and so preserve his life: so it may be with a man that is running to such a sin, when he meets with something that hinders him, he is withdrawn from his purpose, and his soul is kept back from death. If you live in the country near ditches and pits of water, you will hedge them about, for fear your children should fall into them; and so the hedge keeps the children alive. As afflictions keep the saints from sin, as a hedge to them, so the difficulties in God's ways keep the wicked from God. When difficulties therefore happen, it should teach us to consider what way we are in: why? for God uses to compass about sinful ways with difficulties, on purpose to keep his people from them. Well, I am going on in this course, I am sure I am compassed about with difficulties, it may be these difficulties are but God's hedges to keep me from sin; how shall I know that? Sometimes difficulties are but trials of our graces, and they lie in the most blessed ways of God's people; then the work of the saints should be to stir up their graces, and to break through this hedge, though they be pricked and torn thereby. It is the excellency of their faith that will carry them through all difficulties in God's ways. Therefore here is the trial; when I meet with difficulties, I must not forbear because there are difficulties, but I must examine, Is it the way of God or not? If it be the way of God, then lay aside the thought of difficulties; if I have authority for it, let the difficulties be never so many, and the hedge never so thick, I must break through, and God is so much the more honoured by it: but on the other side, if upon examination, I find the way I am in is not warranted by God, then I must know that God's end in laying difficulties in the way, is to stop my going on in it, and it is desperateness in me to seek to break through; in seeking to break through I may break my peace: therefore I must examine whether I have warrant from God for those ways in which I walk.

O infelices et miseros quando relinquunt Deum homines sibi ipsos, nec resistunt eorum furori et cupiditatibus: sed vix illis ad quorundam peccata committet Deus. Luther.

Oh that men would think of this when they meet with difficulties in their ways! How many of the saints have met with difficulties in their paths, and yet have gone on with strength! That of Jacob is one of the most famous examples we have in the book of God. The difficulties he met with were all in the way that God himself bade him take. God commanded him to return to his father Isaac, and yet he met with six or seven most prodigious difficulties, enough, one would have thought, to make him doubt whether he was in God's way or not, and to cause him to return back again. First, Laban pursued him, and intended mischief against him; then Esau comes to meet him with a purpose to destroy him; then his wife's nurse died; then Rachel herself died; then he had his daughter Dinah deflowered; and then his two sons committed that horrible wickedness in murdering the Shechemites! All these things fell out in Jacob's journey; he might have said, Am I in the way that God would have me? Yes, Jacob was in his way, he had an express warrant from God to go that journey. Difficulties therefore must not discourage us, but we must break through them, especially in these times. It were a low and poor spirit, to be kept from a good way because of a few thorns that it meets in the way. If we know it be God's way, go through it in the name of God, let the difficulties be what they will. But if the way be not warranted by God, let the difficulties we meet with stop us, for God intends them to be a hedge to keep us from sin.

Again, it should make us content when any affliction befalls us, because it is more than we know but that God intends abundance of good to us. It may be, if this affliction had not befallen thee, thou hadst undone thyself: if this affliction, that thou dost so wriggle to get out of, and thinkest thyself so miserable under, had not befallen thee, thou mightest have fallen into the pit and been lost; therefore be not troubled so much at the affliction, but examine whether it be not a hedge that God has set, to keep thee from a further misery.

Obs. 8. The perverseness of a man's heart is such, that he will break through many difficulties to sin. It seems that a hedge will not serve, there must be a wall, as well as a hedge.

We read of idolaters, who would cause their children to pass through the fire to their idols; that was more than a hedge of thorns. We see often, that men's hearts are so strongly bent upon their sins, that though they were to pass through much trouble, though they prick and tear themselves, yet they will have their sin. Ambrose tells us, that Philotimus, who brought his body to grievous diseases by uncleanness and drunkenness, when the physicians told him, that if he did not abstain he would certainly lose his eyes; as soon as he heard that, he answered, I aleat lumen amicum, Farewell, O pleasant light; rather than I will deny myself in this, I will never see light more: he would venture the loss of his eyes, rather than lose the satisfaction of his lusts. Thus it is with many. Oh what do they venture to their lusts! What an argument should that be to us to venture much for God, to endure hard things for the blessed God! though there be some hardship between us and our duty, break through all to get to that duty; wicked men will break through great difficulties to get to their sins. There need be a wall as well as a hedge.

Obs. 9. God, when he pleases, will keep men from their sins in spite of their hearts, that they shall not have their desire. Well, if there be need of a wall I will have a wall, saith God; though she may break down the hedge, she shall not break down the wall, it is too strong and too high. When God sees men set upon their wicked desires, if they be those that belong not to him, perhaps God may condemn them for their wicked desires, and yet they shall not have them; they shall go to hell for them, and never accomplish them. How desperately set was Saul to mischief David? but God made a wall that he could not get to have his desire, do what he would. Many, especially great men, how strongly are they set upon their desire! they must have it, and they will have it, nothing comes from them but must and will: well, they may be deceived, God knows how to cross the most stubborn and stout hearts that live upon the earth, that they shall not have what they would have in this world. "I will make a wall." God thus makes a wall about men's sins, by sending sore and heavy afflictions. When God brings some grievous disease upon the drunkard's body, perhaps he is so stopped that he cannot drink, that is a wall about his sin, that he cannot follow it according to his desire: so the unclean person, God brings such a disease upon him, that he cannot have the pleasure of his lust though he earnestly desires it: so God brings poverty upon others, that they cannot follow their ambition and pride, do what they can: these are as walls to them. But God does not always send this in a way of mercy.

Obs. 10. When lesser afflictions will not serve to keep men from their sins, God usually comes with greater and sorer. First a hedge, and then a wall. I see some of them will break through the hedge, "I will make a wall" therefore, that is, I will come with stronger and greater afflictions, and so keep them off. Lev. xxvi. 18, 19, "If you will not yet for all this," saith God, "hearken unto me, then I will punish you seven times more for your sins. And I will break the pride of your power." You think there is a power in your hand, and there is pride in your power, for power raises the heart up to pride; I will break it, I will never leave till

I have broken your hearts in spite of you: and you will find in that chapter four or five times mention of "seven times more." This is after the hedge, then there comes a wall.

Obs. 11. God is able to strike men with blindness, that they shall not see their way. "And they shall not find their paths." Though there be an evil way of mischief before them, though there be nothing to hinder them in it, God can strike men with blindness one way or other, that they shall not be able to see their way before them. We have it this day exceedingly fulfilled in our eyes; how does God blind and besot our adversaries, that they cannot see their way! The truth of Job v. 13, is this day before our eyes, "He taketh the wise in their own craftiness; and the counsel of the froward is carried headlong." How has God taken wise men in their own craftiness! their spirits are froward, because they are crossed and vexed, and their counsel is carried headlong; God takes away their understanding, and baffles them in their own counsels. "The stout-hearted are spoiled, they have slept their sleep; and none of the men of might have found their hands," Psal. lxxvi. 5; they are cast into a slumber, and know not how to make use of that power which they have in their hands. It follows, ver. 6, "At thy rebuke, O God of Jacob, both the chariot and horse are cast into a dead sleep:" a strange expression, that a chariot should be "cast into a dead sleep;" the meaning is, they can no more tell how to make use of them, than if they all lay dead, or asleep. Let us not be afraid of the power of adversaries; suppose they had power in their hand, God can strike them with blindness, they shall grope to find the door, they shall be baffled in their own ways, they shall not tell how to make use of their power. Isa. xxix. 14, "Behold," (saith God,) "I will proceed to do a marvellous work among this people, even a marvellous work and a wonder." What is it? "The wisdom of their wise men shall perish, and the understanding of their prudent men shall be hid." This is a wonderful thing that God will do; yea, and he will "mingle a perverse spirit in the midst of them." Thus, Isa. xix. 11, "Surely the princes of Zoan are fools, the counsel of the wise counsellors of Pharaoh is become brutish:" and ver. 12, "Where are they? where are thy wise men?" And again, ver. 13, "The princes of Zoan are become fools, the princes of Noph are deceived;" and ver. 14, "The Lord hath mingled a perverse spirit in the midst thereof; and they have caused Egypt to err in every work thereof, as a drunken man staggereth in his vomit." Here is the judgment of God upon men; when he list, he can blind them in their way that they shall err in their work, and stagger in their counsels and designs, as a drunken man in his vomit; they shall not find their paths, nor know what to do.

Well, thus God deals with wicked men: but now let us consider this in reference to the saints, to God's own people, "they shall not find their paths;" then,

Obs. 12. It is a good blindness for men not to see the way of sin. It is promised here in a way of mercy, that "they shall not find their paths." This darkness is not "the shadow of death;" but "the way of life." It is rich mercy. Maris, bishop of Chalcedon, a blind man, whom Julian the apostate called a blind fool, because he had rebuked Julian for his apostasy, answered him thus, I bless God that I have not my sight to see such an ungracious face as thine. So, many may bless God for their bodily blindness, because it has prevented abundance of sin that might have been let in at the easements of their eyes. But especially for blindness, not to see the way of sin, if we may call that blindness. It is a mercy that God does not grant to all, it is a singular mercy to the saints: for you find abundance of people exceedingly quick-sighted in the way of sin, that can find the path there, and yet are exceedingly blind in the way of God, and cannot find the path there. On the other side, the saints are blinded in the way of sin, but are quick-sighted in the ways of God. How many men are wise to do evil, as the Scripture saith, able to see into the depths of Satan, and are profound to damn themselves; they can find out so many objections against the ways of God, they can answer such arguments against their own ways, and have such cunning devices to accomplish them; but when they come to the ways of God, they are as blind as moles; they cannot see the necessity for such strictness; they cannot understand, though men of great parts and of great understanding otherwise, yet they have no skill in the ways of God. "I thank thee, O Father, Lord of heaven and earth," saith Christ, "that thou hast hid these things from the wise and prudent, and hast revealed them unto babes." Hence the saints, though babes, are able to see far into the excellency and glory of God's ways, they have understanding there, though but weak otherwise; the beauty of the great mysteries of God, dazzles all the glory of the world in their eyes. They are not so easily caught with temptations, but can see into the subtleties of the devil that would draw them out of God's ways; but when they come to the ways of sin, there they want understanding, and it is God's mercy to them that they do; there they are but bunglers, they grope as blind men, they are not cunning artists in those ways. As the apostle saith, 1 Cor. ii. 12, "We have received not the spirit of the world," we cannot shift for ourselves as the men of the world can, we are not so cunning to contrive plots, and tricks, and devices for our own ends as the men of the world; but "we have received the Spirit of God," we can understand things (through God's mercy) to eternal life. There are many men cunning for their own destruction, they can find every secret path of sin; though sin be a labyrinth, they trace it, and find out every by-path in that way. When the ways of God are propounded to wicked men, there is a mist before their eyes, they cannot see; and when the ways of sin are propounded to the saints, God in mercy casts a mist before their eyes that they cannot see. Eccl. x. 15, The fool "knoweth not how to go to the city;" wicked men know not the path to the church of God, to the ordinances of God; they talk much about such and such ordinances, and setting up of Christ in the way of his ordinances, but they know not what the true worship of God means. No, a fool does not understand the way to the city of God, he cannot find out that path. But the saints, though they know not the ways of sin, yet they can find out the paths of God, they know the way to the city. Possidonius tells us, that when wait was laid for Austin's life, through God's providence he missed his way, and so his life was preserved, and his enemies were disappointed. So many times when you are going on in such a way of sin, perhaps you little think what danger there is in it; God in mercy therefore casts a mist before your eyes, and you miss that way and save your lives.

Ver. 7. And she shall follow after her lovers, but she shall not overtake them; and she shall seek them, but shall not find them: then shall she say, I will go and return to my first husband; for then was it better with me than now.

In the 5th verse it was vadam, "I will go after my lovers;" but here it is, רדבה "she shall follow," from a root which signifies persequer, to follow with eagerness; not only sectari, but insectari; the word is the same that is used for persecutors, who eagerly pursue those they persecute. Psal. vii. 5. David speaks of his enemies following him, and uses the same word, "Let the enemy persecute my soul." καταδιώξαι Sept. The form of the word being in Piel, signifies to do any thing anxiously, diligently, carefully, whereas in Kal it signifies barely doing a thing. Thus it is interpreted by Pelanus, anxie persecuta est, she has persecuted or followed with a great deal of care. So that this is more than the other, for it seems that after she had some affliction she grew worse for a while, and was more eager upon her idols than she was before.

"But she shall not overtake them." Though she be never so much set upon that way of evil, yet I will take a course to keep her from it, she shall not overtake them. Yea,

"She shall seek them, but shall not find them." The word חֲסֹדִים signifies, to seek with much endeavour, not only to seek in one's thought and mind, but to walk up and down, that we may find. The Seventy use divers words, which signify a seeking more than ordinary.

"But shall not find them." Let her be never so set upon her ways of idolatry, yet I will keep her from them.

"Then shall she say, I will go," &c. This shall be the effect of it. One would think all this were nothing but threatening; O no, it is mercy, for it is for this end, that she might at length say, "I will go and return to my first husband," &c.

You may take then the scope of this and the preceding verse in this short paraphrase: as if God should say, O Israelites, you have grievously sinned against me, in forsaking me and following your lovers. Sore and heavy evils are ready to befall you, even you, my elect ones, upon whom my heart is set for good. You have involved yourselves in the common guilt of this wickedness, therefore even you must expect to be involved in the common calamity that shall come upon the nation. When you are under those calamities, know that I understand how to make a difference between sinner and sinner, though guilty of the same sin, and under the same affliction. What shall be for the destruction of some, shall be in mercy to you, it shall hedge up your ways, keep you from further sinning, and make your ways of sin difficult, that so your souls may be saved; and although your hearts will be a long time perverse, and will not submit to me, yet I will so order things, in the way of my providence, that at length I will so work upon your hearts, that you shall return unto me. You shall bethink yourselves, and remember what sweetness once you had in my ways; and you shall take shame to yourselves, and acknowledge that it was then far better with you than it is now; and so I will remain to be your God, and you shall give up yourselves to worship and serve me for ever. This is the meaning and scope of the words.

Obs. 1. Until God subdues the heart to himself, men will grow worse and worse in their sins. Even God's elect, to whom he intends mercy at last, till God comes with his grace to subdue their hearts, they may grow worse and worse. They would before "go after their lovers," and now here afflictions come upon them; yet still they will follow their lovers, and that with more eagerness of affection, and with more violence, than before. Afflictions in themselves are part of the curse of God, and there is no healing virtue in them, but an enraging quality to stir up sin, till God sanctify them by his grace; and God may suspend for a time the sanctifying work of his grace to those to whom he intends good at last. Isa. li. 20, speaks of some whose afflictions were not sanctified, that "they lie at the head of all the streets, as a wild bull in a net: they are full of the fury of the Lord." They were full of the fury of the Lord, yet lay like a wild bull in a net, in a raging manner. This distemper of heart proceeds from two grounds. 1. When outward comforts are taken away by affliction, the sinner, having no comfort in God, knows not where to have comfort but in his sin; and if conscience be not strong enough to keep from it, he runs madly upon it. 2. Because he thinks others look upon him as one opposed by God for his sin; therefore, that he may declare to all the world that he is not daunted, and that he has no misgiving thoughts, (though perhaps he has nipping gripes within,) he will put a good face upon it, and follow his ways more eagerly than formerly.

Obs. 2. A man may follow after the devices of his own heart, and yet may not overtake them. "She shall follow, but she shall not overtake." There is a great deal of difference betwixt following God's ways, and our own ways: there was never any in the world that was disappointed, if he knew all, in following God's ways, he obtained either the very thing he would have, or something that was as good, if not better, for him; and in the ways of sin, in our own ways, we may and do meet with disappointment. Why should we not then rather follow God than our own desires? The desires after sin, as they are desideria futilia, so they are desideria inutilia, as one speaks; as they are foolish, so they are fruitless desires, they do not attain what they would have. How has God disappointed men in our days! they have not overtaken what they greedily sought after. Our adversaries blessed themselves in their designs, they thought to have their day, they propounded such an end and thought to have it; but how has God disappointed them! But whether God has done this in mercy to them, as it is here, we know not; we hope God has crossed some of them in a way of mercy, though perhaps he may deal in another way with others.

Obs. 3. Disappointment in the way of sin is a great mercy. As satisfaction in sin is a judgment of God, and a fearful judgment; so disappointment in sin is a mercy, and a great mercy. God says in Prov. xiv. 14, "The backslider in heart shall be filled with his own ways." A dreadful threatening to backsliders and apostates! When God has no intention of love and mercy for backsliders, he will give them their own devices, they shall have their fill of their own ways; you would have such a lust, you shall have it, you shall be satisfied to the full, and bless yourselves in your own ways. This is the judgment of God upon backsliders. But for the saints, when tempted to such a way of sin, God will disappoint them, they shall not have it. We account it ordinarily very grievous to be disappointed of any thing, and many times I have had this meditation upon it; What! does it so trouble the heart of men to be disappointed almost in any thing? oh what a dreadful vexation and horror will it be for a man to see himself disappointed of his last hopes! Remember this, when you are troubled at any disappointment; what will be the terror and anguish of spirit then, if it should prove that any of you are disappointed of your hopes for eternity! But those whom God disappoints in the way of sin, may have hope that God will deliver them from that great disappointment.

Obs. 4. Governors should take such a course as to remove idols and superstitious vanities from those that will worship them, and sin against God by them. She would have her idols, but God will take them away; though she follow after them, and have a great mind to them, yet "she shall not overtake them." The meaning is, God will remove them from their idols, or their idols from them; they should not come to their Dan or Bethel, they should either be removed far enough from their calves, or the calves from them. Hence governors must either take people away from those vanities, or their vanities from them; they should not so much as suffer those things to be enticements and snares for the hearts of people; though they are very grand, and abundance of gold and excellent artificial work are about them, yet, "Thou shalt not desire the silver or gold that is on them, nor take it unto thee, lest thou be snared therein: but thou shalt utterly detest it, and thou shalt utterly abhor it; for it is a cursed thing," Deut. vii. 25, 26. You shall not look upon the ingenious work of their idols, and upon the great cost bestowed upon them, and therefore spare them because of that; O no, but take them away, that men may not be insnared by them.

Obs. 5. Idolaters' hearts are after their idols when they cannot get them. "She shall follow after her lovers, but she shall not overtake them." Though they cannot get them, yet they will be following them. Their conduct is of excellent use for us: so should we do in pursuing after God's ordinances; though perhaps, for the present, we cannot enjoy the ordinances of God, yet be sure to keep our hearts working after them. Many deceive themselves in this; they say, We would have all the ordinances of God, but we see we cannot; and so upon that sit still, and do not labour to keep their hearts in a burning desire after them; and hence, many times they let slip the opportunities of enjoying them. But now if thou canst not have the beauty of an ordinance, if thou keepest thy heart in a burning desire after it in the use of all means for attaining it, know then, that the want of an ordinance is an ordinance to thee. You shall find in the English Chronicle of Edward the First, that he had a mighty desire to go to the Holy Land; and because he could not go, he gave charge to his son upon his death-bed that he should take his heart thither, and appointed £32,000 to defray the charges of carrying his heart to the Holy Land, out of a superstitious respect he had to that place: though he could not attain it, his heart should. Thus should our hearts work after ordinances.

And now we come to the blessed fruit of all this. "She shall follow after her lovers, but she shall not overtake them; and she shall seek them, but shall not find them." What follows after all this? Now mercy appears; they shall return, at length they shall bethink themselves. "Then shall she say, I will go and return to my first husband; for then was it better with me than now."

Obs. 1. In times of affliction, the only rest of the soul is to return to God. They kept wriggling, and shifting up and down, to provide for themselves, but they could find no rest. As a poor prisoner that is shackled keeps a stir with his chains, but instead of getting any freedom he galls his legs. But when the poor soul, after all shiftings, and turnings, and vexings, comes to think of returning to the Lord, and of humbling and repenting itself before him, then it finds rest. "Return to thy rest, O my soul." Remember, after all your afflictions, here is your rest, in returning to the Lord.

Obs. 2. So long as men can have any thing in their sinful way to satisfy themselves with, they will not return to God. Then they shall say, that is, when they are so stopped in their way, when they are hedged, and walled, and cannot overtake their lovers, then they shall return to the Lord. There is that perverseness of spirit in men. Only when men are stopped in the way of sin, that they can have no satisfaction nor hope, then they begin to think of returning to God. As the prodigal; what shift did he make! he goes to the farmer, to the swine, to the husks to fill his belly, and it is likely if he had had his bellyful of them he would never have thought of going to his father; but when he came to the husks, and could not tell how to fill his belly there, when he was in a desperate state, then he begins to think of returning to his father. So you have it, Isa. lvii. 10, "Yet saidst thou not, There is no hope: thou hast found the life of thine hand; therefore thou wast not grieved;" thou wast not brought to such a desperate stand as to say, There is no hope: that intimates that till men are brought to such a stand that they can say, Certainly, there is no hope or help this way, they will seldom think of returning to God. Thus is God infinitely dishonoured by us. It is very strange how the hearts of men will hanker after their sin this way and that way, and till God take them quite off from hope of comfort by it, they will never have a thought to return to God. God is fain to be the last refuge. We account ourselves much dishonoured when we are the last Cum nemini obtrudisti potest, itur ad me. refuge; when nobody will, I must. It seems God is fain to yield to this; when no one will give satisfaction to the soul, then men come to God, and God must.

Obs. 3. Returning to God, if it be in truth, though it be after we have sought out all other helps, yet God is willing to accept. This is an observation full of comfort, the Lord grant it may not be abused; but it is the word of the Lord, and a certain truth, that returning after men have sought other means, and can find no help, though they are driven to it by afflictions, yet it may be accepted by God. Man will not accept upon these terms, but the thoughts of God are as far above the thoughts of men, as the heaven is above the earth. It is true, sometimes God will not, nay, God threatens, Prov. i. 28, Though "they call upon me, I will not answer;" though "they seek me early," yet "they shall not find me." God is not thus gracious to all at all times; therefore you must not presume upon it. God sometimes at the very first affliction hardens his heart against men, that he will never regard them more, for his mercy is his own; but those that are in covenant with him, though they come to him upon such terms, yet they may be accepted of him; therefore, take this truth for helping you against this sore temptation, which, when you are in affliction, will be apt to intrude: Oh! I cry to God now in my affliction; I should have done it before, surely God will not hear me now. I confess I cannot speak in this point without a trembling heart, lest it be abused; but the text presents it fairly to you, and you must have the mind of God made known to you, though others abuse it. "Mine eye mourneth by reason of affliction: Lord, I have called daily upon thee," Psal. lxxxviii. 9. This is spoken by Heman, and God did accept him, as it is apparent in the psalm, yet he cried by reason of affliction. And Psal. exx. 1, "In my distress I cried unto the Lord, and he heard me;" though it were in my distress, yet the Lord heard me. Only take this one note about it: Though our being stopped in all other ways may make us cry to God, and God may hear us, yet, when God does hear us, he works more than crying out by reason of that affliction; at first our affliction carries us to God, yet, before God has done with us, and manifests any acceptance of us, he works our hearts to higher aims than deliverance from our affliction.

Obs. 4. A heart effectually wrought upon by God is a resolute heart to return to God. "I will go and return." As they were resolute in their way of idolatry, "I will go after my lovers;" so their hearts, when converted, shall be as resolute in God's ways; "she shall say, I will go and return to my first husband." When God works upon the heart to purpose, he causes strong arguments to fasten upon the spirit, and nothing shall hinder, no, not father, nor mother, nor the dearest friend. Perhaps the Lord begins to work upon the child, and the father scorns him, and the mother says, What shall we have of you now? a puritan? This grieves the spirit of the child; yet there are such strong arguments fastened by God upon his heart, that it carries him through, he is resolute in his way, he will return.

Obs. 5. Those who have ever found the sweetness of Christ in their hearts, though they should be backsliders, have something remaining that will at length draw them to him. Christ has such hold upon their hearts, as at one time or other he will get them in again; there will be some sparks under those embers, that will inflame and draw the soul to return again to Christ. Therefore, if any of you have friends in whom you were verily persuaded there was a true work of grace, though they have exceedingly departed from Christ, do not abandon your hope, for if ever there were any true taste of the sweetness that is in Christ, Christ has such a hold upon their hearts, that he will bring them in again one time or other.

Obs. 6. There is nothing gotten by departing from Christ. "I will go and return to my first husband, for then was it better with me." You go from the better to the worse, whenever you depart from him: "What fruit had ye in those things whereof ye are now ashamed?" Rom. vi. 21. "I am the Lord thy God which teacheth thee to profit," Isa. xlviii. 17: sin does not teach you to profit, you can never get good by that, but the Lord teaches to profit. You may think to gain something by departing from Christ, but when you have cast up all the gain, you may put it into your eye, and it will do you no hurt. "What is the hope of the hypocrite, though he hath gained, when God taketh away his soul?" Job xxvii. 8. Perhaps a hypocrite, or a backslider who has departed from God, once forward in the way of godliness, but who now, like Demas, has forsaken those ways and cleaves to the world, thinks he has gained, and perhaps is grown richer, and lives braver than before; yet what hope has this backslider, this hypocrite, when God taketh away his soul? then he will see that he has gotten nothing. As it is said of the idolater, Isa. xlv. 20, "He feedeth upon ashes: a deceived heart hath turned him aside, that he cannot deliver his soul, nor say, Is there not a lie in my right hand?" What! shall there be more in a lust than in the blessed God? than in Jesus Christ, who is the glory of heaven, the delight of angels, the satisfaction of the Father himself? Can a lust put thee into a better condition than Christ, who has all fulness to satisfy God himself? Certainly it cannot be.

Obs. 7. There must be a sight and an acknowledgment of our shameful folly, or else there can be no true returning to God. "I will go and return to my first husband, for then was it better with me than now." As if the church should say, I confess I have played the fool, I have done shamefully, I have lost by departing from Christ, it was better far than it is now. Jer. iii. 25, "We lie down in our shame, and our confusion covereth us, for we have sinned against the Lord our God," saith the church; so it should be with all that return to Christ, they must lie down in their shame. This is very reasonable in these times: we have many now, who not long since were vile apostates; they have gone with the times, they saw preferment went such a way, and their hearts went that way; now they see they cannot have preferment in that way, and God of his mercy has changed the times, they will be converts. We have in England many parliamentary converts, but such we are not to confide in. Do you ask, Why should we not confide in them? If they repent and return, God accepts them, and why should not we? It is true, such a one was before an enemy, and followed superstitious vanities, but now he is grown better and preaches against them, and why should not we receive him? I answer, it is true, if deep humiliation has gone before that reformation; if, together with their being better, they have been willing to shame themselves before God and his people, to acknowledge their folly in departing from God, and be willing to profess before all that knew them, and have been scandalized by them. It is true, God began with me and showed me his ways when I was young; I began to love them, and to walk in them; but when I saw how the times went, and preferment went, the Lord knows I had a base, time-serving heart, I went away from God. No arguments satisfied my conscience, but merely livings and preferment, and now I desire to take shame and confusion of face to myself. Woe unto me for the folly and falseness of my heart! it is infinite mercy of God ever to regard such a wretch as I. If they did thus take shame to themselves, and acknowledge their folly, it were something. We read in the primitive times of Eecbolius, who, when he had revolted from the truth, came to the congregation, and, falling down upon the threshold, cried out, Calcate, calcate insipidum salem; Tread upon me, unsavoury salt; I confess I have made myself unsavoury salt by departing from the truth, let all tread upon me. It was a sign of true returning, when this went before, and reformation followed. We have done foolishly, it was better with us than now.

Obs. 8. Though acknowledgment must go before, yet returning must follow. "I will return." It is not enough to see and acknowledge, but there must be a returning; for as reformation without humiliation is not enough, so humiliation without reformation suffices not. And I speak this the rather, because these are times wherein there is a great deal of seeming humiliation, and we hope true humiliation; but many in the days of their fasting will acknowledge how sinful, how vile, how passionate they have been in their families, how worldly, what base self-ends they have had; and they will make such catalogues of their sins in those days of their humiliation, as cause admiration: the thing itself is good; but I speak to this end, to show the horrible wickedness of men's hearts, that after they have ripped up all their sins, and with all aggravations acknowledged the folly of their evil ways against God, yet they often manifest no returning; after all this, they are as passionate in their families, as froward, as peevish, as perverse, as earthly, as light and vain in their carriage as ever. They will acknowledge what they have done, but they will not return. Remember, humiliation must go before reformation, but reformation must follow after humiliation.

Obs. 9. How much better it was when the heart cleaved to Christ, above what it is since its departure from Christ, is an effectual means to cause the heart to return to him. This is the way that Christ himself prescribed, Rev. ii. 5, "Remember therefore from whence thou art fallen, and repent." Thou wert in a better condition once than now thou art: O return; and that thou mayst return, "remember from whence thou art fallen." I will give a little glimpse of what might be said in this point more largely. The reasonings of the heart in the sight of this may briefly be hinted thus: Heretofore I was able through God's mercy to look upon the face of God with joy. When my heart cleaved to him, when I walked close with God, then the glory of God shined upon me, and caused my heart to spring within me every time I thought of him; but now, now, God knows, though the world takes little notice of it, the very thoughts of God are a terror to me, the most terrible object in the world is to behold the face of God. Oh, it was better with me than it is now.

Before my backsliding I had free access to the throne of God's free grace, I could come with humble and holy boldness to God, and pour out my soul before him; such a chamber, such a closet, can witness it: but now I have no heart to pray, I must be haled to it by conscience; yea, every time I go by that very closet where I was wont to have that access to the throne of grace, it strikes a terror to my heart; I can never come into God's presence, but it is out of slavish fear. Oh, it was better with me than it is now."

Before, oh the sweet communion my soul enjoyed with Jesus Christ! one day's communion with him, how much better was it than the enjoyment of all the world! But now Jesus Christ is a stranger to me, and I a stranger to him. Before, oh the sweet enlargements that my soul had in the ordinances of God! when I came to the word, my soul was refreshed, was warmed, was enlightened; when I came to the sacrament, oh the sweetness that was there! and to prayer with the people of God, it was even a heaven upon earth to me: but it is otherwise now, the ordinances of God are dead and empty things to me. Oh, it was better with me then than it is now.

Before, oh the gracious visitations of God's Spirit that I was wont to have! Yea, when I awaked in the night season, oh the glimpses of God's face that were upon my soul! what quickenings, and enlivenings, and refreshings did I find in them! I would give a world for one night's comfort I then had by the visitations of God's Spirit, but now they are gone. Oh, it was better with me then than it is now.

Before, oh what peace of conscience had I within! however the world railed and accused, yet my conscience spake peace to me, and was a thousand witnesses for me: but now I have a grating conscience within me; oh the black bosom that is in me, it flies in my face every day! I could come before from the society of the saints, and my conscience smiled upon me; now I go to wicked company, and when I come home, and in the night, oh the gnawings of that worm! It was better with me then than it is now.

Before, the graces of God's Spirit were sparkling in me, active and lively! I could exercise faith, humility, patience, and the like; now, I am as one bereft of all, unfit for any thing, even as a dead log. Before, God made use of me, and employed me in honorable services; now I am unfit for any service at all. Oh, it was better with me then than it is now.

Before, I could take hold upon promises, I could claim them as mine own, I could look up to all those blessed, sweet promises that God had made in his word, as mine inheritance; but now, alas, the promises of God are very little to me. Before, I could look upon the face of all troubles, and the face of death, with joy; but now the thoughts of affliction and of death, God knows how terrible they are to me. Oh, it was better with me then than it is now.

Before, in all creatures I could enjoy God, I tasted the sweetness and love of God even in my meat and drink; I could sit with my wife and children, and see God in them, and look upon the mercies of God through them, as a fruit of the covenant of grace; oh how sweet was it with me then! But now the creature is as an empty thing unto me; whether it come in love or hatred I do not know. Oh, it was better with me before than now.

Before, I was under the protection of God wherever I went, but now I do not know what danger and miseries I am subject to daily, what may befall me before night, God only knows. Before, the saints rejoiced with me in my company and communion; now every one is shy of me. Before, I was going on in the ways of life; now these ways I am in, God knows, and my conscience tells me, are ways of death. Oh, it was better with me then than it is now.

Now then, put all these together, as I make no question these thoughts are the thoughts of many backsliders, if we knew all that were in their hearts. As the prodigal, when he was feeding upon the husks, began to bethink himself; What! is not there food enough in my father's house? every servant there has food enough, and here I am ready to starve. So many backsliders say, Alas! before, I had sweetness enough, and was satisfied with those abundance of pleasures that were in the house of God, and in his word and ordinances; now I feed upon husks, and amongst swine: oh that it were with me as it was before! As Job speaks in another case concerning his afflictions, "Oh that I were as in months past, as in the days when God preserved me; when his candle shined upon my head, and when by his light I walked through darkness!" Job xxix. 2, 3. Before, I had some afflictions, but I could walk through all afflictions by the light which I had from God. Oh that it were with me now as it was then; "as in the days of my youth, when the secret of God was upon my tabernacle, when the Almighty was yet with me!" It may be said of many backsliders, as Lam. iv. 7, 8, they were once as polished sapphires, but now they are become "blacker than a coal."

But oh that you had hearts to say, Let me return, let me return, because it was otherwise with me heretofore it is now! Oh that this day there might an angel meet thee, as he met with Hagar when she fled from Sarah! the angel said to her, "Hagar, Sarah's maid, whence comest thou, and whither wilt thou go?" So I say to thee, O backslider, whence comest thou, and whither wilt thou go? Mark, "Hagar, Sarah's maid, whence comest thou?" Dost thou come from Sarah? from Abraham's family, where God is worshipped, where the church of God is? and whither goest thou? canst thou be any where so well as there? So I say to thee, thou who wert a forward professor before, whence comest thou? Dost thou come from such ordinances, from such communion with the saints? What hast thou gotten by those base ways? Thou canst eat, and drink, and laugh a little, and have some esteem with such as are carnal; oh, whither wilt thou go? Oh that God would show you this day whither you go!

Obs. 10. Seeing there is so much grief and shame in complaining of our backsliding, whenever God awakens us it should teach all that are not yet apostates, to take heed what they do, that they may never bring themselves into such a condition. It is a note of caution to you who are, through God's mercy, in his way; you are now well, know when you are well, and keep well. And you young ones who are beginning to give up your names to God, take heed that you do not decline from what you now do, that you do not apostatize from God afterward, lest this be your condition at best; for this is at best, thus to lament the change of your condition. Perhaps you will go on, and God will never cause you to see your shame and folly, till you be eternally undone; but at best you must be brought to this shame and confusion of face, to acknowledge how much better it was with you before than now. How much better was it when I lived in such a family, under such a master, in such a town! oh it was better then with me than it is now! Oh the precious days that once I had when I was young! those days are gone, and whether ever they will come again, God knows.

Yet, further, when the judgment passes on God's side, that it was better before than now, then the soul is in a hopeful way. So long as the judgment holds for God and his ways, though thou art a backslider, though perhaps thy heart be drawn aside from God, and thy affections be unruly, thou art not in a desperate condition, there is hope of thee. There are two sorts of apostates. There are some apostates, who though they are so through the unruliness of their affections, and the strength of temptation, yet they keep their judgment for God's ways, and acknowledge God's people to be best, and his ordinances to be best, and themselves in the danger; these are properly backsliders. But there are some apostates who so fall off from God and his ways, that they begin in their very judgments to think that those ways which they professed before were but fancies, and that the people of God are but a company of humorous people, and bless themselves in their own ways, and think that they are better now than they were before. Oh, this is a hideous thing. If thy judgment be once taken, that thou thinkest the ways of sin to be better than those ways of God, that thou professedst before, then the Lord have mercy upon thee, thou art even a ruined man. We do not know what God will do with thee, but in the judgment of man thou art undone.

Latimer, in a sermon before King Edward, has this passage: I have known many apostates, but I never knew more than one that proved a scornor, and yet returned again. Take heed therefore, saith he, of apostacy. Though a man may fall from God, and possibly return; yet, if he fall off, so that his judgment is taken that he is become a scornor, that is a woeful condition, such a one scarce ever returns. Many such apostates you have in England, and I would challenge you all to give me one example of any one that ever returned again that so fell. I know many scornors are converted, but they that have been forward in professing, and then fall off, and prove scornors, where have you any of them come in? In Lev. xiii. 44, you find when the priest shall come and see a man that has the leprosy in his head, he shall pronounce him utterly unclean; for the plague is in his head. Observe, when the priest found uncleanness in any other part, he was to pronounce it unclean, but if the leprosy be in the head, he shall pronounce the part utterly unclean; there is not that utter uncleanness any where as when the plague is in the head. So I may say here, when a man falls off from the ways of God by some strong temptation or unruly affection, this man is unclean, verily, he is unclean; but when it comes to the head, that his judgment is against the ways of God, and so contemns them and those that follow them, and thinks his own ways better, this man is utterly unclean, for the plague is in his head. The Lord deliver you from that plague.

Obs. 11. Backsliders may have hope of attaining their former condition, to be as well as ever they were: "I will return to my first husband; for then was it better with me than now."

In this, God's goodness goes beyond man's abundantly. "They say, If a man put away his wife, and she go from him, and become another man's, shall he return unto her again? shall not that land be greatly polluted? but thou hast played the harlot with many lovers; yet return again to me, saith the Lord," Jer. iii. 1. Hence, ver. 22, the Holy Ghost exhorts to return upon this very ground, "Return, ye backsliding children, and I will heal your backslidings." Is there any backsliding soul before the Lord? God now offers to heal thy backslidings, thou knowest that it is not with thee now as heretofore; lo, God tenders his grace to thee that thou mayst be in as good a condition as ever. Oh that thou wouldst give the answer of the church there, "Behold, we come unto thee; for thou art the Lord our God. Truly in vain is salvation hoped for from the hills, and from the multitude of mountains: truly in the Lord our God is the salvation of Israel." It is true, God might justly satisfy thee in thy present ways of backsliding, as sometimes he does. "The backslider in heart shall be filled with his own ways," Prov. xiv. 14; he shall have enough of them; and Prov. i. 31, "They shall eat the fruit of their own way, and be filled with their own devices." But, behold, wisdom itself calls thee now to return again, and makes this fair promise, Prov. i. 23, "Turn you at my reproof: behold, I will pour out my spirit unto you." There is not only a possibility of being received into thy former condition, but Christ woos thee, and calls after thee. he promises to pour out his Spirit unto you, yea, and there would be triumph in heaven upon thy returning.

But let me say thus much to thee, though there be a possibility of coming again into as good a condition as thou wast in before, yet, 1. There had need be a mighty work of God's Spirit to raise thy heart to believe this. It is not an easy thing for one who has been left of God to that fearful sin of backsliding, to believe that ever God should receive him, and that he should return to the ways of mercy and comfort as before. Yea, 2. Though there be a possibility to be recovered to mercy, yet you must be contented to be in a meaner condition if God shall please. You must come to God with such a disposition as to be content with the lowest condition, only that thou mayst have mercy at the last; as the prodigal, "Make me as one of thy hired servants." And know, lastly, that if you do not return upon his gracious offer, God may give thee up for ever, take thy fill and there is an end of thee. "He which is filthy, let him be filthy still."

Yet, further, this expression strongly presents occasion to digress a little in comparing our present times with former, to examine whether we can say, it was better with us heretofore than it is now? In these days there is much comparing our present times with times past, and divers judgments about present times; some complaining of the hazards and dangers we are in, in these present times, Much better was it heretofore, say they, than it is now.

To such let me say, first, as the Holy Ghost saith, Eccl. vii. 10, "Say not thou, What is the cause that the former days were better than these? for thou dost not inquire wisely concerning this." Certainly, those people who make such grievous complaints of present times, comparing them with times past, do not wisely inquire concerning this thing. There are many sad things for the present amongst us, things that our hearts have cause to bleed for, such misunderstanding between king and parliament, some blood shed already, and danger of shedding much more; yet, perhaps, if we inquire wisely concerning this thing, we shall find that, notwithstanding all this, we have little cause to complain that it is worse with us now in comparison of what was before.

Consider, first, that which men most complain of, which makes the times hardest now, is but the breaking out of those mischievous designs that lay hid long before, and would have done us a great deal more mischief if they had been kept in. Now they break forth, and break forth as the desperateness of the hopes of those who had such designs; because they could now go no longer underhand, but being brought into a desperate pass, they are fain to see what they can do in ways of violence; and this certainly is better than that mischief should work secretly under-board. Secondly, by this we have a discovery of men, which way they stand, what was and is in their hearts; and this is a great mercy. Thirdly, with the breaking forth of these things, God grants that help now to England, that it never yet had so fully in the like way, and puts such a fair price into the hands of the people of England, that never yet was put into their hands. Yea, and consider, fourthly, that the more violent men are now, the more does it tell us what a lamentable time was before; for if now, when there is such means of resistance, and yet the adversaries prevail so much, what would they have been by this time, if this means of resistance had not been? What a case were we in then, when they might do what they would, and we had no means to help ourselves? Certainly things then lay at more hazard than now. Fifthly, though there be many sad things amongst us, yet God hath been beforehand with us, we have had already, even of free cost, as much mercy as all these troubles come to. Sixthly, these troubles are making way for glorious mercies to come; though there be some pangs, yet they are not the pangs of death, they are but the pangs of a travailing woman that is bringing forth a man-child. Any prince would think, that though his queen should be put to some pain in travail, yet her condition is better than when she had no pain and was barren, or than that she should lie upon her sick bed, and bereft of her senses, and ready to die. The pains of a travailing woman are better than a senseless dying. Yet further, if you think that you had better times heretofore than now, to what times will you refer in making the comparison? I suppose you will instance the times of the first reformation; then things were in a good way when those worthy lights of the church and blessed martyrs had such a hand in the reformation. Many magnify the times of the beginning of reformation for their own ends, that they may thereby hinder reformation now. This, you know, is the great argument that prevails with most: What! were not those prayers composed by learned, godly men, as Cranmer, Latimer, and Ridley, and others? and can we be wiser than they? did not they seal their profession with their blood?

My brethren, we need go no further to show the weakness of this argument, but only to show how it was in the church in those times, and you will find that you have cause to bless God that it is not so with you now as it was then; and if that will appear, then the argument you will see can no further prevail with rational men. Certainly, those first reformers were worthy lights and blessed instruments for God: I would not darken their excellency, but weaken the argument that is abusively raised from their worth. It is reported of Mr. Greenham, that famous practical divine, that in a letter to the bishop of Ely, in giving his reasons for refusing subscription and answers to that prelate's objection against him, that Luther thought such ceremonies might be retained in the church; he thus replied, I reverence more the revealed wisdom of God, in teaching Luther so many necessary things to salvation, than I search his secret judgments, in keeping back from his knowledge other things of less importance. The same I say of those worthy instruments of God's glory in the first reformation; and that it may be clear to you that God kept back his mind from them in some things, consider, whether you would be willing that should be done now that was then: as in the administration of baptism, we find that in the book of liturgy in King Edward's time, which was composed by those worthy men; first, the child was to be crossed in the forehead, and then on the breast; after a prayer used; then the priest was to say over the child at the font, "I command thee, thou unclean spirit, in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, that thou comest out of this infant; thou cursed spirit, remember thy sentence, remember thy judgment, remember the day is at hand wherein thou shalt be burnt with everlasting fire prepared for thee and thy angels, and presume not hereafter to exercise any tyranny over this infant whom Christ hath bought with his precious blood." Then they dipped the child thrice in the water, the godfathers and the godmothers laid their hands upon the child, and the priest put a white vestment over it, called a chrysome, saying, "Take this white vesture for a token of thine innocency, which by God's grace in this holy sacrament of baptism is given to thee, and for a sign whereby thou art admonished as long as thou livest to give thyself to innocency." Then the priest must anoint the infant upon the head, saying, "Almighty God," &c., "who hath regenerated thee by water and the Holy Ghost, who hath given thee remission of all thy sins, vouchsafe to anoint thee with the unction of his Holy Spirit." Would you now have your children baptized after this order? yet these learned, holy men thought that to be a good way. So at the burial of the dead, the priest casting earth upon the corpse shall say, "I commend thy soul to God the Father Almighty, and thy body to the ground;" and in another prayer, "Grant to this thy servant, that the sins he committed in this world be not imputed to him, but that he, escaping the gates of hell and pains of eternal darkness, may ever dwell in the region of light."

You will say, things are otherwise now. True; therefore I say, there is no strength in that argument, that those men who composed the liturgy were worthy lights in the church; for they were but newly come out of popery, and had the scent of popery upon them, therefore it is too unreasonable to make that which they did the rule of our reformation now, as if we were to go no further than they did. The like may be said of the primitive times, which many plead for the justification of their superstitious vanities, for the Christians then came but newly out of heathenism, and lived among heathens, and therefore could not so soon be delivered from their heathenish customs. I could relate to you sad things there were in Queen Elizabeth's and in King James's days; but I must not take too much liberty in this digression; only let us hereby learn not to cry out of evil times in which we live, as to be unthankful for present mercies; let us bless God for what we have had, and look to him and his word for further reformation.

Ver. 8. For she did not know that I gave her corn, and wine, and oil, and multiplied her silver and gold, which they prepared for Baal.

The Spirit of God returns here again to convincing, upbraiding, accusing, threatening of Israel. The sin of Israel went very near to the heart of God, and God speaks here as a man troubled in spirit for the unkindness, unfaithfulness, unreasonableness of the dealings of his spouse with him. It runs in his thoughts, his heart is grieved at it, and he must vent himself, and when he has told his grief and aggravated his wrong, he is upon it again and again, still convincing, upbraiding, charging Israel for dealing so unfaithfully and treacherously with him, all showing the trouble of his spirit. These words depend upon the 5th verse, for the 6th and 7th are as a parenthesis: "She that conceived them hath done shamefully: for she said, I will go after my lovers, that give me my bread and my water, my wool and my flax," &c. She did thus and thus, "for she did not know that I gave her corn, and wine," &c.

What! was Israel worse than the ox or the ass, that knows his owner, and his master's crib? It is impossible but Israel, who were the only people of God in those times, where God was most, nay, we may say, only known in the world, should know that God was the cause of all the good they had; certainly, they could not be ignorant of that, for in their creed (as Buxtorf and others mention) Buxtorf. Synag. Judaic. c. 1. 7. they had thirteen articles, and this was the first article, I believe with a true and perfect faith, that God is the Creator, the Governor, the Sustainer of all creatures, that he wrought all things, still works all things, and shall for ever work all things. And at their feasts they had these expressions, Blessed be thou, O Lord our God, King of the world, that dost create the fruit of the vine. The master of the feast himself came in publicly to bless God for the fruit of the vine; and yet the text saith that they did not know that God gave them wine. When they came to take bread they had this speech, Blessed be thou, O God, that art the King of the world, that bringest forth bread out of the earth. And at the end of the feast this, Let us bless him who hath sent us of his own, of whose goodness we live. The question answered, And blessed be he of whose goodness we live. Yea, to bless God solemnly for the sweet and fragrant smell of spices and herbs, was their constant way: and yet here God charges them that they did not know that he gave them bread, and wine, and oil; they did not lay it to heart.

We shall see afterward of what great use this is to us, to show what profession they made of acknowledging that God gave them all, and yet God charges them that they did not know that he gave them; what? "corn, wine, and oil, and multiplied her silver and her gold." Here God expresses himself more largely than they did before, in what they received from their idols: they talked in the 5th verse of receiving from their idols "bread, and water, and wool, and flax," &c.; but here is "wine, and oil, and silver, and gold," more than they had from their idols. God sets out his mercy to them, to upbraid them.

"Which they prepared for Baal."

We must inquire here, first, what this Baal was. The word בַּעַל signifies primarily, a lord (and then a husband): because they attributed dominion, acknowledging their idols to be lords, therefore they called them by this name; and because they chose them as their husband, therefore also they gave them this name: so with Bel too, for Baal and Bel are the same, the letter y being omitted, and the points being altered in the Chaldee.

Now this Baal either was some special idol, or else a general name given to all idols: sometimes it is a name given generally to all, in the plural number, Baalim; Jer. ix. 14, They "have walked after the imagination of their own heart, and after Baalim." But it likewise notes a special idol, an idol that was the same with that of the Zidonians, which they called Jupiter Thalassius, or their sea Jupiter; that idol was called Baal in a special manner. In 1 Kings xvi. 31, you may see how the worship of Baal came into Israel at that time. It is true it had been introduced in Israel a long time before, for in Judg. ii. 11, you find that they "served Baalim;" yet the idolatry of Baal was often cast out by the people of God: but see how it came in a fresh; "Ahab took to wife Jezebel the daughter of Eth-baal, king of the Zidonians, and went and served Baal, and worshipped him;" that was the occasion, Ahab marrying a Zidonian; to the end that he might ingratiate himself with his wife's kindred, he would worship his wife's god.

And this Baal has divers additional names. Sometimes in Scripture he is called Baal-zebub, or Beelzebub, and that signifies the god of flies; the reason why Baal had that name was, because in those countries they were extremely perplexed with flies, and they attributed the power of driving them away, and of helping them against their molestation, to their god Baal; hence they called him Baal-zebub. We have other manner of deliverances by the goodness of our God than this, yet for this Baal-zebub was one of their principal gods, therefore it is said of Christ, that "he cast out devils by Beelzebub, the prince of devils," which is, "by the god of flies" and in Matt. x. 25, he is called Βεελζεβούλ, Beelzeboul, which is as much as, the dung god, Zebel in the Syriac signifying dung. Then there was Baal-perazin, that addition was only from the place, the mountain where he was worshipped. There was also Baal-berith, that signified only the covenant they entered into with that god. So that it seems the very idolaters bound themselves to worship their god by solemn covenant, to teach us to be willing to bind ourselves in worshipping the true God by all the legal bonds we can, to make God to be the God of our covenant, as their god was. It is needless to name more who had this name. I shall afterward show how God himself had once the name of Baal, for the word signifying the name of husband, or lord, was as due to God as to any other, and God himself took that name. But here we are to understand it of their idols.

They prepared them for Baal, בָּעַל יְיָ they made them for Baal. It imports these two things:

First, that they sacrificed these things to their Baal, for so facere, to make, is often as much as sacrificare, to sacrifice. And Bellarmine, taking advantage of this word, when Christ saith, "Do this," draws an argument that the Lord's supper is a sacrifice, for the word to do is used sometimes to sacrifice.

But, secondly, they prepared them, that is, of their gold and silver they made images of this their idol god Baal; they would not spare their gold and silver, but laid aside and prepared it to make images of Baal, and they thought that gold and silver thus laid out as good as any in their purses.

Obs. 1. It is God that supplies all the outward good of his people. "They did not know that I gave them," &c. I gave not only mine ordinances, but I gave them corn, and wine, and oil, and gold, and silver. It is the Lord himself that supplies all outward good to his people; he does not only prize the souls of his people, but he takes care of their bodies too, and outward estates. "He keepeth all his bones," Psal. xxxiv. 20. Yea, he takes care of the very hair of their heads. The bodies of the saints are precious in the eyes of God, the most precious of all corporeal things in the world: the sun, and moon, and stars are not so precious as the bodies of the saints; how much more precious are their souls!

Austin, upon Psal. lxxiii. 1, "My soul thirsteth for thee, my flesh longeth for thee," has this note: If the flesh has any need of bread, of wine, of money, or cattle, seek this of God, for God gives this too; for mark, "My flesh longeth for thee." Those who thirst for God must thirst for him every way; not only their souls thirst for him, but their flesh must thirst for him; for, saith he, did God make the soul, and did the devils, or any idols, make the flesh? No, he that made both soul and flesh feeds them both; therefore all Christians must say, "My soul thirsteth for thee, my flesh longeth for thee." If then we can trust God for our souls, and our eternal states, that he will provide for them, we must trust him for our bodies also, for our flesh, for our temporal estates, that he will provide for them also.

*Namquid animam tuncm Deus fecit, et carnem demonia
fecerunt? qui fecit ambas res ipse pascet ambas.* Aug. in Ps. lxxiii.

Obs. 2. All our supply that we enjoy in this world, is the free gift of God. "They did not know that I gave them corn, and wine," &c. All of us live upon the mere alms of God; the greatest man in the world is bound to go to God's gate and beg his bread every day; though he were an emperor over all the world he must do it, to show his dependence upon him, that he lives wholly upon alms. Men think it hard to live upon alms, and because they have so much coming in by the year, such an estate in land, they think they are well provided for many years. But whatever estate thou hast, though by thy trading thou hast gotten much, yet God requires this of thee, to go to his gate, and beg thy bread of him every day; so Christ teaches, "Give us this day our daily bread:" and certainly, if we did but understand our dependence upon God for all outward comforts, we could not but fear him, and seek to make peace with him, and keep peace with him. It would be a means that our hearts should be enlarged to give to others who need our alms, seeing every man and woman of us is an alms-man and an alms-woman.

Obs. 3. It is a duty that we owe to God, to know and take notice of God as the author of all our good. They know not, that implies they ought to have known. This is a special duty of that worship we owe to God: it is the end of God's communication of all good to us, that he may have active as well as passive glory from his rational creature: and there is no creature else in the world that God has made capable of knowing any thing of the first cause but the rational creature; therefore it is the excellency of such, that they not only enjoy the good which they have, but that they are able to rise up to the highest and first cause of all their good. It is observed of doves, that at every grain of corn they take in their bill they cast their eyes upward; and in the Canticles you find the eyes of the church are called "doves' eyes," because they look so much up to heaven upon every good they receive. They have not dogs' eyes; the men of the world have dogs' eyes: dogs, you know, look up to their masters for meat, and when they have it they presently look down to the ground; so the men of the world will pray to God when they want, but when they enjoy what they have, they look no more upward, but downward.

This taking notice of God to be the author of all our good, and to give him praise, is all the rent we pay to God for what we enjoy, therefore it is fit we should do that. If we do any thing for God, God takes notice of that to the uttermost; yea, though he enables us to do it, yea, though it be but a little good mingled with a great deal of evil, God takes notice of it, and will reward it; surely then we should take notice of the good that he gives out to us. This sweetens our comforts, to see that they all come from God. Observe the difference between the expression of Jacob's blessing and Esau's blessing; when Isaac came to bless Jacob, he expresses himself thus, Gen. xxvii. 28, "God give thee of the dew of heaven, and the fatness of the earth, and plenty of corn and wine." Now when he comes to bless Esau, mark his expression then, ver. 39, "Thy dwelling shall be the fatness of the earth, and of the dew of heaven from above;" but he never mentions God in that. It is not Esau's blessing, "God give thee of the dew of heaven, and of the fatness of the earth," though it is true Isaac meant so; but yet he does not mention the name of God in Esau's, as in Jacob's blessing. Certainly, my brethren, the seed of Jacob count their blessing to be a double, a treble blessing, that they can see God in it. Carnal hearts do not much regard God, if they can have their flesh satisfied in what they desire, from what hand it comes they do not much care; but a gracious heart, a child of Jacob, rejoices more in the hand from whence it comes, than in any good he can possibly enjoy.

Obs. 4. God does a great deal of good in the world that is little taken notice of, or laid to heart. Many of God's dispensations are invisible, the angels, Ezek. i. 8, are described with their hands under their wings. God does great things sometimes so invisibly that he cannot be seen; and when he does great things that we might see, yet, through the neglect, stupidity, and drossiness of our hearts, we do not see them. The most observing eye in the world, that takes the exactest notice of God's mercy, and has the greatest skill to set forth the riches of God's goodness to himself and others, yet, alas, notices very little. It is with the quickest-sighted Christians as with a skillful geographer, who takes notice of and understands many parts of the world, and is able to set out the several parts distinctly to you in such a climate, in such a country, but yet leaves a great space for a terra incognita, for an unknown world, and that unknown world, for aught we know, may be five times bigger than the known world. So they who have the most observant eye of God's mercies, and take the most notice of them, who can best set out the mercies he bestows, spiritual mercies, temporal mercies, preventing mercies, past mercies, present mercies, delivering mercies, &c.; yet when they have done all, they must leave a great space for the terra incognita, for the unknown mercies of God.

The truth is, those mercies of God which are obvious to our knowledge every day, one would think were enough to melt our hearts: but besides the mercies we notice, there are thousands and thousands of mercies that we know not of. As we daily commit many sins that we know not, so daily we receive many mercies that we know not likewise. And as, in our confession of sins, we should pray to God first to pardon the sins we know, and so to name them in particular; and when we have done, then, Lord, forgive us our unknown, our secret sins. So in our thanksgiving, first bless God for the mercies before us, and when we have done, Lord, blessed be thy name Scire tuum nihil est, nisi te scire hoc aliter. for all thy unknown mercies, of which I have taken little notice.

We soon grow cold and dead if we do good, and men take no notice of us. Neither what we know, nor what we do, is any thing to us, except others know it too; but this is the vanity and pride of men's hearts. It is God's prerogative above his creatures, to do all for himself, for his own glory, and yet he doth much good in the world that none see. We are bound to deny ourselves in what we do, not to seek our own glory. The most excellent piece in the most excellent of our works, is our self-denial in it; why should we not then do all the good we can cheerfully, though it be not known? We should do good out of love to goodness itself; and if we would do so, we should be encouraged in doing good secretly.

Obs. 5. In God's account, men know no more than they lay to heart and make good use of. The schools distinguish between nescientia, and ignorantia: nescientia is of such things as we are not bound to know, it is not our sin not to know them; but ignorantia is of such things as we are bound to know, and that ignorance is twofold. There is an invincible ignorance, let us take what pains we can, we can never know all that we are bound to know; and there is an affected ignorance, when through carelessness we do not mind what is before us; and when we have minded it so far as to conceive it, yet if we lay it not to heart as we ought, in God's account we know it not; if we digest not what we know into practice, God accepts it not. As God is said not to know when he does not approve, "I know you not;" so when any man has a truth in notion, and it is not embraced by the heart, God accounts that that man knows it not. Therefore, in Scripture it is said, The seer is blind; it is a strange expression, and seems to be a contradiction; but it is not so, because God accounts those that have never so much knowledge, if it do not sanctify the heart so as to give him the glory, blind. The knowledge of the saints is another kind of knowledge than other men have. We have, saith Cyprian, no such notions as many of your philosophers, but we are philosophers in our deeds, we do not speak great things, but we do great things in our lives. In 1 Thess. iv. 9, 10, you have an excellent example of this: "Ye yourselves are taught of God to love one another." What follows? "And indeed ye do it." That is an evidence that you are taught of God when it prevails with your hearts; when it may be said, indeed so you do. Who is there in the world, but knows that we should love one another? but men are not taught of God to love one another, until it may be said of them, that indeed so they do.

There is nothing more obvious to the understanding of a man than the notion of a Deity, that there is a God: we may, as it were, grope after him, as the Holy Ghost speaks; but yet, 1 John ii. 4, "He that saith, I know him, and keepeth not his commandments, is a liar, and the truth is not in him." Any man, whoever he be, though the greatest scholar in the world, if he say he knows God, and yet keeps not his commandments, he has the lie told him to his teeth, he does not know God at all. Though this be the most obvious thing to the understanding, yet Christ saith, "No man knoweth the Father, save the Son, and he to whomsoever the Son will reveal him," Matt. xi. 27. Hence, when a soul is converted, you shall hear these expressions; I never knew God before, I never knew what an infinite Deity meant, I never understood the infinite sovereignty and majesty of the great God, I never knew what sin meant before: yet if you had asked him before, he would say, I know God is a Spirit, that he is infinite and eternal; I know that sin is the transgression of the law. I never knew what Christ was before; yet before he would have told you, that Christ was the Son of Mary, and came into the world to die for sinners. A German divine, when upon his sick bed, said, In this disease I have learned what sin is, and how great the majesty of God is: this man, though a

Hoc morbo didici
quid sit peccatum, et quanta majestas
Dei. Gaspar Glerianus.

preacher, and doubtless he could preach of sin and of the majesty of God, yet he professed he knew not these things until God came powerfully upon his heart to teach him what they were. The Hebrews say, words of sense carry with them the affections, or else they are to no purpose: when men have notional knowledge, that comes not down into the heart, they are like men who have weak stomachs and heads, when they drink wine its fumes fly up to the head and make them giddy; but if the wine went to the heart, it would cheer and warm it: so all this man's knowledge flies up to his head and makes him giddy, whereas, if it were digested and got to the heart, it would warm and refresh, yea, it would sanctify it. Eli's sons, 1 Sam. ii. 12, "knew not the Lord;" they were priests of God, yet they were "sons of Belial," and "knew not the Lord." Be not offended at great scholars, who have skill in languages, arts, and sciences. Do not say, Would such great and knowing men do thus, if things were as you say? They are not knowing men; God saith that Eli's sons did not know the Lord: the things of God are hid from them; "I thank thee, O Father, Lord of heaven and earth, that thou hast hid these things from the wise and prudent, and hast revealed them unto babes."

Obs. 6. Affected ignorance coming through distemper of heart, is no excuse, but rather an aggravation. "They did not know." It is a high degree of ingratitude not to prize God's mercy, but not to take notice of God's mercies, what a high ingratitude is this! That which shall be part of God's charge against sinners, can be no excuse of their sin. God threatens to cut people off, to have no mercy upon them, for want of knowing, as well as for not doing: "It is a people of no understanding; therefore he that made them will not have mercy on them, and he that formed them will show them no favour," Isa. xxvii. 11. Ambrose saith, Thou dost sin greatly, if thou dost contemn the riches of God's long-suffering, but thou sinnest most of all if thou dost not know it.

Graviter, O homo, peccas, si divitias
Dei longanimitatis
contemnitis, gravissimè si ignoras, Ambro.

Obs. 7. The not taking notice of and considering God's mercies, and laying them to heart, is the cause of vile and shameful evils in men's lives. Therefore they "did shamefully," therefore they "went after their lovers," because they "did not know," the cause of almost all the evil in the world is from hence. "They that know thy name will trust in thee;" those who know the Lord will fear him and his goodness. Isa. i. 4, "Ah sinful nation," saith God: God fetches a sigh under the burden of it, his spirit is laden and troubled with it. What was the matter? "The ox knoweth his owner, and the ass his master's crib, but Israel doth not know, my people doth not consider," they were more stupid than the brute creatures. O sinful soul, this is the cause of all thy inordinate walking, of all thy profaneness, of all the ungodliness in thy ways, because thou dost not know, thou dost not consider, thou dost not lay to heart the ways of God towards thee. In Jer.

ii. 5, God charges his people that they were "gone far from him;" and, verse 7, that they had "made his heritage an abomination." What is the reason given for both these? It is in the 6th verse, "Neither said they, Where is the Lord that brought us up out of the land of Egypt?" They did not take notice of what the Lord had done for them, therefore they were gone far from him. If thou hadst but a heart to consider what God has done for thee, it is impossible thou shouldst go so far off from God as thou dost. For these deductions are easy and obvious to any from such a deduction.

1. Justice, common equity, requires living to God, seeing we live by and upon God.

2. Common ingenueness calls for requiting good with good; the publicans and heathens will do good to those that do good to them.

3. If all be from God, then all still depends upon God.

4. How much good is there in God from whence all this good and mercy comes! When God shall show another day to men and angels, how he was the Fountain of all good, it will confound those who have not laid it to heart.

Obs. 8. God is more bountiful to his people than the idols can be.

The idols, by their own confession, gave them but their bread, and water, and flax, and oil, &c.; but God gave them wine, and silver, and gold. God gives better pay a great deal than the devil, yet the devil usually has more servants to follow him than God has, though his wages be less and worse. It is usual for men to get soldiers from adversaries, by giving them more pay: this is the way God takes, he offers a great deal better pay to those that will follow him, than they have that follow Satan, yet God can get few to follow him. This shows the vileness of man's heart against God.

Obs. 9. When men get abundance, they soon grow wanton.

When I gave them corn, and wine, and oil, and multiplied their silver and their gold, then they followed Baal. This is the reason of so many solemn charges of God. Take heed when thou art full, that thou dost not then forget the Lord. As they that are nearest the sun are the blackest, so those to whom God is nearest in regard of outward mercies, are many times blacker than others. It is observed, that the fatter men's bodies are, the less blood and the fewer spirits they have; so, often, the fatter men's estates are, the less spirit they have to any thing that is good; God has less spirit from them; sin has much more. We read of the sun melting the manna that fell down, but the same manna was able to bear the fire; so many a man's heart is able to bear affliction, and the affliction does him good, and prepares him for much good, as manna was prepared to be eaten by fire; but prosperity melts him, makes him useless. Many men, when they were poor and in a low condition, were very useful; but when they grow high and rich, they are of very little use in the places where they dwell. Trajan, the emperor, was wont to liken a man who had become rich, to the spleen in the body; for as the spleen grows big, the body grows less: so when men's estates grow bigger, they grow less useful. Evagrius notes it as a special commendation of Mauritius the emperor, that notwithstanding his prosperity, he retained his ancient piety: it is a very rare thing to see men advanced to high places, who preserve their former devotedness.

Obs. 10. Even those creatures that wicked men abuse to their lusts, God gives them. "Which they prepared for Baal." Though he does not give them for that end, yet those creatures which they use for such an end are given of God. If thou art a drunkard, that wine or drink which thou dost sacrifice to thy lust, who giveth it thee? does not God? Thou hast a good estate more than other men, and all the use thou makest of thy estate, is merely that it might be but as fuel for thy lusts. Who gave thee this thy estate? did not God? God gives thee clothes, and thou sacrificest them to thy pride; thou hast more money than others, and so canst vent thy malice more than others; from whence hast thou this? Thou hast more strength of body than others, and thou ventest it in uncleanness; where hadst thou this? Consider this, and let this meditation prevail with thy heart to stop thee in thy sinful way; let it be seconded with the next; namely,

Obs. 11. That it is most horrible wickedness and abominable ingratitude, for any men to take God's creatures, and abuse them against God. What! "I gave them corn and wine, and multiplied their silver and their gold," and have they prepared these for Baal? God speaks of this as of a monstrous sin, as if God should say, Let all my people lament my condition, that I should do so much for them, and they do nothing for me, but all against me, sacrifice all to Baal. Some of you have been kind to your friends, and have raised them, and made them, as we say; if these men should turn your enemies, and that estate which they have obtained by you, they should use to do you a mischief, would you not call in your neighbours and friends, to join with you in lamenting your condition? What! did you ever hear of such an example, that I should do so much for them, and they turn all against me? God does so here; he makes this his grievous complaint. This is as if a bird should be shot with an arrow whose feathers came out of her own body. We should even pity a bird in that case. Many men make no other use of their estates, but to turn them against God; they are not as the slothful servant who hid his talent in the napkin, that were not such guilt; but they take their talents and employ them against God. Would it not go to your heart if one should sue you in law, and bear the charges of the suit out of your own estate? We complain, Such a man sues me, and it is my own money with which he goes to law. So thou goest against God, and he is made as it were to bear all the charges. Is it not against the light of nature? The very heathens, publicans, and sinners will do good to those that do good to them. Thou art worse than a publican and sinner: wilt thou do hurt to God who does thee good? When Julius Cæsar saw Brutus come to give him a stab in the senate house, he cried out,

Kai ai tiron.

What thou, my son, wilt thou do it? But suppose that Julius Cæsar had given him the dagger with which he stabbed him, then, O thou, my son, what stab me with that dagger I gave thee! If, when Jonathan gave David his sword and bow, David had turned against Jonathan and killed him with his own sword and bow, would not the unkindness, or rather the abominable wickedness, have pierced deeper into his heart, than any swords or arrows possibly could? If you can find any creature that is not God's, with which to fight against him, you may do it; but if all you have is from him, it is horrible wickedness to take that, and to sacrifice it to Baal. Certainly, God gives it for other ends. To cross God's ends is an evil thing: when God aims at such a thing, for us not to join with God in the same end at which he aims, is an evil; but for us to aim at a quite contrary end, is horrible wickedness.

Obs. 12. When once superstition and idolatry have entered a place, though there be much done to oppose it, it is not easy to drive it out. Hence, God so often complains of Baal. In Judg. ii. 11, (I think that is the first place in which it is mentioned that they served Baal,) it appears that they fell off from Baal, yet they returned to him again; for in Judg. viii. 33, after Gideon's death it came to pass "that the children of Israel turned again, and went a whoring after Baalim, and made Baal-berith their god." It speaks as if it were a new thing now, that they should worship Baal after they had left worshipping him; after his death. And, 1 Sam. vii. 4, "The children of Israel did put away Baalim;" yet, if you read chap. xii. 10, they confess that they had sinned, because they had "forsaken the Lord and served Baalim;" though they had put him away before, yet he had got up again. So in 1 Kings xvi., Ahab would serve Baal; it is introduced as a novelty, because Baal had been so much suppressed. 2 Kings x., Jehu sought to destroy Baal and all his priests; but yet Baal was not so driven out, but he got in again, for 2 Kings xxiii. 4, saith, that Josiah, who was long after that time, caused the vessels that were made for Baal to be taken away and burnt.

This is seasonable for our times. If superstition be opposed, though it be cast out, as we think, in a great degree, yet, if there be not a thorough reformation, it will wind in one way or other again. If we think it enough to cut things short, and to take away their strength, and their enormities, we deceive ourselves; they will grow up again; it is but cutting the weeds a little; if branch and root be not taken away, Baal will rear up his head one way or other.

Cluverus, a late historian, yet much approved, saith, that one gave this counsel concerning Rome, when it was much annoyed with wolves; "There is no way to save Rome from wolves, but to cut down the woods wherein these wolves breed and live, for otherwise you may kill, but they will breed again." So certainly, this is the way to destroy superstition from amongst us, to take away the places and revenues of those men that have been maintainers and upholders of superstitious ways of worship. Let us, by cutting down the woods, destroy these wolves.

Ver. 9. Therefore will I return, and take away my corn in the time thereof, and my wine in the season thereof, and will recover my wool and my flax given to cover her nakedness.

In the former verse, Israel is accused for abusing her silver and gold in the service of Baal; now it follows, "Therefore I will take away my corn in the time thereof:" if there be a "therefore," we must inquire wherefore it was; "because they did prepare their corn," &c. for Baal.

Let us inquire, 1. What is the meaning of returning. 2. What the meaning of the time and season thereof, "and take away my corn in the time thereof, and my wine in the season thereof." 3. What that phrase imports, "I will recover my wool," &c.

1. For the first, "Therefore will I return," that is, I will change the way of my administrations toward them; I will go out of my way of merey, and turn into my way of judgment, I will go back again. I was in a way of judgment toward them, and they cried to me, and I turned into a way of merey; but I will go back again into a way of judgment, "I will return." Montanus remarks, Whereas God has heretofore bid them not to be afraid of all the tokens of the soothsayers; that is, when they saw by astrology some signs of death which might follow, they were afraid; Be not afraid, saith the Lord, but know your corn, and wine, and oil depend on me, not on second causes; though second causes make against you, yet fear not, for I will give you corn, and wine, and oil; but now it is quite contrary, though second causes promise all kind of plenty, so that there shall be abundance of corn, and wine, and oil, yet I will take away your plenty, there shall be a dearth of all things amongst you.

2. "I will take away my corn in the time thereof;" that is, first, in the time of harvest, just when their corn is to be gathered; and in the time of their vintage, I will then take it away; whereas I might take it away in the seed, I will let it grow till the harvest, and then take it away. 2. In the time when they have most need of it, when they are in the greatest straits, and know not what to do without these creatures. 3. In tempore suo, so some, in the time I have appointed, though I have let them go on and enjoy the creatures in abundance, yet my time is come that I will take away all.

3. "And will recover;" the word הוֹשִׁיעַ signifies, I will snatch it away, I will spoil you of it; and it has reference to two things.

First, I will recover it as out of the hands of usurpers; you have my corn, and wool, and flax, as usurpers, but I will recover them out of your hands: as a man that has his goods usurped by others, by some means recovers them; so, saith God, you have my corn and wine, and, as you have carried the matter, you are but usurpers, I will sue you for them, you shall not enjoy them long.

Secondly, "I will recover;" it has a reference to prisoners and bond-slaves; when the enemy gets any of our soldiers into their power, and makes them bond-slaves, a greater power goes against the enemy, and recovers them out of his hands; as Abraham recovered Lot and his goods, Gen. xiv. Or, as if mariners should recover those galley-slaves the Turks have taken. And as if God should say, These creatures of corn, and wine, &c., are in bondage, and I will recover them out of your hands. You know the creatures groan under their bondage while they are in the possession of wicked men. My creatures are in bondage to you, and they cry to me, and I will recover them out of your hands, Rom. viii. 22. There are many precious truths to be presented to you out of the words.

Obs. 1. Though God gives mercy out of free grace without cause in ourselves, yet he takes not away mercy without cause; there is a "therefore" for taking away mercy, but we have many mercies given without a "therefore." When God takes away mercy we have cause to look into ourselves to find out a "therefore;" but for thousands of mercies which God gives to us, you shall find never a "therefore" for them. It is not so great a wonder that thousands are in misery, as that any one enjoys mercy, for misery has a "therefore" in ourselves, for mercy there is reason only in the breast of God.

Obs. 2. Sin causes God to change the way of his administrations towards his people. Though God walk in the ways of mercy, yet sin may put him out of those ways, and make him return to a way of judgment again. How much better were it for sinners to return, than that sin should cause God to return! O sinner, return out of thy evil ways; if God return, it will be a sad return. Not long since God was in ways of judgment against us, and lately he has come into ways of mercy, and now he seems to return again to his former ways of judgment. Jer. xiv. 9 asks, "Why shouldst thou be as a man astonished?" A man astonished stands still; or if he moves, it is up and down, as if he knew not which way to go. Though we have suffered hard things, we cannot yet say, God is returned, but he seems as a man astonished, that knows not which way to go. Thus God is pleased to speak of himself after the manner of men. Let us cry to him that he may not turn out of his way of mercy into those sad ways of wrath to which he seems looking.

Obs. 3. Abuse of mercy causes the removing of mercy. "Woe to the idol shepherd that leaveth the flock! the sword shall be upon his arm, and upon his right eye: his arm shall be clean dried up, and his right eye shall be utterly darkened," Zech. xi. 17. Has God given a right hand any abilities? take heed God does not strike that right hand: or right eye, any quickness of parts? take heed that, through abuse, it be not put out. How many shepherds, when they were young, had many excellent parts, great abilities, but, having abused them to their lusts, God has taken them away! So in children, there is no such way to lose your children as to abuse them; if your hearts be inordinately set upon them, God takes them away. I will relate a remarkable providence concerning this; and the rather, because I was an eye and ear witness of it, living not far from the place. A godly man desired his friends to meet and bless God for a plentiful harvest. After dinner was over a very lovely little child came in; Ah, said the father, I am afraid I shall make a god of this child. By and by the child was missing, and when they went to look for him, he was found drowned in a pond. Consider this, ye parents, who have your hearts inordinately set on your children.

Obs. 4. God keeps the propriety of all that we have. "I will take away my corn, and my wine, and my wool, and my flax." Mark, in the former verse, they said they were their own; now, God challenges them for his. Here we have "my," "my," "my," repeated on God's side, as often as before it was on theirs. Though God gives all, yet he keeps the propriety of all in his own hand. God has a greater propriety in our estates than any prince in the world has. Subjects have propriety in their estates, and enjoy them with as true a right as their sovereigns; but no creature has any propriety in what it has, compared to God. Not only what we have, but what we do, and what we are, is all God's; yea, says Luther, Even our thanksgiving to God for gifts is a gift of God; it is therefore a very vile thing to attribute to ourselves what is his. When God has enriched us, we add this odious phrase, I have done it, I have done it. By this you may see they are not your goods which you abuse. It is a great argument to be bountiful and liberal for good uses, because what we have is God's. "For all things come of thee, and of thine own have we given thee," 1 Chron. xxix. 14. David thought not much of his bounty towards the temple, because all was God's.

Obs. 5. The taking away the good things which we enjoy, is a means of making us return to God. "Therefore I will take away." "Therefore" has not only reference to the abuse of them, but to the 7th verse, "And she shall follow after her lovers, but shall not overtake them," &c.: "then shall she say, I will go and return to my first husband; for then was it better with me than now." God makes this a means of working that frame of spirit in them of returning to their first husband. It is a special means to convince us of sin, when God comes with some special providence against us. Some real expression of God's displeasure works more upon us than when we merely hear the threat. You that are tradesmen, and run into debt, and your creditors tell you they will come upon you, yet you go on, till the bailiff comes into your house, and takes away your bed from under you, and all your goods. When you see all go, then you think of your negligence, and then the husband and wife wring their hands. So, though God threaten you for the abuse of the creature, that he will take it away, yet you are not sensible of it till God indeed takes away all, and then conscience begins to awake and fly in your face. When David saw God taking away his people, then his heart smote him for numbering them; he was told of the evil of his way before by Joab, but he went on in it. When Samuel prayed for rain in wheat harvest, and there came thundering and lightning, then "the people feared exceedingly," and acknowledged their sin in asking a king. Those who have abused their estates in these times, when the enemy comes, what gratings of conscience will they have! Then these thoughts will arise, Have I used my estate for God? have I done what I might have done? have I not satisfied my lusts with those things which God has now taken from me? There is usually a grating of conscience for the abuse of any thing when God takes it away. When God takes away a wife, if the husband has any tenderness of conscience, his first thoughts are, Have I performed the duties of my relation to my wife as I ought? have I not neglected my duty towards her? When he takes away a child, Have I done my duty to this child? have I prayed for it, and instructed it, as I ought? This causes sad thoughts.

Gratiarum actio, ipsa confessio donum est acceptum, quanto magis ipsa dona. Luther. Postquam accepisti, tunc sumus hanc edidimus particulam addimus, ego feci. II.

Obs. 6. There is an uncertainty in all things in the world; though they promise fair, yet they are ready to fail us when they promise most. "I will take away rye corn in the time thereof, and my wine in the season thereof." A husbandman who has a good seed-time, promises much to himself; it comes up and thrives, and yet at harvest it is all blasted. Hab. iii. 17, "Though the labour of the olive shall fail," the phrase is, Though the labour of the olive shall fail, "shall lie;" that is, the olive promised fair, it grew up, and looked very fair, and ripened; but it did lie, that is, it did not perform what it seemed to promise, for in the time thereof it vanished and came to nought. I had certain information from a reverend minister, of a singular work of God this way. In his own town there was a worldling who had a great crop of corn; a good honest neighbour walking by his corn, said, Neighbour, you have a very fine crop of corn, if God bless it. Yea, saith he, speaking contemptuously, I will have a good crop; and before he could get it into the barn, it was blasted, so that the whole crop was not worth sixpence. Here we see the uncertainty of the creature in the time thereof, when it seems to promise never so fair, when we are ready to take it into the barn, it depends on God, as well as when it is under the clods. Oh the blessedness of God's servants, who are sure of their good for time to come! We may promise ourselves certainty, even for the future, in the things of Christ; but temporal things are never sure, no, not when men have them in their hands. Many things fall out between the cup and lip, as we have it in the proverb.

Obs. 7. God often shows his displeasure to those who provoke him, when they are at the greatest height of prosperity. When affliction seems to be farthest off from them, then it comes heaviest upon them; when they think least of it, when they think all sure, then God visits them with his displeasure, when it is most bitter to them; for that is the strength of the point, he will not only take them away in the time thereof, but when the affliction shall be most grievous to them. Job saith, chap. xx. 22, "In the fulness of his sufficiency he shall be in straits." A man may seem to have sufficiency of the creature, and may have his fulness of sufficiency, yet God saith, he shall be in straits in the fulness of his sufficiency. I give you another admirable work of providence to illustrate this very thing; it came from that worthy divine, Doctor Preston, and happened in the town where he was born. There was a man who of a long time had no child, but when God gave him one, at the weaning of it he called his friends and neighbours to rejoice with him for this great mercy; and while the nurse was dandling the child, the point of a knife which she had placed in her bosom ran into its bowels, when all his friends were about him to rejoice with him. When men think the bitterness of death to be past, (as Agag did,) the curse of God comes on them. "While the meat was yet in their mouths, the wrath of God came upon them." Psal. lxxviii. 30, 31.

Pope John XXII. said, he knew by the position of the stars that he should live a long time, and boasted that he could east his nativity; and the same night, by the fall of a chamber which he had newly built for his solace, he was slain. I have heard credibly reported, that a drunken fellow in an inn was swearing most dreadfully, and one came in and said, Sir, what if you should die now? He replied, I shall never die; and going down-stairs from his chamber, he fell down and broke his neck.

When Bibulus, a Roman, was riding in triumph in all his glory, a tile fell from a house in the street, and killed him. As, on the contrary, God's ways and dealings with the saints are such, that when their condition is most dark and gloomy, he comes with mercy to them; so, when the wicked are in the height of their prosperity, God smites them. When "the iron entered into" Joseph's "soul," God delivered him. When the apostle "had the sentence of death" in himself, God comforted him, 2 Cor. i. 9. When Abraham was lifting up his hand to slay Isaac, the angel of the Lord stayed his hand. As it is observed in nature, that a little before day-break it is darkest, so a little before the happiness of God's people, there are some great afflictions. "At evening-time it shall be light," Zech. xiv. 7.

Obs. 8. When men abuse mercies, they forfeit their right in those mercies, they are then only usurpers. "I will recover my wool," &c. They are not usurpers merely for the use of mercies, but for their abuse; they are not charged for their right to use them, but for their not using them aright: there is great difference between these two.

It has been taught by many, that all wicked men have no right at all to use any creature, but are to answer as usurpers before God. But certainly there is a mistake. It is certain, man has forfeited all, but God has given a right by donation to all that they enjoy in a lawful way. They have not such a right as the saints have, a right in Christ; once in Christ, we may challenge of God all things that are good for us. Another man has right; but how? When a malefactor is condemned to die for his offence, he has forfeited all his estate, and all the benefit of a subject. But if the king be pleased out of his bounty to allow him provision for a day or two, till the time of execution, he cannot be challenged as a usurper, for that which he has, he has it by donation: such a right all wicked men have; they are under the sentence of condemnation, and have forfeited their right, and all the good of the creature, only the Lord is pleased, out of his bounty, to give them such and such enjoyments, they shall have such houses and such lands for a time, till the day of execution comes.

This might daunt the hearts of wicked men: You look upon yourselves as great men, you have your shops full, you have large estates; you are like some malefactors, who have a better supper before execution than others. But, still, your not using them aright may make you usurpers before God. You command your servant to buy certain commodities; suppose your servant run away with your money, do you not follow him as a thief? you trust him with a stock, to keep such markets, he has right to use your estate for you, but if he run away with your estate, and use it against you, if you meet with him again you will say, What a thief are you to run away with your master's estate, and abuse it against him! "I will recover my wool," &c.

Obs. 9. All the time the creature serves wicked men, it is in bondage, and God looks upon it with pity. God has made all things for his own praise. He gives the children of men many mercies, but for his own glory; when therefore these creatures which were given for the glory of God, are abused to thy lust, the creature groans under thee. Thou drinkest wine, but the creature groans under thy abuse; never any galley slave groaned more under the bondage of the Turks, than thy wine and thy dishes on thy table groaned under thy abuse, Rom. viii. 22. As God hears the cry of the widow and fatherless, so he hears the groans of the creature.

Cornelius à Lapede states, that a famous preacher, showing this bondage of the creature, brings in the creatures complaining thus: Oh that we could serve such as are godly! Oh that our substance and our flesh might be incorporated into godly people, that so we might rise into glory! but if our flesh be incorporated into the flesh of sinners, we shall go to hell; and would any creature go to hell? The very creatures shall be in hell eternally which wicked men consume on their lusts, being incorporated into their bodies. The creature one day will have a kind of revenge upon ungodly men, and divers think that hell will be a turning all creatures into a chaos, into a confusion again, as at the first, and the wicked put into that, and so tormented there; there shall not be an annihilation, but God shall take away all the beauty, comfort, and glory of the creature, and whatever shall be for the torment of ungodly men shall abide; and so they shall be tormented eternally by the very creatures which they abuse.

As in such a building as this, there are stones and mortar, and the art of man puts a beauty upon them; but suppose all the art of man were taken away from this building in an instant, what would become of us then? it would bury us in its rubbish; now it is useful and delightful, but if the art were taken away, it would be our destruction. So the creatures of God, which God suffers wicked men to enjoy, have much of God's wisdom, power, and goodness in them; but God will take away all his wisdom, beauty, and goodness, so that nothing but the confusion and rubbish of the creature shall be upon the wicked to all eternity.

Obs. 10. God gives his blessings to us, not for luxury, but for necessity. "I will recover my wool and my flax given to cover her nakedness." Ἄρτον ἐπιούσιον. Therefore when our Saviour teaches us to pray, it is for daily bread, or bread which is for our substance; so much bread as serves for our substance, and that but for a day. Most are abusive in their desires after and use of the creature, they look at luxury rather than necessity. As Cyriar observes, It is not the heat of their clothes, non calor, but color, the colour, is rather regarded by many. God expects now, especially, that we should cut off our superfluities, when our brethren want necessities.

"To cover her nakedness." Our nakedness needs a covering. Sin has made nakedness shameful. Hence, our bodies are called vile bodies; those bodies that we study so much to pamper and adorn, are bodies of vileness, as the apostle speaks, Phil. iii. 21; yea, of that vileness, with an article, or of the vileness: to be proud of our clothes that cover our nakedness is an unreasonable thing. Would you have your bodies adorned? labour for godliness, and then you shall have bodies like the glorious body of Jesus Christ; you will then have bodies that shall not finally need a covering.

Obs. 11. When abundance is abused, it is just with God that we should want necessities. "I will take away my corn," &c. How many are there who have lavished out their estates, upon whom you may see God's judgment so grievous that they want a piece of bread! You often tell your wasting servants, they will be glad of an earnest before they die; it proves true often of masters and mistresses also, who, out of pride and delicacy of spirit, will be so fine and live above their rank, that God blasts them that they have not to cover their nakedness. Those who had gorgeous and splendid attire, are threatened with "baldness," and "a girding with sackcloth," Isa. iii. 24; and such as come to misery by their wasting superfluity have none to pity them.

Alfonfus, king of Spain, when a knight, fell into want, and being arrested for debt, a petition was sent to the king to succour him: Yes, replied the king, if he had spent his estate in my service, or in that of the commonwealth, it were reasonable he should be provided for by me, or by the commonwealth, but seeing he has spent all in riotousness, let him suffer.

Consider this, you who are so loth to part with your estates for the public good; you murmur at every thing required of you for that, but you are profuse in expenses for your lust; God has ways to bring you low enough in your estates.

Ver. 10. And now will I discover her lewdness in the sight of her lovers, and none shall deliver her out of mine hand.

"And now," that is, when I recover my wool and flax, "I will discover her lewdness;" I will take their coverings from their own eyes, and from the eyes of others. Wicked men, and especially idolaters, have divers coverings for their lewdness. These people had three.

The first was their outward prosperity: Do you speak so bitterly against us, as if we were idolaters, as if we had forsaken God? are we not in as good a condition as Judah, who you say has not forsaken God?

Secondly, their external worship, in that they yet retained something according to God's mind, they yet kept the sabbath and some solemn days according to the law, in this covering they rested; as if they should say, Why do you accuse us as if we did not worship the true God? have not we God's service with us, and our solemn assemblies?

Thirdly, they had other services which were not God's, yet they covered them with pompous days of solemnity, pretended for God; but being of their own invention, they were hateful. Well, saith God, I will take away your prosperity, and I will take away those things in which you think to put me off, I will take away your solemnities, and all the pomp in your services.

"I will discover their lewdness." The word נְבִלָה lewdness, comes from נבל which signifies to fall; it intimates the falling of the spirit to low, poor, vile, and unworthy things. Hence the Hebrews use it for a fool; one that has a vile spirit, set upon base, contemptible things, is Nabal, a fool. Hence that speech of Abigail concerning her husband, As is his name, so is he; he is Nabal, and folly is with him. The Seventy translate this by another word, which signifies uncleanness, the mixture of their ἡκαθάρσια.

spirits with vile things that make them unclean. The English word lewd, comes from loed, an old Saxon word, which signifies one that is of a servile disposition. Some are of servile spirits naturally, they are born to a kind of servility; they are inclined to baseness and vileness by their natural genius: others are of more sublime spirits naturally, as if they were born for great things: these people are lewd, they have vile spirits, forsaking the blessed God and his glorious ways, turning to vanities that can do no good. So we say of many, they are lewd, base fellows, that is, they are of such sordid dispositions, that they seek only after such things as have no worth in them, and satisfy themselves with things beneath the excellency of a man, unseemly in a rational creature to take content. The Greek word in Acts xviii. 10, translated lewdness, ῥαδιόβρυσια, elegantly sets forth the disposition of a lewd man, namely, one easily drawn to any wicked way.

"I will discover her lewdness in the sight of her lovers." "In the sight;" this is a great aggravation of their shame. God will discover them, not before those who are strangers, but those before whom they would be honoured. Calvin's remark seems to reach the meaning of the Holy Ghost, alluding to harlots who have favourites with princes at the court for their lovers; they rest on their power, and confide on their greatness, and care not what their husbands can do against them.

I will take away their confidence, though their lovers, the Assyrians and Egyptians, be never so great, they shall have no power to help you, but I will discover your lewdness before their face. From hence take these observations.

Obs. 1. All wickedness, and especially idolatry, has many covers. Except we look very narrowly to those who are superstitious and idolatrous, we shall not see the evil of that sin. Some covers are subtly woven, but it may be said of them all, as Isa. xxviii. 20, "The bed is shorter than that a man can stretch himself on it, and the covering narrower than that he can wrap himself in it."

First, Prosperity in a sinful way is a great cover. This glitters in so many men's eyes, that the filth of sin is hid; many a foul hand is under a fair, perfumed glove; an ill complexion may have a painted face, and prosperity is no other to wicked men than a painted face to a foul woman. As a painted face is no argument of a fair complexion, so neither is prosperity, of a good condition. Crooked and diseased bodies may have fine clothes. Green leaves on a tree may hide the rifts, the mosses, and blackness of the body which appears in winter. Many men are abominably false in their ways, cruel and bloody in their hearts against God and good men, their spirits are envenomed, they have given up themselves to most horrible sins; yet so long as they have power about them, all is covered: were all their prosperity taken from them, and all their glory and greatness, and nothing but their falsehood and hatred of the ways of God appeared, what dreadful creatures they would be!

Secondly, Retaining some truths in worship is a great cover to much falseness. When some wicked persons have to pay a great sum, they shuffle in a counterfeit sixpence or shilling, or a light piece of gold: so some, though they retain many errors, yet because they keep some truths, think to cover much superstition. False wares will be helpen off amongst good, and a man accustomed to falsehood will sometimes tell some truths to put off a lie. A man that is a base self-seeker will often deny himself; the proudest spirits are as crouching and subject to their superiors as any, and so by seeming humility cover a great deal of pride. So the evil of ceremonies, and false discipline, pass without much contradiction: You must not trouble yourself about these things; have not we as wholesome, soul-saving doctrine as any church in the world? Because of this the corruption of the other is covered. Much hypocrisy is covered under excellent gifts; the gifts are gifts of God's Spirit, but they often cover much vileness.

Thirdly, Outward, pompous devotion in God's worship is a great colour of notorious idolatry. Gilded crosses, painted churches, pompous ceremonies, have covered the most desperate hatred to the power of godliness.

Obs. 2. God has a time to discover wickedness. "I will discover thy lewdness," it shall appear one day in its colours! Vile and abominable wickedness shall not always go uncovered. God will not discover her infirmities, neither should we; we should do as God does, discover the lewdness of men, but not their infirmities. Love covers a multitude of faults, if they be but infirmities. And when you discover the lewdness of others, take heed you do not discover your own lewdness at the same time. Many who discover the lewdness of other men, manifest such bitterness of spirit, and such rejoicing that they have obtained an advantage against those who are religious, that, whether true or false they care not, they relate it confidently. This is for men to discover their own lewdness, when they cry out against the lewdness of others. Those who are wise and discerning are able easily to see it; but if we would not have God discover our lewdness, let us get such a cover as shall never be uncovered. You may have many expedients to cover your sins that are not large enough, but I will tell you of a cover amply sufficient to cover all. What is that? The righteousness of Jesus Christ. "Blessed is he whose transgression is forgiven, whose sin is covered," Psal. xxxii. 1. That is a cover which hides from the eyes of God and man for ever.

Obs. 3. When God discovers men's lewdness, they shall do little hurt. "I will discover her lewdness in the sight of her lovers." I will take such a way to manifest her vile lewdness before her lovers, that she shall neither prevail with them, nor be upheld by them. "But they shall proceed no further: for their folly shall be manifest unto all men," 2 Tim. iii. 9. There are many men who have secretly gained on the spirits of others by fair pretences, that they seek nothing but the public good, and desire only the furtherance of the gospel; but when opportunity serves, their intentions are discovered to go another way than their words seem to import, and then they shall proceed no further, for they shall be vile and contemptible in the eyes of those with whom they prevailed before.

Obs. 4. When God sets himself against his enemies, he will go through his work in the face of all those that seek the contrary. "In the sight of her lovers." God needs no tricks or devices to carry on his work, but he can carry it on in the sight of his adversaries, and shame them in the sight of their lovers, and bring them down. God can make use of the wisdom and policy of men, nor less of their indiscretion. The great works of God amongst us of late have been carried on with a high hand, in the sight of those who have been our adversaries: what discoveries have there been of the filth of men! how has their nakedness been made naked! what changes in their conditions! what contempt has God cast in the face of those who were the great champions for lewdness, and that in the very face of their lovers! Their lovers looked on them, there was little or no change in their hearts, which were as eager for them as ever, yet their shame has been discovered.

Obs. 5. Dishonour before those from whom we expect honour, is a sad and great evil. "In the sight of her lovers." Oh, said Saul, honour me before the people, 1 Sam. xv. 30. Saul cared not much if he were dishonoured before strangers, but he would be honoured before his own people. It is such a disgraceful thing to be dishonoured before those by whom we would be honoured, that the stronger a man's spirit is, the more intolerable is the burden: one of a mean and low spirit cares not much for dishonour any where, but a man of elevated spirit counts it the worst thing that can happen, to be dishonoured before those that love him. Many tradesmen who are modest at home are lewd among strangers. Those who love God and the saints, are most afraid to have their evil discovered before God and the saints, for a gracious heart desires honour from them most. A godly man can bear any contemptuous abuse from the profane, rather than from one that is godly. Wicked men care not for dishonour among the saints, because they care not for their love. If dishonour before lovers be such a shame, what will dishonour before God at the great day be, and before the saints, and wicked men too who were your lovers!

Obs. 6. Carnal friends esteem men when they are in prosperity, but when they are in adversity they contemn them. "I will discover her lewdness in the sight of her lovers." When I take away their corn, and wine, and flax, and these things, their lovers will be ashamed of them. When huntsmen would single out a deer, they shoot her first, and as soon as the blood appears, all the rest go out of her company, and push her from them. It is so with carnal friends, if a man is in affliction, if they see their friend shot, they look aloof from him. We have had woeful experience of this formerly; when many godly ministers were persecuted, those who before seemed to be their lovers, grew strange unto them. When the sun shines, men that pass by look on a dial; but in a dark, stormy day, a hundred may ride by it and never look at it. When we are in a sun-shine day of prosperity, men will look towards us; but if the gloomy day of adversity come, then they pass by without regard to us. If a man of fashion come to a house, the dogs will be quiet; but when a beggar comes in rags, they fly upon him. It is apparent, that men in their prosperity are not regarded for any thing in themselves, but for their prosperity's sake, for their money's sake, for their clothes' sake. Suppose when you go to a friend's house, and your servant accompany you, if all the respect and kindness shown to you were only for your servant's sake, you would take it ill. This is all the respect that men have from false lovers, it is not for any good in them, it is for their prosperity, for their servant's sake. Oh how vain is respect from the world! If you be gracious, God will not deal with you thus; if you have your estates taken from you, God will not despise you as carnal friends do. "For he hath not despised nor abhorred the affliction of the afflicted." Psal. xxxi. 24. When the saints are afflicted, God does not hide his face from them, but when they cry to him he hears them.

Obs. 7. Carnal hearts have much confidence in many things in which they trust; in time of danger they will not believe but they shall escape. "None shall deliver her out of my hand." Let us not be troubled at the confidence of our enemies; they expect to prevail; this is from the curse of God upon them; their case is never so desperate, but they have something to shelter themselves in their own thoughts. Oh what a shame is it that any thing is rather trusted in than God! The husbandman casts seed-corn, that costs dearer than other corn, into the ground. The merchant trusts all his estate to the winds and waves of the sea, and if they fail, all is gone. You trust servants with matters of weight. If you go to Westminster, you trust your lives in a boat half an inch thick. God is not trusted so much; that blessed God, who is the only true object of soul-confidence.

Obs. 8. Lastly, when God sets himself against a generation of men, or any individual, all the means in the world shall not help. The prophet Ezekiel (chap. ix.) had a vision of six men with weapons of war in their hands; there were six principal gates in Jerusalem, and God would set these six men with weapons in their hands at each gate, that if they run to this, or the other, or any gate, the man with the weapon in his hand should be sure to take them, they should not escape. "Seek him that maketh the seven stars and Orion," Amos v. 8; why are these named, "the seven stars and Orion?" the one is the extreme of cold, and the other of heat. The Lord has the power of both: if they escape the heat, the cold shall take them; if the cold, the heat shall destroy them; and I, likewise, saith the Lord, can make both these helpful to you as I please. Hence there is such blasting of means, for the cursing of those whom God opposes; let us not be afraid, though our adversaries have great assistance, they are in God's hand, and none can deliver out of his hand; all their great strength is but as tow or flax before the flame of fire. "There is none that can deliver out of my hand: I will work, and who shall let it?" Isa. xliii. 13. Wherefore it is a fearful thing to fall into the hand of God when he is in a way of wrath, and it is a blessed thing to be in his hand when he is in a way of mercy. Christ holds the stars, not only ministers, but all his elect, in his hand, and none can take them out. In the time of the massacre at Paris, a poor man for his deliverance crept into a hole, and when he was there a spider wove a cobweb before the hole. When the officers came to search for him, one observed, Certainly he is got into that hole. No, said another, he cannot be there, for there is a cobweb over the place; and by this means the poor man was preserved. The hope of the wicked, Job saith, chap. viii. 14, is as the spider's web; yet, if God please, he can make a cobweb to deliver his people. The least things shall deliver when he will, and the greatest means of deliverance shall not deliver when he pleases.

Ver. 11. I will also cause all her mirth to cease, her feast days, her new moons, and her sabbaths, and all her solemn feasts.

In this verse we have a sore threat against Israel, for it is in part spiritual.

"Her mirth," מְנוּחָהּ ἐμφοροσύνας, Sept. The word signifies the right temper and posture of the mind; when the mind is in a right frame, then it may be merry; Whosoever is merry, let him sing, James v. 13; the word, though not the same, signifies the same thing; whoever has his mind in a εὐθυμεία right frame, let him sing.

"I will cause all her mirth," God many times takes away from his saints much of the matter of their mirth, but never takes away all. This is a dreadful threat, to cause all their mirth to cease.

"I will cause it to cease." I will turn it away, ἀποστρέψω, Sept. I can soon have all their mirth down, they shall never be able to rejoice more if I please; it is gone with the turn of a hand. It appears that Israel, though an apostatizing people, designed to dreadful judgments, yet were a merry, jocund people, they went on still in their mirth and joviality.

That which is here implied, is more fully expressed in Amos, chap. vi. 4—6, who was contemporary with Hosea, and, like Hosea, he was the prophet of the ten tribes: see there how Amos sets forth the mirth of this people; "That lie upon beds of ivory, and stretch themselves upon their couches, and eat the lambs out of the flock, and the calves out of the midst of the stall; that chant to the sound of the viol, and invent to themselves instruments of music, like David; that drink wine in bowls, and anoint themselves with the chief ointments." This was their condition when they were under such fearful guilt, and in such dreadful danger. Sensual men, while they prosper, look upon themselves as above the word, and bless themselves in satisfying their own carnal desires, as if it were but a poor, low, and mean thing for them to fear sin and threatenings. Come, say they, let us sing away all care, let us live merrily, let us take our pleasure for the present, and crown ourselves with rose-buds. This is the disposition of carnal hearts under all their guilt and danger. They swim delightfully in that river of Jordan, and suddenly fall into the Dead Sea; they spend their days in pleasure, and in a moment go down into hell. This is all the portion of their cup which they receive from the Lord. They have a little joy here, this is all they are like to have, and therefore they will take their fill of what they have. But this will not hold, I will cause this mirth to cease.

Obs. 1. Sin and mirth can never hold long together; there must be a separation between them. The union between sin and mirth at any time is a forced union; God never joins them together; and if you will join those things that God never joined, your joining cannot hold: sin is of such a canker-fretting nature, that it will soon fret out all the varnish of mirth and joy upon it. If you will not take away sin from your mirth, God will take away mirth from your sin. It is the happiness of the saints that they shall have everlasting joy; the "pleasures at God's right hand" are "for evermore," but the pleasures of sin must cease.

Obs. 2. When afflictions come upon the wicked they are all dejected, their joy and mirth are gone. We say of fire, it congregates things of the same kind, and separates things that are of diverse kinds. So the fire of affliction congregates things of the same nature, as sin, horror, trouble, anguish, sorrow, vexation, accusation of conscience, condemnation; these are of the same kind; sin and these are homogeneal: now, when affliction comes, it congregates all these: you sin, but sorrow, anguish, and horror of conscience seem now not to unite with your sin; but when the fire of affliction comes, it joins all these together. On the other side, sin, and joy, prosperity, and peace, these are heterogeneous things of another kind; now when the fire of affliction comes, it separates these heterogeneous things; then the hearts of the wicked sink as lead, they lie down in sorrow, the candle of the wicked is blown out, all their mirth and joy are but the light of a candle, affliction makes all to be but as a snuff. When affliction comes, ungodly men have the poorest spirits of any men, they quickly die, they succumb, they fall down under the least weight of affliction; they seem to outbrave the word of God, but they have mean and low spirits when they bear God's hand upon them; affliction takes away all that they conceive and understand good. There is nothing within them to support them, but darkness and blackness; nothing but guilt and the gnawings of the worm: they look upon every suffering they endure but as the beginning of eternal suffering; and the venom and curse of God go with their affliction, which drinks up their spirits.

Oh the happy advantage which the saints have in their afflictions above the wicked! They have spirits that may well be called brave spirits, which can stand under the greatest weight of affliction, and with joy in the midst of them. Paul can rejoice in tribulation, yea, and glory in it too. They have comfort in the creature, but they are not beholden to the creature for comfort; they depend not upon the creature, their joy is a great deal higher: that is precious light indeed, that no storm can blow out. See an example of a brave spirit, that in the midst of affliction can have the light of joy, Hab. iii. 17, 18: "Although the fig tree shall not blossom, neither shall fruit be in the vines; the labour of the olive shall fail, and the fields shall yield no meat; the flock shall be cut off from the fold, and there shall be no herd in the stalls." what then? "yet I will rejoice in the Lord, I will joy in the God of my salvation." Perhaps in times of affliction they may abate somewhat of their outward joy, but all their mirth shall not cease, there shall be joy within, though none without.

Obs. 3. All our mirth depends upon God, he can take it away when he pleases. "I will cause all their mirth to cease." God is called in Scripture, "The God of all consolation." Joy is God's propriety, he gives it when he will, and takes it away when he will. "Give them sorrow of heart, thy curse unto them," Lam. iii. 65. Mark, the word מַנְתָּה translated sorrow, comes from one which signifies a helmet, or a shield to fence off any thing, or to cover a thing, as a thing is covered by a shield and helmet; and it notes to us that disease which physicians call cardiaca passio, a disease whereby the heart is so oppressed, and there is such a stopping, that it is, as it were, covered sicut scuto, as with a shield, to keep out all things that should comfort the spirits: let the most precious cordials in the world be given to those who have that disease, they cannot be refreshed by any of them; and so the heart is at last suffocated with sorrow. This is the meaning of the word here, Lord, "give them sorrow of heart," put them in such a condition, that their hearts may be so stopped and stifled with sorrow, that whatever means shall be used to bring any comfort to them, no creature in the world may be able to afford the least refreshment. They were wont to shield and fence off thy word, which contains the treasures of thy mercies, and they heard the sweet promises of the gospel opened, yet they fenced off thy word as with a shield; now, when they are in affliction, let there be such a fence put upon their hearts, that though there be never so many promises brought to them, they may be fenced off by thy secret curse. We find many wretches who have lived under the gospel, and resisted the treasures of mercies when opened to them, who in affliction have been in horrible desperation, and whenever any comforts of the gospel have been presented to them, they have ingeniously fenced them off. Those who read the story of Spira, will wonder what cunning he possessed to fence off all comfort that was brought to him. This was from the Lord. Lord, "give them sorrow of heart," that is, Lord, put such a shield upon their hearts, as all comfort may be fenced off from them.

We see, my brethren, how we depend upon God for comfort; we all cry for comfort, let us know our dependence upon God for it; God can fence our hearts from comfort when he pleases, let us take heed we do not fence off his word from our hearts.

"I will cause all her mirth to cease, her feast days." These two are put together; for the hearts of men, when they enjoy a more liberal use of the creature than ordinary, and are amongst cheerful company, are warmed, raised, and inflamed. If the heart of a man be gracious, and he feasts in a gracious way, his heart is warmed and cheered, and enlarged in things that are good; so the hearts of the wicked, when they are at their feasts, their lusts are warmed, and their spirits are raised and strengthened in things that are evil. You have a notable example of cheering and raising the hearts of men in good things, in the time of the feast that Hezekiah made for the people of Jerusalem in that great passover, they "kept the feast of unleavened bread seven days with great gladness: the whole assembly took counsel to keep other seven days: and they kept other seven days with gladness," 2 Chron. xxx. 21, 23. Now mark how their hearts were raised mightily by this; chap. xxxi. 1, "Now when all this was finished, all Israel that were present went out to the cities of Judah, and brake the images in pieces, and cut down the groves, and threw down the high places and the altars out of all Judah and Benjamin, in Ephraim also and Manasseh, until they had utterly destroyed them all." Their feasts being in a gracious way, their hearts were so inflamed that now they took upon them a mighty courage in doing great things for God.

It were well if it were always so with us when God calls us to feasting, that our hearts were always warmed and enlarged to do much good. That has been the honour of this city, that in their companies feasting yearly, they were wont when their hearts were up, to consult together what good to do for the countries in which they were born, and then to resolve to send the preaching of the word to one great town, and to another town. This was a gracious feasting, and for this they were much envied. And though these feasts were prohibited upon other pretences, yet the hindering this good done at those times, lay at the bottom of that prohibition.

Feasting also warms the lusts and desperately inflames the wicked resolutions of ungodly men. When a company of ungodly men get together in a tavern, and there have drunk and eat liberally, how desperately are they set against the ways of godliness! then they scorn and jeer godly ministers, and parliament, and Christians: when their lusts are heated by wine and good cheer, they are then as if they were above God, their tongues are their own, and who shall control them? Mark that Scripture, Psal. xxxv. 16, "With hypocritical mockers in feasts, they gnashed upon me with their teeth." Here is scorning and violence, gnashing upon the psalmist with their teeth, and this at their feasts. Hos. vii. 5, "In the day of our king the princes have made him sick with bottles of wine: he stretched out his hand with scornors." They brought bottles of wine, and when his lusts were heated with the wine and good cheer, he joined with them in scorning the ways and worship of God; they scorned at all those that would go up to Jerusalem to worship according to the institution, These must be so precise that they will not join with us, as if we had not the worship of God among us; they tell tales to Jeroboam, and the other princes, of the godly who would not yield to their idolatrous ways of worship: now, saith the text, the king "stretched out his hand with scornors;" takes them by the hand, and encourages them, and tells them he will take a course with them, not one of them shall be suffered to live in his dominions.

But God has a time to take away feasting times from a people, a time when those who have delighted themselves so in the use of the creatures, shall have all those merry meetings cease, never feast more, never meet with such merry company more. As Pope Adrian said, when he was dying, O my soul, whither art thou going? Thou shalt never be merry any more.

For kingdoms also, though there be times for feasting, yet there is a time of mourning; and God seems this day to be coming to us to take away our feasts, to call upon us to spend our time in another way. It were good for us to do what we can to prevent God by voluntarily humbling ourselves, to take away our own feasts, and to change our festivities into humiliations. The times call for fasting now, rather than feasting; and it is a most dreadful sin for men to give liberty to themselves for feasting, when God calls for mourning and fasting. You are not at liberty to feast when you will.

Isa. xxii. 12—14, might make the hearts of those who are guilty of this tremble: "And in that day did the Lord God of hosts call to weeping, and to mourning, and to baldness, and to girding with sackcloth: and behold joy and gladness, slaying oxen, and killing sheep, eating flesh, and drinking wine: let us eat and drink; for to-morrow we shall die. Surely this iniquity shall not be purged from you till ye die, saith the Lord God of hosts." While the bread is taken away from our brethren, and the land is miserably spoiled, and when such a black cloud hangs over our heads, there is no time for festivities. Whatever your customs have been, at the time now approaching, (I mean that which you call your Christmas festivity,) you are certainly bound to turn it into a time of mourning. For if we should grant it lawful for men to appoint holy days for feasting, yet certainly it cannot but be sinful, so to set those days apart, that whatever providence of God happens they must be observed. You will all grant this, that if it be lawful to keep this time of festivity, yet that God has not set it apart and enjoined it. We never have it required by Christ or by his apostles, that at the beginning of the year we should have days of festivity. Well then, at the most, if we suppose it lawful, it is but the institution of man: if it be man's institution, then it must give way to God's work, to providence. For man to put so much upon his institution, because he has appointed such a day at the commencement of the year for rejoicing, that whatever providence happens that calls for humiliation and fasting, yet he will hold to his own institution; what is this, my brethren, but to make the commandments of God to be of none effect through man's traditions? It is the commandment of God now, that you should mourn and fast; if then, because of man's institution, you put by the command of God, and spend time in feasting and rejoicing, which ought to be only when God shines upon a kingdom in ways of mercy, know this is sin unto you. If you can say that God shines upon us now in present extraordinary mercies, then we may feast. I confess they are extraordinary mercies in regard of what we may hope to be the event and effect of them; but for the present administrations of God towards us, they are such as, if ever they called for fasting, they call for it at this day. Therefore, by God's works amongst us, we know we have God's will revealed to us, namely, to fast; the other, at most, is but man's institution and tradition. Now the traditions of men must yield to the commandments of God.

With what conscience now can you take such a plentiful use of the creature, and suffer your brethren to want clothes and bread? If God have granted you such a comfortable estate that you have so much to spare as to feast, know you are bound in conscience to lay that out in relieving your brethren who have been so cruelly used; therefore God brings them to you to be objects of your compassion. It would be very acceptable to God, if so much as any of you have usually spent in feasting, or intended to spend in these twelve days, you would set it apart for the relief of those who want bread, and set the time apart also for mourning in your families, that God would pardon the sin of these times. And now, not only feasts in private families should cease, but the feasts of companies in your public halls likewise.

What abundance of poor plundered people might be relieved, if all that were spent in one year in the feasts of your companies were laid aside for their use! These are times for mercy, not for festivity; if we will not cease our feasting, let us know, God has thousands of ways to take away feasts from a kingdom, and to bring "cleanness of teeth" among us: I will take away their feasts, saith the Lord.

The main thing in this verse to be opened to you is, what these feasts of the Jews were.

The words here are מנוחה feasts, and מנוחה solemn feasts; they are both in your English translated feasts, but the words in the Hebrew differ much, the first comes from a word that signifies to rejoice and leap, the second from a word that signifies a stated, a settled time; our English word feast is derived from the Greek iesia, the goddess which the Latins call Vesta, the goddess both of the earth and of fire.

The Jews had their civil feasts, and their holy feasts. Amongst their holy feasts, some were of God's appointment, and some of their own. Of God's appointment, some were more solemn, some less.

Their civil feasts were times wherein they took a more liberal use of the creature, in rejoicing one with another upon some special occasion, this they called a good day, not a holy day; Esth. viii. 17, "The Jews had joy and gladness, a feast and a good day." It will appear by examining that text, that though the day was appointed to be kept every year, yet it was but as a good day to them, and could not be said to be a holy-day; we do not read of any religious solemn exercise that they had for the day. Such a day I take to be our fifth of November, a good day, not a holy-day, wherein we have a more liberal use of the creature than at other times, and remember the mercies of God with thanksgiving. But we know the day is not set apart for this end, so that it is unlawful to be exercised in any other thing.

Their religious feasts, which they presumed themselves to make holy, were their feasts, rather than God's; for that, you have the example of Jeroboam, he appointed a feast of his own head, which the prophet speaks of, 1 Kings xii. 32, 33, "And Jeroboam ordained a feast in the eighth month, on the fifteenth day of the month, like unto the feast that is in Judah. So he offered upon the altar which he had made in Beth-el the fifteenth day of the eighth month, even in the month which he had devised of his own heart; and ordained a feast unto the children of Israel." Mark here, Jeroboam is rebuked for appointing a feast of his own heart, like the feast God had appointed; this is no excuse, that he would be an imitator of God. This reason, many think, will justify their superstitious way, they do but imitate what God did; as thus, God had an ephod for the priests, therefore they will have a holy garment; God had a temple consecrated, they will have one so too; God had his feast days and holy-days, they will have theirs too in imitation of God. This very thing that Jeroboam did, he is rebuked for, that he would set up something as God did.

Where God has set his stamp upon any thing, we must take heed we presume not to set our own stamp. Suppose any one should take a piece of silver, and stamp it as near as he can like the king's coin. The silver is his own; well, but he is examined, Why did you thus? What hurt, saith he, is there in it? I have done no more than the king did; why, may we not follow his example? Will this answer, think you, serve his turn? It is as much as his life is worth. Just such a plea is this, they will do such and such things in God's worship; why? God has done so before, and they do but imitate God; there is as much strength in the one as in the other. Therefore that word "devised" in the Hebrew comes from a word that signifies to lie, Jeroboam did lie. So in Isa. xlv. 25, "That frustrateth the tokens of the liars." Jeroboam, in setting this day apart, did it under a pretence to honour and worship God; but though it might seem to make God's honour and worship better than before, yet the Scripture puts the lie upon it. I think this was the reason he set it apart in the eighth month; the feast of tabernacles was the fifteenth day of the seventh month; now he would not alter the day, but have it the same day that God appointed, but in the eighth month. The feast of tabernacles was appointed to praise God for the in-gathering of the fruits of the earth. It was as upon our September; now, upon the fifteenth of September, perhaps, all the produce was not gathered in, therefore Jeroboam might have this device, he would stay till every thing was gathered into their barns and their vessels, and was fit to eat and to drink; then saith Jeroboam, Now is the time to praise God; you praised God before when you were taking in the fruits, you could not use them, but now having them all in, and being able to make use of them, now is the time to praise God. This was Jeroboam's wisdom, by which he thought to make a feast to please the people, rather than God's feast. There are no superstitious men but will have some plea to induce the hearts of people to embrace their ways, rather than God's simple, plain, and pure ordinances. But though Jeroboam did it under this pretence, yet he lied; so, those men who will take upon them to sanctify days, or places, or garments, or any vesture, that God never did, though they say they do it for God's honour, to make God's worship more glorious and decent, yet it is a lie. Just as those who will make images, brave, golden images of God, O, say they, it is for the honour of God; but mark what is said, Hab. ii. 18, "What profiteth the graven image that the maker thereof hath graven it; the molten image and a teacher of lies?" If images be laymen's books, they are books that have abundance of errata in them, they are full of lies.

Now arises the question, whether there may be holy feasts (taken so in a proper sense) by man's appointment? Jeroboam is accused of it plainly: and in Gal. iv. 10, 11, there is a very severe charge upon the Galatians, "Ye observe days, and months, and times, and years. I am afraid of you, lest I have bestowed upon you labour in vain." It appears by this, that people's hearts were mightily set upon their feasts, their days, and months, and years, they were loth to be taken off from them; so that the apostle speaks with bitterness of spirit, "I am afraid of you, lest I have bestowed upon you labour in vain." And indeed when godly ministers take pains amongst people whose hearts are set upon such things as these, for the most part they lose their labour, little good is done.

Yes, some will say, to observe the Jewish days after they were abolished by God, was sinful and dangerous, but we do not keep Jewish days. But mark what these men say, God abolishes his own, and yet they think he gives liberty to man to set up others. If upon God's abolishing his own, men have liberty to set up theirs, then Christians are under a more heavy bondage, and grievous pedagogy, than ever the Jews were, for it is better to have a hundred days of God's appointing, than one of man's, and more honourable. Further, if God appoint, there needs no scruple, as if man appoint: yea, if God appoint, we may expect a special blessing, and efficacy, and presence of God; we cannot expect such things in man's appointment. Now, if when God has taken away Jewish ceremonies and days, man might lawfully appoint others as he pleases, we may pray to God with good reason to bring us under the bondage of the law again, rather than to be thus under man's power.

Thus far we grant, that upon any special work of God, the revolution of the year naturally reminds of it; and so far as it is natural, it is good, I may make use of it. Therefore, I dare not say that it is altogether unlawful at such times to have some outward rejoicing, when God does not call for mourning some other way (except the argument from the extraordinary abuse there has been of it may be of force). Nay, that there may be advantage taken of the people's leisure, to preach the word and to hear sermons upon such days, we deny not. We know that Christ was in the porch of the temple at the feast of dedication, which was one of the days of their own appointing, not that he was there to countenance or honour the feast, but because he had been there before, at another feast of God's appointment. Now there being a multitude of people at that time also gathered together, he took advantage of the concourse, to come to the outer porch to preach to them. So much therefore as we may grant, we will not deny.

For the right understanding of setting apart days, I suppose these two things will be questioned.

First, Why may not governors of the church set apart days, as well as appoint times for preaching; or as well as others who appoint such times, as once a week so much time set apart for a lecture?

Secondly, We may appoint fast days, and days of thanksgiving, these are set apart by man: how happens it that a man may appoint a time for preaching constantly once a week, and he may appoint times of fasting, and days of thanksgiving, and yet not have this liberty, to make a day that may properly be called a holy-day?

We must clear that point from this objection, or else we do nothing; and for the clearing this we must know there is a great deal of difference in these three things, the right understanding of which will clear all the matter:

Between the deputation, and the dedication, or sanctification of a thing.

I may depute a creature to be used to help me in holy things, and yet this creature is not sanctified by its deputation: and so for a lecture, such an hour in such a day is deputed, but the time is not made holy by it; the place is deputed, but is not made holy by it. Yea, I will appoint such a garment when I am in such a service such a day to wear, but yet the garment is not made holy by it. A creature is not made holy merely by being used at a holy exercise, or in a holy thing. As thus, suppose I read the holy Scripture, I make use of a candle to read it by, I do not make the candle holy by this. If the using of a creature in a holy duty did make the creature holy, then it would be the same in all creatures. I use the very light of the air when I am reading and speaking holy things in public assemblies, but I do not make the light and air holy because I use them in holy things; so I use this hour to preach in, though I use it in a holy duty, I make it no further holy than a man does his spectacles that he reads the Scripture by. A deputation is this, when such a creature as I shall think most commodious for such a service, shall be set apart for such a service; or when such a creature as I use for such a service, will be a natural and useful help to me, to appoint it for that service upon that ground.

The second is dedication, that is, when I give a thing out of my own power for a pious use, so that I cannot use it for any thing again. As when a man has given so much of his estate to build a school or an hospital, it may be said to be a kind of dedication; he has devoted, given away, so much of his estate to that end, so that he cannot make use of it for another purpose. Now we do not so set apart the time of preaching, as that we cannot use this time for any other end, we may, as we see cause, alter it, where it is from nine to eleven we make it from two to four; whereas, if it were a thing that we had dedicated, that is, given out of our own power, then it cannot be changed by us. That is a second degree.

Now sanctification is beyond dedication, that is, when any creature or time is so set apart for holy things, as it must not be used in any thing but that which is holy; and though the same holy actions be done at another time, and with the use of another creature, they shall not be accounted so holy as at this time, and when this creature was used. Sanctification is the setting apart of any day which God gives me to use for my ordinary avocations, and so to devote it for such a business that it may not, without sin to me, whatever happens, be used for any other occasion. And, secondly, when I have set it apart, if I so exalt it, as if the same holy actions performed at another time, shall not be accounted as holy as at this time, although that time has as much natural fitness in it, then I sanctify a time to myself; but this I cannot do without sin. There are two things in all holy feasts, and, indeed, in all things which are accounted holy. First, it was a sin for them to use that time for any other thing, or in any other way, than God had appointed. Secondly, the actions they did at that time were such as were more acceptable to God than if they had done the same things at another time. Yea, it was so in their very days of humiliation. The day of expiation must not be used for any thing else; if they humbled themselves or fasted upon another day, that would not have been so acceptable to God as upon this day. So in all superstitions of men, when they set apart either days, or places, or things, they put these two upon them. As for places, they say we may appoint a place for people to meet in a religious way. Yes, but it becomes superstitious, first, when it is so set apart, as I shall make conscience of using it for no other purpose. Secondly, when I am persued in my conscience, that God accepts the service in this place better than in any other, though as decent as this. So for superstitious garments. You say, May not ministers be decent? I have heard a great doctor give this argument for a surplice: Sometimes I ride abroad to preach, and my cloak is dirty, is it fit for me to come into a pulpit with a dirty garment? and therefore there is always appointed somewhat to cover it; it is decent. Suppose it be so, but if this garment must be used only for such a holy exercise; and, secondly, if I think the wearing of it honours the service, and that God accepts the service performed in such a garment rather than in another; this is superstition: as in one place in Suffolk, when that garment was lost, there was a strict injunction to the poor countrymen that there might not be any service or sermon till they had got another; for which they were appointed ten days, and this being upon a Friday, there were two sabbaths without any service; therefore it is apparent they put the acceptance of the duty upon it. So for days, if any man set apart a day, so that his conscience condemn him before God as sinning against him if he do any thing upon that day but such holy duties; secondly, that though the same holy duties be done upon another day, they shall not be accounted so acceptable to God as done upon that day; this is superstitious. Yet, certainly, of this nature have many of our days been, for if you opened your shops what disturbance was there in the city! it was profaning the day, every proctor had power given him to molest you. Did not they also account it a greater honour to God to have service read that day than to have it read upon an ordinary Tuesday or Thursday? yea, preaching upon a lecture day that was not one of their holy-days, they accounted not so acceptable to God as upon one of them. Here comes their institution, which puts more upon it than God does, and thus it becomes sinful. So if you set apart the time you call Christmas, so as to make conscience of not doing any other service or work on that day, and think that to remember Christ, and to bless God for Christ, upon another day, is not so acceptable to God as to do it upon this day, here is the evil of man's instituting days.

Well, but this is not cleared except we answer another objection: Do not the king and parliament command days of fasting and of thanksgiving, and are not they of the same nature? Will not you say it is sin for us to open shops upon these days? I answer, our days for fasting and thanksgiving have not those two ingredients in them, for, first, if God by his providence call any individual to special business in his family, then he need not have his conscience condemn him though he spend all that day in that business. They may set apart a day to be spent publicly, yet with this limitation, not to enjoin every individual, that to whatever God's providence specially calls him, he must leave off all, and make as much conscience of doing this as upon the Lord's day.

You will say, Upon the Lord's day, if any thing extraordinary happen, we may go a journey, or transact business, as a physician may ride up and down, works of mercy may be done, therefore this makes no difference between God's day and these of man's appointment. I answer, though a physician do a work of mercy upon the sabbath day, yet he is bound to do it with a sabbath day's heart; whatever calls him from those services that are God's immediate worship, he sins against God if he follow it as the business of his calling, as upon another day; but if he do it with a sabbath day's frame of heart, as a work of mercy, he keeps the sabbath in that. But if there were a necessity to ride upon a fast day, a man's conscience need not to condemn him before God, if he went about that work as the work of his calling. It is not therefore so deci-cated, but God's providence may oblige us to do other civil actions, and that as the works of our calling. Secondly, neither is it so sanctified, as if the same works done on another day were not so acceptable to God as when done upon this day. Our fast days are fixed for the last Wednesday of the month, but to think that the work done upon another day were not so acceptable to God as done upon that day, is to sanctify the day, and such a sanctification is sin. The same answer may be given for days of thanksgiving.

Besides, there is another thing to be considered, that is, in stating the time. Though men may thus depute and appoint days to worship God, yet they cannot state any such days, but as God's providence permits, according to the present occasion. Therefore it would be a sin for a state to appoint nominally a day for religious fasting: God did so, but men have no power to do so, because they do not know but God may call them to rejoicing upon that day, they have not knowledge of the times. All that we can do is this, when God calls us to fasting, we must appoint days of fasting; when God calls us to rejoicing, we must appoint days of rejoicing. Therefore to appoint the time of Lent as a religious fast is sinful, and the statute itself threatens a mulct upon that man who shall call it a religious fast: stated fasts, which are not limited by Providence, are certainly evil. The monthly fasts now enjoined, if we should say we will have them once a month till this day twelvemonths, or two years, I persuade myself the state should sin; but to have it as long as God's hand is upon us, as long as the occasion lasts, and God's providence calls us to it, is justifiable.

Our brethren in Scotland wholly deny the appointment, both of stated fasts and feasts: nay, they will scarce agree to the monthly fasting we have, because they are so loth to yield to any stata jejunia. King James once made a speech in Scotland, in which he blessed God that he was born in such a time, and was a member of such a church; the reason he gave was this: The church of Scotland exceeds in this all other churches. England, though it has pure doctrine, has not pure discipline; other reformed churches have pure doctrine and discipline, but they retain the observation of many holy-days; but the church of Scotland has pure doctrine and discipline, and keeps no holy-days, and therefore it is a purer church than any in the world.

Thus I have endeavoured to show you how far things may be set apart, and how far not, when it becomes a sin for any one to sanctify a day. By this we may see what a mercy it is to be delivered from those men who have robbed the kingdom of many days, and put many superstitious respects upon them, and so have involved us in much guilt; bless God for delivering us from them, and for those days in which God gives us liberty to exercise ourselves in his worship. Thus much for those feasts called their feasts, that were of their own appointment.

"Her new moons." The ordinance of God in the new moons, is in Numb. xxviii. 11, "And in the beginning of your" new moons, or "months, ye shall offer a burnt offering unto the Lord," &c. It was God's ordinance, that the Jews at the beginning of every month, when they had a new moon, should keep that day holy to God. That which the Latins call the calends, were their new moons.

The holy solemnity of these days consisted in three things.

First, The offerings that were there appointed by God particularly for that time, were many and chargeable; two young bullocks and one ram, seven lambs of the first year without spot; besides their flour and oil for their drink-offerings, and one kid of the goats for a sin-offering.

Secondly, At these times they were wont to repair to the prophets for instruction, to know the mind of God. The husband of the Shunammite said to his wife, "Wherefore wilt thou go to him to-day? it is neither new moon, nor sabbath," 2 Kings iv. 23: if it were new moon or sabbath, you might go, but since it is neither, why will you go? That implies, that to repair to the prophets for instruction, and to hear God's word from them, upon those days was common among the Jews.

Thirdly, It was unlawful to buy and sell upon those days. Amos viii. 5, "When will the new moon be gone that we may sell corn?" they were weary of it, it seems, because they might not buy and sell in it.

Buxtorf, who describes the Jewish customs, relates three other things they were wont to do in their new moons.

1. Those who were most devout among them, set the day apart for fasting and prayer, to entreat God to bless the new moon to them.

2. As soon as there was an appearance of the new moon, one steps up, and cries, O thou Creator of the moon, be ever blessed,* and so he goes on in blessing God for this creature.

3. They used to leap and to reach toward the moon as soon as they saw it, speaking after this manner: We, stretching to the moon, cannot reach it; so all our enemies that aim at us, are as unable to reach us to our hurt, as we that †

But why did God appoint this feast of the new moon? It was appointed for these four ends.

(1.) Because God would be acknowledged to have the government of all inferior things in the world, and especially of all the changes of times. As the sabbath was to put us in mind of God's creating the world, so the new moons were appointed for them to bless God for the government of the world. Many nations have attributed much of the government of the world to the moon; the tides, you know, ebb and flow according to the moon, the great works of God in the seas seem to be governed by God in the use of that creature; yea, things seem to be governed more sensibly by this creature than by others: that they might not rest therefore in the creature, but give God the glory, he appointed the feasts of the new moon; if they had any changes of times and seasons, God caused it, rather than this creature. As the heathens called the moon "the queen of heaven," so did Israel; and would not be hindered from offering cakes to her, because they attributed all their prosperity to her, Jer. xlv. 17—19. Now from this God would take them off, therefore he appointed this solemn feast of the new moon.

(2.) God would hereby teach, that the bringing of any light unto us after darkness is merely from himself, and he must be acknowledged in it. The moon is a glorious creature, and causes much light; but soon after there is darkness, and after this darkness light springs up again: this is the work of God. We are taught a moral lesson from this feast; that is, has God at any time brought darkness upon a kingdom, or upon a family, or an individual? does he begin to bring light? he must be acknowledged and praised for it.

(3.) God would teach them, also, that the beginnings of all mercies are to be dedicated to him. When God renews a mercy, at the very first, before it comes to perfection, it is to be given up unto God; they were to celebrate this feast upon the beginning of the light of the moon.

iniquant, nos te versus subsilientes attingere non possumus, sic hostes nostri omnes nos ad malum attingere nobisque nocere non poterunt. Buxtorf. Synag. Judaica. c. 17.

* Benedictus esto Conditor tuus, O luna, benedictus esto Dominus tuus.

† Ter subsiliant caelum versus quod, quanto sublimius possunt tanto melius est, lunamque alloquentes, quemadmodum,

(4.) This aimed at Christ, as all other ceremonies of the law did. It pointed out our condition in our depending upon Christ; for our light must be renewed by our conjunction with Jesus Christ, who is the Sun of righteousness; as the light of the moon is renewed by her conjunction with the sun, that gives the great light to the world. And as the light of the moon increases as it takes it from the sun, so our light increases as we take it from the Sun of righteousness. Thus this feast was typical, and thus we see these feasts were of special use.

But when they abused these feasts, God said, I will take them away, you shall have no more; and therefore God professes a loathing of their feasts, and, amongst others, of their new moons, Isa. i. 14. Not but that they were holy in themselves, but when they abused them, by adding their own superstitious vanities, or by not observing the due end for which God appointed them, then God is offended. Now, saith God, you acknowledge darkness and light to be from me, and change of time to be from me, but what use do you make of your time? You seem to give up the mercies you receive to me, but you do not honour me with them, nor for them.

You seem to think of the Messias in these things, but your hearts are not with him, all your ways are after your lusts. I loathe your feasts. Just as when a man comes to God, and prays devoutly, Lord, lead me not into temptation; and as soon as he has done, immediately goes into wicked company. God loathes you for going quite cross to your prayers. You pray, Lord, give us this day our daily bread; as if you said, Lord, I depend upon thee every day for my bread, and for a blessing upon all my outward estate; and as soon as you have done, you overreach, and cheat, and go to Satan for your bread: God loathes these prayers of yours, as God loathed their new moons, because when he appointed such worship for those ends, yet they went quite contrary.

Yet there are two things very observable about these new moons. We often read these things, but pass them over and but little mind them.

1. God will have the glory of his creature, of the new moon, and that solemnly, yet it must be at that time when the moon is very little. God does not ask to be glorified in that creature when it is fullest of glory; but when it is, as we may say, in the meanest condition, when it exhibits but little light, scarce any at all, then God will be glorified. This is the instruction and moral lesson from hence, which is no strained one, but I think intended by God himself, in appointing this feast; in that God will have the glory due to him from this creature in the beginning of its light, rather than at any other time. We are taught in this,

Obs. That there is much danger when we are giving God the glory of the creature, of resting in the creature, and not passing through the creature speedily to God. God is very jealous of his glory this way. God has made many glorious creatures, and he would have us give due esteem to them all; but when we esteem them for any excellency, God is jealous lest any of his glory should rest in the creature, therefore he calls for it at the time when the creature is most mean. That is the reason why God's ordinances are so plain, we have but plain bread, and plain wine, and a plain table, and no pompous attire, because God saw that when we are to deal with him spiritually, if we had pompous things we should rest in them. We see men so attracted with pompous things, that they give not God that glory which is due to him, but honour the creature rather than God. It seems that the heathens who made the moon to be their goddess, looked at it when it was most light, as appears, Job xxxi; therefore Job, to clear himself from that idolatry, saith, ver. 26, "If I beheld the sun when it shined, or the moon walking in brightness." They used to worship the moon when they saw it "walking in brightness;" because they could not reach the moon, they kissed their hand, and bowed to it in acknowledgment of a deity; therefore, Job would free himself from worshipping this creature. When the creature is most glorious, there is danger of giving God the less. It is thus with us; God has often more glory from us when our estates are small, than when they are very great: many a man, when he has been in full light of prosperity, never minded God, but when God brought him into darkness, he gave God glory; and then it has been most acceptable, because then he sees God's hand helping him without the creature. God had most glory from the moon when it had the least light, so God may have glory from us though our light be extinguished.

2. There is yet another remarkable thing concerning this feast. You observe what difference there is between the feasts of the new moons by God's appointment under the law, and the feasts of the new moons as they are set forth to us in Ezekiel. Those chapters in Ezekiel from the fortieth and so on, though they seem to speak of the Jews' ceremonies, and temple, and feasts; yet their scope is to describe the glorious condition of the church of God in the time of the gospel; as in Isa. lvi. 23, "And it shall come to pass, that from one new moon to another, and from one sabbath to another, shall all flesh come to worship me, saith the Lord;" that is, their constant worship shall be in comparison as a sabbath, and they shall not only worship me at the beginning of the moon, but at all times, it shall be full and constant: therefore, though Ezekiel there speaks of new moons and other feasts, yet it is to set out the condition and blessed state of the times of the gospel under those shadows and types, according to the phraseology of the Jews. This being granted, let us compare the institution of the feast of the new moon, in Numb. xxviii., with what is said in Ezek. xlvi. In Numb. xxviii. they were to offer for a burnt-offering, two bullocks, one ram, and seven lambs; but in Ezek. xlvi. 6, in the days of the new moon, there should be but one bullock and six lambs. God himself had said, that in their new moons they should offer two bullocks and seven lambs; yet when the prophet sets out a more glorious condition of the church, they must not offer so much as they did before, but one bullock and six lambs. What are we taught from this? Two excellent lessons, which are the reason of the difference.

First, that there is a blessed state of the gospel coming, which shall not be subject to such changes as heretofore, but a more settled condition of peace and rest; so that they shall not have the same occasion to bless God for his providence in the changes of times as before they had. Their solemnity of the new moon, was to do that spiritual thing in a ceremonial way, that is, to give God the glory for the change of times: but in the times of the gospel, they shall not have so many sacrifices, to make it such a solemn business. Why? Because the church shall be in a condition of more rest and safety, and more constancy in their ways, not hurried up and down by men's humours, and lusts, and will, as before.

Secondly, as the state of the gospel shall not be so subject to danger as it was before, there shall not be that occasion to bless God for bringing light immediately after darkness. After it had been dark a long time, and they could not see the moon, as if that creature had been lost out of heaven, when they saw it again they were to bless God for it: but in the time of the gospel that is coming, there shall be no such darkness; this time, however, is not yet come, we have need of our seven lambs and two bullocks, for we have much darkness.

"And her sabbaths." Plutarch thought that the sabbath of the Jews was from Sabbos, a name of Bacchus, that signifies, to live jovially and merrily. Indeed, the sabbaths which many keep may have such a derivation; their sabbaths are sabbaths of Bacchus, to be merry, and to eat, and drink, and play, is the end of them all.

But the word has a better root. God would have us upon the sabbath rest from all other works, that we may be free to converse with him; therefore it is so much the more inexcusable if, when we have nothing else to do, we shall refuse to converse with God as he requires of us. If a friend came to your house to converse with you, and he should know you have no business to take up your time, yet you will scarce see him, or spend a little time with him, will he not take it ill? If, indeed, you had an excuse that your business was extraordinary, it would not be so ill taken; but when he knows you have nothing to do, and yet you refuse time to converse with him, will not this be taken for slighting him? Thus you deal with God: had you indeed great business to transact upon that day, though you did not converse with God in holy duties, God might accept of mercy rather than sacrifice. But when he appoints you a day to rest, wherein you have nothing to do but to converse with him, yet then to deny it, is a slighting the majesty of God.

Now the Jews had divers sabbaths; amongst others, these were principal ones, the sabbaths of days, and the sabbaths of years.

The sabbaths of days. Every seventh day they had a sabbath, and it was kept unto the Lord. Now this feast of theirs had somewhat in it memorative, somewhat significative, and somewhat figurative. It was a memorial, a sign, and a figure.

First, it was memorative; a memorial of two things:

1. Of the work of God's creation. After God had finished his works of creation, then he rested, and sanctified the seventh day. Psal. xlii. is appointed for the sabbath, the argument of it, is the celebrating the memorial of God's great works.

2. Of their deliverance out of Egypt, in remembrance of the rest that God gave them from their bondage. "Remember that thou wast a servant in the land of Egypt, and that the Lord thy God brought thee out thence through a mighty hand and by a stretched out arm: therefore the Lord thy God commanded thee to keep the sabbath day," Deut. v. 15.

Secondly, it was significative, a sign. Exod. xxxi. 17, "It is a sign between me and the children of Israel for ever:" and ver. 13, "It is a sign between me and you, that I am the Lord that doth sanctify you." God made it a sign, that as this day was by his command to be sanctified, set apart from other days, so God had set apart this nation of the Jews from other nations.

Thirdly, it was figurative, it prefigured or typified the rest that remained for the people of God. Heb. iv. 9, "There remaineth therefore a rest to the people of God," both here, in the time of the gospel, and in heaven eternally.

Now there was some speciality in this day of rest, in this sabbath of the Jews, more than in any other sabbath. As,

(1.) In the antiquity of it. It was the most ancient of all the days set apart for any holy use, being from the time of the creation.

(2.) It was written with God's own finger in the tables.

(3.) God rained no manna upon this day, and that even before the law was given in Mount Sinai for the honour of this day.

(4.) The whole week takes denomination from the sabbath. Luke xviii. 12, "I fast twice in the week," δύς τοῦ σαββάτου, twice a sabbath. So Mark xvi. 2, "The first day of the week," the first of sabbaths, ἡ ἡμέρα σαββάτου.

(5.) This sabbath is called an everlasting covenant by way of eminency, as if nothing of God's covenant were kept if this were not. Exod. xxxi. 16, "Ye shall keep the sabbath for a perpetual covenant."

(6.) Yea, God puts a remembrance upon this day, and not upon any other sabbath. If a friend who would fain converse with you, send to you a week beforehand, saying, I pray think of that day, I will come to you then and converse with you, we will enjoy communion together; now, if when he comes he find you employed in unnecessary businesses, will he take it well? God does so with you: I desire to converse with your souls, and I appoint you a day, think of it, remember that day, that you and I may be together, and converse sweetly one with another: if God find you then occupied in unnecessary businesses, he will not take it well.

This sabbath the Jews rejoiced much in, and blessed God for it, Neh. ix. 14, as a great mercy. Philo Judæus, speaking of the fourth commandment, saith, It is a famous precept, and profitable to excite all kind of virtue and piety. The Hebrews say we must sanctify the sabbath at its coming in and going out, and bless God who gave it to us. Yea, it is called by some of the Hebrews, the very desire of days. Drusius tells of a Jew, who, when the sabbath day approached, was wont to put on his best clothes, saying, Come, my spouse, &c., as being glad of that day, as a bridegroom of his spouse. It is not my work to handle the point of the sabbath day, or Lord's day now, but to open it as we have it here in the text, to show what kind of sabbath the Jews had. Only observe this one thing about this sabbath; if you compare Numb. xxviii. 9, with Ezek. xli. 4, you find that the offerings in the time of the gospel, were more than those in the time of the law. In Numbers, you find but two lambs; but in Ezekiel, six lambs and a ram, for the sabbath. This by way of type shows, that in the settled times of the gospel, God's worship upon the Christian sabbath should be solemnized more fully than it was in the time of the law.

The next is, the sabbaths of years, and they were of two sorts. There was one to be kept every seven years, and another every seven times seven, every fiftieth year. Every seventh year there was a rest of the land; as every seventh day there was a rest of the labour of their bodies: Exod. xxiii. 10, 11, "Six years thou shalt sow thy land, and shalt gather in the fruits thereof; but the seventh year thou shalt let it rest and lie still;" they must not prune their vines, nor gather their vintage. The sabbath of days signified that they themselves were the Lord's, therefore they ceased from their own labours. But the sabbath of years, the resting of the land signified that the land was the Lord's, at his disposal, and that they were to depend upon the providence of God for their food in the land. When they ploughed, and when they sowed, and gathered in the fruits, God would dispose the land as he pleased.

And we must acknowledge, for that is the moral of it to ourselves, that all lands are the Lord's, and the fruit that we enjoy from the land is at his disposing. If any man ask, What should we eat that seventh year? seeing they might not plough, nor sow, nor reap, neither have vintage, nor harvest; the Lord answers them, Lev. xxv. 21, "I will command my blessing upon you in the sixth year, and it shall bring forth fruit for three years." God, you see, will not have any to be losers by his service. Let us trust God then, though perhaps you have now one year in which you have no trading. People cry out, Oh this twelvemonth we have had no trading in the city! we can get no rent out of the country! Do not murmur, trust God; it may be God has been before-hand with many of you, you have had full trading formerly which may preserve you comfortably now. If not before, trust God for the next: the Jews were to trust God every seventh year, they had nothing coming in for one year in seven. If once in all your lifetime God takes away your trading upon an extraordinary occasion, do not murmur, do not give less to the poor: I speak to those whom God has blessed in former years, so as that they are not only able to subsist, but to give too: "Beware that there be not a thought in thy wicked heart, saying, The seventh year, the year of release, is at hand; and thine eye be evil against thy poor brother, and thou givest him nought; and he cry unto the Lord against thee, and it be sin unto thee," Deut. xv. 9. If a poor company of distressed and plundered people come to you and desire your help, because you have not such a full income as you were wont to have in your trading, you refuse to relieve them, if they cry unto God against you, it will be sin unto you.

Quartum præceptum egregium præceptum, et ad omnem virtutem excitandum utile pietatem vero præcipue.

This rest of the land was also to put them in mind that there was a time coming when God will free them from labour. Now they were fain to eat their bread in the sweat of their brows, but God would supply them once in seven years, without the sweat of their brows in tilling the land, showing, that there was a time wherein God would bring his people to such a rest, that they should have full supply of all things without labour.

The second thing in this seventh year was, all debts that their brethren owed to them were to be released. Deut. xv. 2, it is called there, "the Lord's release;" the Lord is merciful to those that are in debt. God knows what a grievous burden it is for his people to be in debt; rich men, who are full-handed, do not understand what a burden it is to be in debt to every man they deal with; they cannot sleep quietly, they can have but little joy and comfort in their lives, the burden is so grievous. Now God, in mercy to his people, that they might not all their days go under such a burden, and so have little joy of their lives, granted this favour to them, that once in seven years their debts were to be released. But it was the debt of a Hebrew, Deut. xv. 12; foreigners' debts they were not bound to release. By that we are to learn, that there should be more pity and commiseration shown to those who are our brethren in the flesh, or in the Lord, with respect to their debts, than others. There is a complaint that many of the godly have little care and conscience in paying their debts; the justness of that complaint I know not, but there may be slothfulness, if not unfaithfulness, and if there be carelessness and unfaithfulness in some, it is enough to cast an aspersion upon all. Though those who are godly should be more careful to pay their debts than others, yet if you see them godly and laborious in their calling, and the providence of God only prevent, and not any negligence of theirs, it must be a vile and wicked heart that would take advantage of their being godly, to oppress them; no, you are bound to show them much commiseration. Beware there be not an evil heart in thee, to be less merciful to thy poor brother because of the seventh year's rest of the ground, or because the debt was to be released that seventh year: but "thou shalt surely give him, and thy heart shall not be grieved when thou givest unto him; because for this thing the Lord thy God shall bless thee in all thy works, and in all that thou puttest thy hand unto," Deut. xv. 10. Notwithstanding there must be a cessation of ploughing, and sowing, and vintage, in the seventh year, yea, notwithstanding they were bound to release their debt in the seventh year, yet they must do this, and not do it grudgingly; they must not murmur and say, Does God require of us that we must neither plough nor sow, and that we must release our debts, and give too, nay, and give, and not have our hearts grieved too, that we must not complain of this? O my brethren, God loves exceedingly cheerful givers, and hearts enlarged with bowels of compassion, not hearts grumbling and objecting against giving. Many men have no quickness of understanding in any thing else but against works of mercy; how quick are they in their objections, and find such subtle ways to save their purses, that we are astonished! Against this there is a solemn charge, Deut. xv. 11, "Thou shalt open thine hand wide unto thy brother, to thy poor, and to the needy, in thy land."

The third thing to be done once in seven years was the release of servants, they too must go free, and they must not be sent away empty neither: "It shall not seem hard unto thee, when thou sendest him away free from thee," Deut. xv. 18; you must give them liberty, as ver. 14. It is true, we are not bound to the letter, every seven years to do thus, but there is a moral equity in it; when servants have done you faithful service, you must not think that it is enough that you give them meat, and drink, and clothes, but you must be careful of your servants how they should live after they are gone from you. This was the first sabbath of years.

But the second was the most famous, and that was the rest that was every seven times seven years, the fiftieth year, which was called the year of jubilee, from the trumpet by which they were wont to proclaim that year, which, as the Jews tell us, was of a ram's horn. In this year divers of the same things were done as in the seventh year, as the release of debts, the release of servants. But there are some things observable that were done at this time beyond what was done every seventh year.

As for servants, the release of them was not only of such as had then served seven years, yea, if they had served any time, they were then to be released; but there were some that would not be released, and there was a command given by God respecting it, Exod. xxi. 6, if there were a servant that loved his master and would not go free, then his master should bring him to the post of the door, and with a nail bore his ear, and then the text saith, "he shall serve him for ever." Now, that "for ever" is by interpreters interpreted but for the time of jubilee, and then he should have rest. Here it is to be understood of the fiftieth year, the year of jubilee.

There are some kind of spirits so slavish, that when they may have liberty they will not; they deserve to have their ears bored, to be slaves to the fiftieth year, if not for ever. Many amongst us at this day have such spirits. God offers us a release from bondage; how many of us love servitude still! It is just with God that we should have our ears bored, and that we should be slaves even for ever; but we hope there will be a jubilee come at length for our deliverance. God would have a jubilee even to deliver those that were of the most servile spirits. When God began with us at the commencement of our parliament, like the seventh year he offered to us a release, and we refused it then, and we deserve that our ears should be bored; but God is infinitely merciful, though we be of servile spirits, and know not how to pity ourselves, we hope the Lord will pity us, and grant us, out of free and rich grace, a jubilee, even to deliver those who have a mind to be bond-slaves. I am sure God does so spiritually; if God did not deliver those who are willing to be slaves, he would deliver none.

It was a great mercy so to provide for servants, that they might thus be delivered. The greater, because servants endured a great deal of hardship then, more than now; they were bought and sold, not only other nations, but the Hebrews were bought for servants also, as you find it, Exod. xxi. 2. Besides, servants were in such bondage then, that if the masters beat them with a rod until they had killed them, yet they must only be punished, they must not have blood shed for their blood; yea, though the servant died under his master's hand, yet the master was only to be punished; and if the servant lived but two or three days after, the master was not to be punished at all: "And if a man smite his servant, or his maid, with a rod, and he die under his hand; he shall be surely punished. Notwithstanding, if he continue a day or two, he shall not be punished: for he is his money," Exod. xxi. 20, 21.

Oh that servants would consider this, and bless God for the liberty they have now, more than servants had in former times! It was so likewise with the Romans, the word "servant" comes from servando, because the Romans used to have such for servants as were preserved in time of war, who would otherwise have been put to death; whether they were those or others, yet the condition of all was very servile both amongst Jews and Romans. This may justly rebuke the pride of servants now; if they be but crossed in the least thing, they make such a complaint as if they were exceedingly wronged. Let servants rather bless God for their condition, than murmur at a little hardship; the hardship of servants in former times was more severe than any you can endure now, who have the hardest masters. Hence, in the time of jubilee the servants so rejoiced.

Godwin, Jewish Antiq.,
Bp. Bb. 3. c. 10.

Jewish antiquities tell us, that nine days before their release, the servants feasted and made merry, and wore garlands, because of their freedom approaching.

The second thing extraordinary in the day of jubilee was, that not only debts, but lands were released: Lev. xxv. 23, "The land shall not be sold for ever." And there were divers reasons, why the land must not be sold for ever, but must return to the first possessors in the year of jubilee.

1. One reason is in Lev. xxv. 23, "For the land is mine," saith God, "for ye are strangers and sojourners with me." God would hereby teach them that they must not account themselves absolute lords of the land; "the land is mine," and you that are the greatest landlords of all, are but as strangers and sojourners with God, the land is still God's. Ver. 28, "But if he be not able to restore it to him," nor his kinsman for him, it shall remain unto the year of jubilee, and in the jubilee it shall go out, and he shall return unto his possession. If he could redeem his land himself, or a kinsman for him, he was to redeem it before; but if a man was so poor that he could not give any thing to redeem it, yet in the year of jubilee it should return to him.

2. God would not have his people too greedy to bring the possession of the country in to themselves, to have a perpetual inheritance to themselves and their posterity. This is the greediness of many covetous and ambitious men, they lay land to land, and house to house, to get a perpetual inheritance for themselves and posterity. God would not have his people be of so greedy dispositions, for a few of them to get the whole country into their own possession; therefore no man gained a possession for ever, but once in fifty years that possession must return to the original owner again.

3. The land was to return to the first owner, that the distinction of tribes might be continued, which was known much by continuance of the possessions that belonged to every tribe and family. God had great care before Christ's time to keep the distinction of tribes, that it might be clear out of which tribe Christ came.

But further, this year of jubilee aimed at something higher, it was a type of Christ, to set out the blessed redemption we have by him. The trumpet of the gospel which ministers blow is a trumpet of jubilee. Isa.

lxi. 1, 2, seems to have reference to a jubilee. Christ was appointed to proclaim liberty to the captives, and the opening of the prison to them that are bound, to proclaim the acceptable year of the Lord; now that acceptable year was the year of jubilee, there was the opening of the prison, and the releasing of them that were bound. "Blessed is the people that know the joyful sound," Psal. lxxxix. 15; that hear and know the jubilee. Oh blessed are our ears who live at such times, to hear the trumpet of jubilee blowing in one congregation or other almost every day! Now, first, we have a release of our debts and bondage, this is the joyful sound. We are all by nature in debt, (sins, you know, are called debts in the Lord's prayer,) every soul is bound over to God's eternal justice to answer to the law, for not obeying it; now comes this jubilee and releases all debts. And, secondly, we are all bond-slaves, in bondage to sin, to the law, and to the devil; now comes the gospel, this jubilee, and releases our bondage, sets us at liberty. And, thirdly, we have forfeited our right to the creature, yea, to heaven itself; the gospel comes and restores all, we have right now to the comforts of this world, and to heaven. Canaan was a type of heaven, and the loss of their inheritance was a type of the loss of heaven, and the bringing of them again to the possession of it, a type of the restoring of right to heaven. Oh happy are they who hear this joyful sound, not only with the ears of their body, but who have it sounding in their hearts, by the work of the Spirit of God in them!

In this year of jubilee, there is one thing further very remarkable, and that is, the time when this trumpet was to blow that proclaimed this year. Lev. xxv. 9, the trumpet was "to sound on the tenth day of the seventh month." What remarkable thing is there in this that the trumpet must be blown the tenth day of the seventh month? The tenth day of the seventh month was their day of expiation, (the day of atonement, their public fast,) this day was appointed every year for all Israel to afflict their souls before God, to humble themselves for their sins, and so to seek mercy from God. It is a strange thing, that upon the day in which they were to afflict their souls before God, and to mourn for their sins, the trumpet of jubilee was to sound, that was to proclaim joy and mirth, things of a contrary nature to humbling and mourning. Yea, but this affords us divers excellent instructions. As,

1. God would have his people so to mourn, as to know there is joy coming. In the darkest day they had, wherein they were bound to afflict their souls most, yet they were so to mourn, as to know there was a jubilee at hand. We are not to mourn as those without hope; in our most grievous mournings, we must not have our hearts sink in desperation, we must so mourn as to expect a jubilee.

2. The saints' mourning is a preparation for a jubilee. Joy then is near at hand, when the saints most mourn in a godly manner. Did not the Lord deal graciously with us the last fast day, when we were mourning before him? There was, amongst our brethren in other parts, a kind of trumpet of jubilee blown; the Lord was then working for us; what great deliverance did God grant that very day at Chichester! God shows that the mournings of his people make way for joy.

3. The sound of the trumpet of jubilee is sweetest, when we are most afflicted for our sins. When we are most apprehensive and sensible of the evil of sin, then the joy of God, the comforts of the gospel, are sweetest to the soul. When the trumpet of jubilee is blown in congregations, if it meets not with hearts sensible of sin, they are not delighted with its sweet sound, it is not melody in their ears, it rejoices not their hearts: but let a poor soul be brought down, and made sensible of the evil of sin and God's wrath, then let but one promise of the gospel be sounded forth, how sweet, how joyful is it!

4. Pardon of sin is the only foundation of every jubilee. For this tenth day of the seventh month, wherein the trumpet of jubilee was to be sounded, was a day of atonement. What is that? A day of covering, (as the word means,) of pardon of sin to the people of God. Many men keep a continual jubilee, live merrily, do nothing but eat, and drink, and play, and dance, and laugh, and cannot endure these sad melancholy people. What is the foundation of this thy jubilee? Art thou sure there is an atonement made between God and thy soul? Art thou sure thy sin is pardoned? Is this the foundation of thy rejoicing? Know it will not last, it is not God's, but the devil's jubilee, except there be an atonement made between God and thee, as the foundation of it.

5. When God has pardoned us, then our hearts are in a fit frame to pardon others. Now, now comes the jubilee; and now you must release your debts, and your lands, and forgive those that owe you any thing. This is the day wherein God testifies his mercy in pardoning your sins. They might well say, Now, Lord, command us what thou wilt, in showing mercy to our brethren; we are ready to pardon, to release them, to extend the bowels of our compassion towards them, for thou hast pardoned our sins. The reason of the rigidity, cruelty, and hardness of the hearts of men, and straitness of their spirits to their brethren, is, because God has not witnessed to their souls the pardon of their own sins; an atonement between God and them.

Their "solemn feasts." Among their feasts, they had three that were especially more solemn than others: and they were the feast of passover, pentecost, and tabernacles.

These three were united in one thing; that is, upon these three feasts all the males were to ascend up to Jerusalem to worship in the place which God chose. "Three times in a year shall all thy males appear before the Lord thy God in the place which he shall choose; in the feast of unleavened bread, (that was the passover,) and in the feast of weeks, (that was pentecost,) and in the feast of tabernacles," Deut. xvi. 16.

But how could the ten tribes then keep these feasts, for they went not to the temple? You may as well say,

See chap. iii.

How had they an ephod? Jeroboam was wise enough to keep the feasts, though not in the way God appointed; he could tell them that going to the temple was but a circumstance of place.

From the connexion of these three together in their solemn feasts, there are divers things to be noted.

First, We may see a reason why there were sometimes so many believers at Jerusalem. An argument is brought by some from Acts xxi. 20, to prove that there may be in one church more than can possibly assemble together in one congregation; "Thou seest, brother, how many thousands of Jews there are which believe," πόσα μυριάδες, how many myriads. Now, say they, so many could not join in one congregation. The answer to this is clear, that the time of which the passage speaks, was when the people of the Jews were all assembled together at Jerusalem to keep the feast of pentecost; for chap. xx. 16, states, that the apostle "hasted, if it were possible for him, to be at Jerusalem the day of pentecost." Now, reading the story on, it plainly appears that, by hastening his journey, he arrived at Jerusalem at the day of pentecost, and being there at that time, no marvel they said unto him, "Thou seest, brother, how many thousands of Jews there are which believe;" for all the males of the people of the Jews were together at Jerusalem, according to that law to which as yet they submitted. They were not in a church state at Jerusalem, therefore there is no strength in that objection against congregational churches.

Secondly, Where there is a national church there must be a uniting of the nation in some way of national worship. The Jews, by institution from God, were united in national worship three times in a year at the temple. And there should be some kind of individual worship not in the same species; that is, as others are praying, so are we, and as others are hearing, so are we; for so all the churches in the world may be joined; but to join in one act of worship together, as that was of going up to the temple, that made the Jews a national church. But we have no such institution now; no nation in the world can, in a proper sense, be said to be a national church as theirs was; in some figurative sense we may so call it, but not in that proper sense as it was among the Jews.

Thirdly, There are some ordinances that cannot be enjoyed but in the way of church fellowship. The Jews could not enjoy these feasts as they ought, unless they went together to Jerusalem in the way that God appointed. As among the Jews there were some ordinances they might enjoy in their synagogues and private houses, but some which they could not enjoy but in the temple; so there are some ordinances we may enjoy in our families, but others that we cannot enjoy but in church communion, of which Jerusalem is a type.

Fourthly, These three times, wherein they were to go up together to Jerusalem, were all in summer. The first, which was the feast of the passover, was in the latter end of our March, and the beginning of April; the feast of pentecost was fifty days after; the feast of tabernacles was about the middle of our September. It was very laborious for them to go up to Jerusalem to worship; but God so commiserated them, that they were not to go in winter time. That is the reason of that phrase in Acts xxvii. 9, "Sailing was now dangerous, because the feast was now already past;" that is, the feast of tabernacles was past, which was about the fifteenth of September, and so it began to be winter. It would be an affliction to go up to Jerusalem in the winter, and therefore God would be so indulgent to his people, that they should go in summer time. Oh what an affliction is it, then, to fly from Jerusalem before our enemies in the winter time! We had need pray the more hard now for those that are in danger of the enemy, that God would be merciful to them in this.

Fifthly, When they went up to these three feasts they must not go empty, but full-handed: "They shall not appear before the Lord empty," Deut. xvi. 15; noting thus much, that whenever we come to acknowledge God's mercy for any thing, we must come with full hands and liberal hearts, with hearts ready to distribute, or otherwise we only take God's name in vain.

Sixthly, The wonderful providence of God toward them, that though all the males in the whole country were to come up to Jerusalem three times in the year, yet their country should not be in danger of the enemies. The Jews had not such walls of seas about their country as we have, but they lived in the very midst of their enemies, who surrounded them; on the east, the Ammonites and Moabites; the west, the Philistines; the south, the Egyptians, Idumeans; the north, the Assyrians, to whom the prophet seems to have reference, Zech. i. 18. Now they might say, If all our males go up to Jerusalem three times a year, then our enemies that lie close in our borders, (for they lay as near them as York is to us,) may come upon us and destroy us: therefore God made provision for their encouragement; "Neither shall any man desire thy land, when thou shalt go up to appear before the Lord thy God thrice in the year," Exod. xxxiv. 24. God took care that none should desire their land. Let us go on in God's service, and he will take care to deliver us from our enemies. Often out of slavish fear of enemies, and the disturbance they are able to make among us, we are ready to betray the cause of God, and neglect his worship. Let us learn from hence to go on in God's ways, and not fear any injury which our enemies can do us. God saith he will take care, when they are all at Jerusalem in the exercise of his worship, that none should desire their land.

Now, by opening these several feasts, you may be helped to read the Old Testament profitably, for much of it is spent in things that concern some of these.

The first was the passover. You have the history of it Numb. xxviii. 16, 17, and in divers other scriptures. That feast was in the beginning of the year. It is true, our September was the beginning of their civil year, but the month Abib, which was the middle of March and part of April, was the ecclesiastical year; and upon their deliverance out of Egypt, when God commanded them to celebrate their passover, he appointed that that month should be unto them the beginning of months, the first month of the year. Deliverance from great evils are mercies that we are highly to prize; the Jews were to begin their year in memorial of the mercy they received in that month.

The name "passover" arose from God's sending forth a destroying angel that "passed over" the houses of the Israelites that night; he went through the land and destroyed all the firstborn of the Egyptians, but saved the Israelites. This feast was also called "the feast of unleavened bread," Luke xxii. 1, because they were to go out of Egypt in haste, and could not have time to leaven their bread. Josephus tells us that they took only a little flour mingled with water, that might serve them with great economy for thirty days. God taught them thus to depend upon him. We are ready to murmur if we see not enough to serve us for many years, if our armies have not enough for so long a time; but many hundreds of thousands had but a little meal and water to serve them for thirty days, and they knew not where to have more when that was spent: no marvel that it is said of Moses, Heb. xi. 27, "by faith he forsook Egypt." This bread is called "the bread of affliction," Deut. xvi. 3; and it was unleavened bread, not only to typify that we must not have our hearts leavened with malice, but to put them in mind of the sore affliction they endured both when they were in Egypt, and when they went out of Egypt.

Now this passover was partly memorative, and partly figurative.

Memorative. First, To remember the deliverance of their first-born.

Secondly, To remember their deliverance from the bondage of Egypt.

Obs. 1. When others are smitten and we are "passed over," it is a great mercy.

Obs. 2. Deliverance from the bondage of the outward man, and from bondage in respect of religion and conscience, is a mercy for ever to be celebrated. God is pleased now to offer us this mercy of deliverance from both these kinds of bondage; certainly we are a people devoted to misery if we take not God's offer of mercy. We have been in bondage in our estates and liberties, God offers us freedom, and freedom also from antichristian bondage, which is worse than Egyptian bondage. The text saith, when they were delivered from the bondage of Egypt, "Moses sang;" and in the Revelation, when they were delivered from antichristian bondage, "they sing the song of Moses," Rev. xv. 3. We were long since delivered from a great part of this bondage, now the Lord offers to deliver us altogether.

* Templum tuum brevi, valde cito, valde cito, in diebus nostris, edificasse, nunc edificam templum tuum brevi. Misericors Deus, magnus Deus, benigne Deus, pulcher Deus, dulcis Deus, virtuosus Deus, Judaice Deus, nunc edificam templum

Obs. 3. When God offers us mercy of deliverance we should not go forth slowly. They were to eat this passover with their staves in their hands, this was to note their hasty going out of Egypt. Our misery at this day is, that the Lord offers deliverance, and we lie slugging on our beds, and are like that foolish child the prophet speaks of, that sticks in the birth: we have stuck these two years in the birth, whereas we might have been delivered long before this. It concerns us all to consider what the cause is, and to lament it before the Lord, that we may make our peace with him.

Obs. 4. In thanksgiving for a mercy, we are ever to remember what we were before that mercy. They must eat unleavened bread at this feast, the bread of affliction, to remind them of the afflictions they were in before they had this mercy. When we bless God for a deliverance, we must really present before our souls the sad condition we were in before we were delivered.

But the special thing aimed at in the passover was, that it should be a type of Christ, who was the paschal Lamb that was to take away the sins of the world; he that was roasted in the fire of God's wrath for our sins, as that lamb that was to be eaten in the passover was roasted in the fire. And if ever the angel of God's vengeance pass over us, it is through the blood of that Lamb sprinkled upon our hearts, which was signified by sprinkling the blood of the lamb upon the posts of their houses. In the Lord's supper we celebrate, in effect, the same feast of the passover they did; and by this we may learn,

Obs. 5. There is little comfort in the remembrance of our outward deliverances, except we can see them all in Christ. They were in this feast to remember their deliverance out of Egypt, but they were in it to have a figure and type of Christ. That sweetened their remembrance, that made the feast a joyful feast, when they could see it as a fruit of Christ's sufferings; when this lamb that put them in mind of it, put them in mind likewise of Christ the paschal Lamb. If you would have the remembrance of deliverances from any kind of affliction sweet unto you, you must look upon them all in the blood of Christ, and then your hearts will be enlarged to bless God.

This was the ordinance of God in the passover; but besides God's ordinance, the Jews added divers other things.

The first thing they added, was earnest prayer to God for the building of the temple, which many of them observe to this day. Buxtorf tells us, that because the temple is destroyed where they were to go up thrice in the year to solemnize these feasts, therefore they pray earnestly and mightily for the temple in this manner: they cry all together to God, "Lord, build thy temple shortly, very quickly, very quickly, most quickly in our days. And then they go over it again, Merciful God, great God, kind God, high God, sweet God, with divers other epithets, now build thy temple quickly, very quickly, &c. Now, now, now, five times together. They teach us how much the temple concerns us. Their mistake was, they rested in the material temple, and did not consider that this temple was a type of Christ; therefore as earnestly as they prayed for the building of their material temple, let us pray for the building up of the mystical body of Christ; Now, Lord, build quickly, do not defer it, even in our days do it!

A second thing they added was the manner of easting out unleavened bread. In this they observed three things, their inquisition, their extermination, their execution. First, with a candle they would narrowly search every corner of the house to see if they had the least crumb of leaven; if any were found they cast it out with solemnity; and then they used to wish a curse upon themselves if there were any left in their houses that was not cast out.

tuum brevi, valde cito, in diebus nostris, valde cito, valde cito, nunc edificam, nunc edificam, nunc edificam, nunc edificam, nunc edificam templum tuum cito, robuste Deus, fortis, potens Deus, &c. Buxtorf. de Synag. Jud. c. 13.

This moral observation may be taught from it; it should be our care when we are to receive the sacrament, to make narrow inquisition, to get the candle of the word, and to search every corner of our hearts, every faculty of the soul, to see if there be no leaven in it. 2. Whatever we see, to cast it out of doors. And, 3. To be so much set against sin, as to be willing to take a curse upon ourselves, if we should willingly let any known sin be in our hearts, and to acknowledge that God might justly curse us in his ordinance if we be false in this.

Thirdly, they used to display all their treasures; if they had any splendid clothes, or furniture, or curiosity, they would show all at this feast. By their superstition we may learn, that in the time of our coming before God, it is fit for us to exercise and manifest all those beautiful graces with which the Lord has endowed us by the work of his Spirit; for in them the riches of a Christian, his splendid clothing, his jewels, and all his excellences, consist.

Fourthly, after the passover was at an end, they fasted three days, to humble themselves for their failings in keeping that feast. This was not God's institution, but it was their custom; and we may learn from it, (though we do not bind ourselves to do as they did,) to look back to our receiving the sacrament, and to bewail all our miscarriages: I believe, if things were examined to the quick, in our receiving the sacrament, we should find matter enough to fast and pray, and to humble our souls for our miscarriages.

Lastly, in the passover they used to read the book of the Canticles, because that book treats especially of the conjunction of the soul with the Messiah, which is sealed up specially in the passover. And that, indeed, is a special meditation for us when we come to the Lord's supper, to meditate upon our conjunction with Christ.

The next is the feast of pentecost. This feast is called also the feast of weeks, because there were seven weeks to be reckoned, and at the end of them it was solemnly to be kept, Lev. xxiii. 15. In the feast of the passover, the first day of seven, and the last day of seven, were solemnly kept; now they were to count from the morrow after the first sabbath, seven sabbaths, that is, seven weeks complete; the first sabbath of the passover was the fifteenth day of the month Abib, and the next day from that they were to count seven weeks, and at the end of seven weeks the feast of pentecost was to be kept. Now in this first day, wherein they began to count their weeks, you find the first-fruits were to be offered up to God; it was a kind of distinct feast, called the feast of the first-fruits, in which they were to bring a sheaf of the first-fruits of their harvest to the priest, to be offered to God; and the reason was, because now their harvest began: as soon as the passover was killed, and they had kept the first sabbath of the passover, (for they were to keep it seven days,) they began their harvest; they must not put a sickle into the corn, nor reap any thing of their ground, until they had kept the passover.

Now their harvest began in the month Abib, that is, part of our March and part of April, and thence it has its name, for Abib signifies, an ear of corn. Harvest began so soon in the land of Canaan, not only because it was a hot country, for it is observed that Africa was a hotter country than theirs, and yet their harvest began later, but because of the blessing of God upon that land; therefore, Jer. iii. 19, it is called, "a goodly heritage," because of the timely bringing forth the fruit; the words translated "goodly heritage," signify an heritage of comeliness; the same word translated "goodly," signifies "a roebuck," to which this land was compared, and so it may be said to be a land of a roebuck, because of the speedy and swift ripening of the corn.

Obs. 1. It is the blessing of the church to have their fruit ripe betimes, for Canaan was a type of the church. You young ones, consider this, the Lord loves to have the fruits of Canaan ripe betimes: if you grew in the wilderness, though you did not bring forth fruit in your youthful days, God would not so much regard it; but if you live in his church, in Canaan, the Lord expects you should begin betimes, in the very spring of your years, to bring forth fruit unto God. Men rejoice much in early fruits, they are lovely; yea, and God rejoices in them too, Micah vii. 1, "My soul desired the first-ripe fruit;" this is true of God himself. Your parents and godly friends may say, Our soul desires that grace may spring up betimes in these young ones: so it may be said of God, his very soul desires to see the first-fruits; fruit in young ones is that which is pleasing to God's soul.

Obs. 2. We cannot enjoy any sweetness or blessing from any fruits of the earth, but through the blood of Jesus Christ. After they had solemnized the memorial of the blood of Christ, then they might put a sickle in the corn and reap it, not before; and as soon as they had solemnized the remembrance of Christ in the passover, they might go with comfort and take the fruits of the earth and rejoice in them, but not before.

Obs. 3. When we have had communion with God in holy things, then we may have a holy and more comfortable use of the creatures. As when we have solemnized the blood of Christ, then we may enjoy sweetness from the comforts of the earth; so when we have enjoyed communion with God in his ordinances, it is a fit time to have a holy use of the creatures, yea, then you must be careful to have a holy use of the creatures; as soon as ever they came from the passover, the first day they were to celebrate the first-fruits unto God.

Obs. 4. After the blood of Christ is sprinkled upon the conscience, men will be ready to dedicate things unto God. Then, as Zaccheus said, "Half of my goods I give to the poor," Luke xix. 8; here are my goods, here is my estate: does the church, do my brethren, stand in need of help? lo, we are ready to offer them up to God.

Obs. 5. The first of blessings are to be offered up to God. God gives them charge, that the first of the first of all the fruits of their land should be offered to him, all that come afterward should be the more blessed. Learn this, you young ones, dedicate the first of your years unto God, the very first of your first, the dawning of your years, Exod. xxiii. 19.

Obs. 6. If you dedicate your young days to God, when the consummation of your years comes, how may you keep a feast of pentecost! The Jews dedicated the first-fruits fifty days before, and at the fifty days' end kept their joyful feast of pentecost: so might you if you dedicated your young years unto God. On the other side, what a sad thing will it be for old men that but now begin to think of God and Christ! it is well you do so, but you cannot do it so comfortably as you might have done, if you had begun in your younger years. If the Jews, when their harvest was done, had brought two loaves to God, might God say, Why did you not bring the first-fruits unto me? God might so upbraid you; but, however, come in to God, and he will not upbraid you, he upbraids no man; but the comfort will not be so much, because your consciences will upbraid you.

Obs. 7. Happy is that man, who, when he comes to reap the fruit of his actions, shall have a feast of joy. Thus it was with the Jews, the very beginning of their harvest was with a feast, and the conclusion with a feast too. All the actions of our lives are a sowing of seed, if you sow sparingly, you shall reap sparingly; and happy those men when they come to reap, who find both the beginning and conclusion of their reaping a joyful feasting. Many sow merrily, but they reap horror and anguish; but when the saints come to reap, they shall have a feast of joy. "At thy right hand are pleasures for evermore."

Obs. 8. Much praise is due to God for the fruits of the earth, for outward comforts. On the fiftieth day they were to solemnize the mercy of God in giving them the fruits of the earth for their harvest. How much praise then is due for Jesus Christ, and all spiritual mercies in him! Though we ought to bless God for the things of the earth, yet we should be so swallowed up in blessing God for his word and ordinances, and spiritual mercies, that in comparison our hearts should be above the fruits of the earth. Therefore, observe that when Ezekiel prophesies of the blessed state of the church, by the Jewish feasts, though he mentions the passover, and new moons, and sabbaths, and the feast of tabernacles, yet not the feast of pentecost; there is no mention of keeping a feast for blessing God for these things. Not but that they should do so, but that their hearts should be so carried up with abundance of spiritual mercies, that then they should be all for Christ, and for heaven, and for eternity.

Obs. 9. It was a great engagement to them rightly to use the creatures, when they had first dedicated them to God, and in the conclusion of harvest had solemnized his mercy in giving them. For God thereby taught them that they might be further engaged to use all creatures for his service. If God give a heart to dedicate the beginning of a mercy to himself, and when the mercy is fulfilled, in a solemn manner to bless God for it, it is a mighty engagement to make use of this mercy for God's honour. The reason why many are so loose in their conversations, and do not employ the creatures of God to his glory, is, because they do not in a solemn manner bless God for that they enjoy. As in your trading, if you have comfortable incomes, and you take these comforts, and thank God in a slight manner for them, how do you use them afterwards? only for yourselves and for the flesh. But when you hear of riches flowing in upon you, if you can immediately take the first-fruits and give some part to God's service as a testimony of thankfulness, and in your families and closets in a solemn manner give God the glory for the good success you have had in your estate, this will be a mighty engagement to you to use your estates for his service.

Mark that at the first, in their preparation, they were to bring but a sheaf, but afterward, Lev. xxiii. 17, they were to bring "two wave loaves;" in the first they were to offer "one he lamb without blemish," but afterward "seven lambs, and one young bullock, and two rams," &c., both burnt-offerings, and sin-offerings, and peace-offerings, when they had received the full harvest.

Obs. 10. Though you are forward to give God glory when you are young, the first-fruit of your years, yet when you come to be old, you should still flourish in the courts of God's house. First they offered but a little unto God, afterward abundance. Do you so? I appeal to all old men who are here this day, if God gave you heart to give up your young years to him, bless him for it; but now when you are old, are you as forward as ever you were? You ought to be not only so, but much more abundant in the work of the Lord. Nay, cannot others witness against you, that there was a time wherein you were more forward, and that now you begin rather to temporize? The Lord forbid this should be spoken of any old men. God expects more afterward than at the first-fruits; and though nature may decay, yet there is a promise that in their old age they shall flourish in the courts of God's house, and shall manifest the graces of his Spirit much more. We are ready at the first-fruits to offer unto God somewhat, when his mercy comes first; but when mercy comes afterward more fully, we should be more full in our offerings.

You will say, What is the meaning of this, that there is a burnt-offering, a sin-offering, and a peace-offering in the feast of pentecost? what is the difference of these three offerings?

The difference is this; the burnt-offering was a testimony of their high respect to God, that is, they tendered up something to God as a testimony of the high and honourable esteem they had of his majesty, it was wholly to be given up to him. Now in the other they had respect to themselves, the sin-offering was not to offer a sacrifice merely to testify respect to God, but to be a typical signification of Christ's sacrifice for sins; they were to look through their sacrifice to Christ, and their sin-offering was to be an atonement for their sin. The peace-offering was in thanksgiving for a mercy, or when they would petition to God for a further mercy. All this must be done in the day of pentecost.

But, beside solemnizing the mercies of God in their harvest, there is another object that is constantly affirmed by the Jews, and I find many divines making no question of it; but it is not so clearly laid down in the word. They say, God in this feast solemnized the giving of the law, and this is their ground; because fifty days after their coming out of Egypt, God gave the law, and so they say pentecost was appointed to bless God for giving the law. The Jews say that God dealt with them as a king might deal with a poor man in prison, first he releases him of his bondage, and then tells him, that after such a time he will marry him to his daughter; now, say they, will not this man count every day till this time come? so, when God delivered us out of Egypt, he told us, that after such a time he would give us his law, and marry us to his daughter, which is the law; and this is the reason why we count so diligently the very weeks, nay, the days, as longing for that time when we are to be married to the law.

Obs. From whence we may note, that we are not only to keep God's law, but to rejoice in it; not only to look at what is commanded as a duty, but as a high privilege, and so bless God for the law. It is a higher thing to love God's law and rejoice in it, than to obey it: Great peace shall they have that love thy law. David professed that he loved the law of God more than silver and gold, that it was sweeter to him than the honey, and the honeycomb. The Jews at this day rejoice when the law of God is read, and in their synagogues, when the law of God is brought out, they lift up their bodies in a kind of exultation, rejoicing that God gave this law to them.

Further, the time of their pentecost was the time of the descending of the Holy Ghost upon the apostles: as God at that time gave the law by Moses, so the Spirit at that time came by Christ, to show that we are in the gospel to receive the Spirit of God, to enable us to fulfil the law. They had the letter of the law, but, in comparison of what we have, they had not the Spirit, but now the Holy Ghost is come in a full measure; as he then came upon the disciples, so he comes now in the time of the gospel in a fuller way than formerly, there is a continual pentecost.

But the works of God do not of themselves sanctify any time: hence observe, that we may run into a thousand absurdities if we argue, because the Jews had such a time, we may have such a time, or because there were such blessings at that time, therefore we may sanctify that day. No, the works of God do not sanctify any time, of themselves; it must be either the word written, or some immediate dictate of the Spirit, that must sanctify any day. Certainly, the work of our redemption itself is not enough to change the sabbath, if we had not some footing for a new institution. We usually give this ground for the change of the day, because of the greatness of the work; but though the works of God be never so great, we sin in sanctifying any set and stated time for such work; except there come an institution, it will be but will-worship in us, and God will not be put off with this. What! is not this as great a work as the Jews had, and may not we celebrate the memory of it as they did? But God will say, "Who required these things at your hands?" Thus far you may do, that is, bless God for those works all the days of your lives; but to sanctify any particular day for them, certainly that cannot be done without sin: we have our warrant for the Lord's day, as well as the greatness of the work, because of the practice of the apostles, who were inspired by the Holy Ghost.

The next is the feast of trumpets: only one particular about it at this time, because Providence makes it so seasonable. In the seventh month (which was the first month of their annus civilis) there were three feasts; of trumpets, of expiation, and of tabernacles.

The first was THE FEAST OF TRUMPETS. There was a threefold use of trumpets among the Jews: 1. For the calling of the congregation together, as we do with bells. 2. The calling of them to war. 3. For the solemnizing of their feasts.

There are four ends given by divines for the feast of trumpets; some I confess are very improbable, but there are two very probable. The one is, this feast was to celebrate the new year with them; as every new month they had the feast of the new moon, to celebrate the beginning of the month, so in the beginning of the year they had a feast to celebrate its commencement; that was this feast, for it was on the first day of their civil year: so that it is very probable this feast was appointed to bless God for the new year, as well as one to celebrate the new month. Yet this can be no ground for us now to consecrate the beginning of every new year to God: that was Jewish, and it ceased: if we will have any consecration of a new year, it must be by virtue of some institution or other; let who can, show the institution: we must not think because it has a show of wisdom, and seems reasonable, therefore it may be; this is not enough in matter of worship, you must strictly tie yourselves to an institution. As it is Jewish, so it is heathenish; the heathens consecrated their new year to the honour of their god Janus; and we read in

Non licet iniquis
observationes agere calendarum et otia
vacare Gentibus, neque lauro aut
viriditate arborum
cingere domos.
Quoniam in hac observatio paganismi est. Canon. 74.

Concilium Antiodorense, in France, in the year six hundred and fourteen, it was the judgment of that council, that it is not lawful to observe the festivities of the Gentiles, to keep their worship and observe their calends, (that is, the beginning of their months,) to adorn houses with laurels and green bays, for all these practices (saith the council) savour of paganism. And likewise an ancient writer saith, that the calends of January are rather to be taken heed of, than to be accounted calends, and so to be sanctified. And further, he saith, the church has appointed a solemn feast to be upon that very day, because of the notorious abuses there were wont to be upon that day. And Polydore Virgil saith, that these solemnities of laurel, and bays, and masks, and mummings, and such vanities, come from the heathens' Bacchanalia and Saturnalia, that were wont to be at that time of the year. However, therefore, we think we honour Christ, and call it the circumcision day of Christ, yet by those customs we dishonour him, for they are rather heathenish than Christian.

Though there may be some natural reason of rejoicing, yet no ground for consecration.

Let no man object and say, These solemnities have been a long time in the church. It is true these are ancient, but from whence comes the antiquity? From hence, because Christians, being newly converted from paganism, kept as much as possible of the pagan customs, only they gave them a turn to Christian solemnities; therefore all the argument of antiquity, either for these days, or ceremonies, or prelatical government, comes from their pagan customs. They lived among pagans, and having been lately pagans, they savoured and smelt of heathenism still. So now, many plead that such things were in the first reformation: no marvel they retained them, for they were newly come out of popery, and they savoured and smelt of popery. Indeed to plead the antiquity of these things, which men must show when they are put to it, is one of the greatest arguments against them. Thus the feast of All-saints was turned from the heathens' feast Pantheon; and on the feast of the purification of the virgin Mary, which they call Candlemas, the heathens had the festivity of their goddess Februa, (who was the mother of Mars,) from whence comes the name of our month February, and they celebrated that time with candles, and such things as papists do now.

The like may be said for the argument of antiquity for the prelates. O, say some, such government has been ever since the Christian religion has been in England. Grant that there has been some kind of bishops ever since, but from whence came they? We find in histories, that when the pagans were in England they had their flamins, and their archflamins, London was one, and York was another; and when they were converted to the Christian religion, still keeping some of their heathenish customs, instead of their archflamins they made archbishops, and of their flamins, bishops, and that in their very places, as London and York, and some say Chester. This is the very ground of the antiquity of them; therefore, my brethren, let not us be put off with such arguments as these; men delude you, and baffle you by these arguments.

The second reason of that feast, the Hebrews think, was a remembrance of Isaac's deliverance, when he should have been sacrificed, and the ram was caught by the horns to be sacrificed in his stead; they draw it from this argument, because that feast is called a memorial, (say they,) to remember the deliverance of Isaac, and it must be by the trumpets of rams' horns, to call this to remembrance; but it seems to be far from the meaning of the Holy Ghost. A third reason of the feast of trumpets, some say, (Cajetan among others,) was instituted for a memorial of God's giving the law by sound of the trumpet. But that is not likely, because this feast was not kept at the time of God's giving the law; if there were any time for the celebration of giving the law, it must be at the feast of pentecost. A fourth, it was for a celebration of a memorial of all the mercies of God to them in their wars, which was declared by the blowing of the trumpets. But I rather take another reason, to be a main and principal reason of God's institution of this feast; to be a preparation to the feast of atonement and expiation. It is called "a memorial," saith Calvin, Lev. xxiii. 24, for this reason, to put them in mind to humble themselves before God, "to afflict their souls" in the day of atonement; and, secondly, "a memorial" before God, that God may remember them for mercy; so the Jews observe, that from the first day of the seventh month to the tenth day, there were more than ordinary exercises in giving of alms, in praying, in going to their synagogues; they were very devout for those ten days in preparation for the day of atonement. From whence people to prepare them for the day of fasting. God has accepted those poor fasts that we have kept, abundance of mercies we have received on them; scarcely one, but we hear good news after it; if we had kept fast days as we ought, if we had been prepared as we should, oh what might we have obtained of God by this time! If God accepts such poor things as we do, (as God knows they are poor and mean,) if we had every time a trumpet blown before us to prepare us for the day of atonement, what atonements might England have made with God before this time!

Obs. Ministers should blow their trumpets to the

The next feast was, THE FEAST OF EXPIATION, in the tenth day. I thought not to have spoken of that, because the feast of expiation is a fast rather than a feast; but that is meant here as well as any of the other, for this reason, though it were a fast, yet the Hebrew word translated solemn feasts, signifies only a settled, stated, solemn time. And, secondly, it was a great mercy to them to have such a fast day; though the day of atonement was a day for afflicting themselves, yet it is the cause of rejoicing to a nation that God grants them such a day of atonement; it is a special means to make way to the joy of a nation, and therefore is included amongst the other: now the history of that you have in those two famous scriptures, Lev. xvi. and xxiii. In this day of atonement, there are divers things very observable and useful.

1. The solemn charge that God gave for afflicting men's souls upon that day. In a few verses, three several times God charges them to afflict their souls, to humble their souls, Lev. xxiii. 27, 29, 32. God appointed one day in the year for all the Jews to afflict their souls, to make an atonement between God and them in a day of fast, and they were charged to afflict their souls; and that soul that did not, God threatened to cut it off.

2. The priest was to go into the holy of holies, where he went but once a year; Lev. xvi., the beginning and the latter end compared together, you shall find it. This may teach us, that if ever we are to look upon Jesus Christ in the presence of God, in the holy of holies, making intercession for us, it is in the day of atonement. In the day of a public fast of the kingdom, we are to exercise our faith upon Christ, as entering before God into the holy of holies for us. After we have charged upon our souls our sins, and afflicted them, we must likewise cast up an eye of faith, beholding Jesus Christ our High Priest at that day before the Father, making intercession for us.

3. On that day the priest was to make an atonement for all the holy things; in Lev. xvi. 20, "When he hath made an end of reconciling the holy place, and the tabernacle of the congregation, and the altar," &c., the priest was not only to seek to make reconciliation between God and the people, but to reconcile the holy places; even the holy of holies, and the tabernacle, and the altar had a kind of pollution in them, and must be reconciled: so infectious is the sin of man. This teaches us, that in a day of atonement, of fasting, we are to have a special care to seek mercy from God, to be reconciled to us, in respect of all our holy duties and offerings; we are to seek then to get the best services that ever we performed in all our lives cleansed, that God may be pacified in regard of the filth and uncleanness that cleaved even to them. In the day of a fast, you are not only to confess your notorious sins to God, those which in their own nature are sinful; but you are to examine all your holy duties, and seek to make peace with God in regard of the uncleanness that has been in them. This few think of; in the day of a fast, they confess such sins as are vile in themselves; but to be sensible of the uncleanness of holy duties is as necessary.

4. In their day of atonement the priest was to lay the sins of the congregation upon the scape-goat. The story of the scape-goat was this, the priest must come and confess the sins of the congregation, laying his hand upon the head of the goat, and then he must send this goat into the wilderness. The meaning is of great use to us; Jesus Christ is the scape-goat, and in the days of our humiliations we are to come and lay our hands upon Jesus Christ, and confess all our sins over him, and look upon all our sins as laid upon him. Now the scape-goat was to be sent into the wilderness. What is that? That is, sent into a land of forgetfulness, so as the Jews should never see that goat again upon which their sins were laid; it signified to them, that their sins were now so forgiven, that they should never hear of them again. Thus are our sins upon Christ, as we shall never see nor hear more of them. In the day of our fasts we should thus exercise our faith upon Christ.

5. A fifth thing that was to be done, was to sprinkle the blood of the slain goat upon the mercy-seat, and before it. It is the blood of Christ that is upon and before God's mercy-seat, that procures mercy from thence for us.

6. The priest must "take a censer full of burning coals of fire from off the altar before the Lord, and his hands full of sweet incense beaten small," Lev. xvi. 12; to teach us, that in the day of our solemn fasts we must be sure to get our hearts full of burning coals from the altar, full of affection and zeal, full of mighty workings of spirit to God. Although you that are godly, and so are priests to God, at other times come with few coals from the altar, your affections scarce heated; but in a day of atonement you must come with your hearts full of coals, and be sure it be fire from the altar, do not satisfy yourselves in natural affections then, but be sure you be full of spiritual affections. And then, "full of sweet incense." What was that? It typically represented our prayer; you must be sure to have your hearts full of prayer, to send up abundance of incense before God. The incense must be of spices "beaten small." What is that? The prayers that we are to send up to God in the day of atonement, must come from much contrition of spirit, our hearts must as it were be beaten small to powder, then they are able to send forth such incense as is a sweet savour to God. Many of you in the day of a fast seem to be full of prayer, but is this prayer a sweet incense to God or no? How shall I know that? By this; God has appointed the incense upon the day of atonement to be such as must come from spices beaten; if thy heart be beaten to powder, and thy prayers be the savour and odour of thy graces, which are as spices, and heated by the fire of God's Spirit, then there will be incense that pleases God: first, graces, which are the spices; secondly, the contrition, that is the beating small; then the fire of God's Spirit, to cause the incense to rise up before God as a sweet savour.

7. In the day of atonement, the cloud of the incense must cover the mercy-seat, ver. 13; and then the blood both of the bullock and the goat must be "sprinkled upon the mercy-seat," and that "seven times;" and, ver. 15, the blood of the goat must be sprinkled, not only "upon the mercy-seat," but "before the mercy-seat." What is the meaning of this? must our mercy-seat be clouded in the day of atonement? we had need have it appear to us, and not be clouded. Yes, in the day of atonement it must be clouded, but with incense; the incense that was sent up was a type of the sweet perfume of the merit of Jesus Christ. Now, in days of atonement, we must look up to the mercy-seat, and see the merit of Jesus Christ round about it as a cloud covering it; to teach us, that no man must dare to look upon the mercy-seat of God as it is in itself, but must have the incense of the merit of Christ round about it. The reason was given why the Lord must have the incense as a cloud, "lest he die;" if he had entered into the holy place and there looked upon the mercy-seat, not clouded by incense, he must have died for it. Those who think to come into God's presence, and to receive mercy from God out of Christ, they die for it. This is the damnation of men's souls. Mercy is an attribute of God, but if we, who are sinful creatures, dare to look upon this attribute of mercy, and not have the incense of Christ's merit, it is the way to destroy our souls. Oh how many thousands are in hell for this! Many who are afflicted for their sins, and cry to God to forgive them, and think to exercise their faith upon God as merciful, yet not looking upon the mercy-seat as clouded with the merit of Christ, it proves the destruction of their souls. In a fast, you must not look upon God as the Creator of heaven and earth, or as merciful in himself barely, but upon God's mercy in his Son, and so exercise your faith; or else you can never make an atonement, but rather will procure God's wrath. It is not only dangerous, but horrible, once to think of God without Christ, says Luther.

Non solum pro peccato-rum, sed horrible
est de Deo extra Christum cogitare.
Luther in sua
causa.

Again, the blood of the bullock and the goat must be sprinkled "seven times" upon the mercy-seat. When we come to make our atonement with God, we must exercise faith in the blood of Christ, and sprinkle it seven times, that is, again and again, upon the mercy-seat. We look upon God, when we pray to him, as a God of mercy, and we present ourselves in humiliation before the mercy-seat; but know this, that the mercy-seat will do us no good without the blood of Christ; faith must take this blood of Christ, and sprinkle it, tender it up to God the Father for the atonement of our souls, and procuring our mercy. Not only so, the blood of the bullock and the goat must be sprinkled upon the mercy-seat, and before the mercy-seat; we must not only think there can be no mercy obtained from God but by the blood of Christ, but we cannot so much as have access to God's mercy-seat. We must know, that all sinners are banished from the presence of God, and cannot have access to God's presence as they are in themselves.

8. Lastly, this day divers times is called "a sabbath of rest," that is, a sabbath of sabbaths; so it is in the original, as one of the principal sabbaths they had. I did not handle it amongst the sabbaths, because it comes in now more fully amongst these solemn feasts. There must be more rest in the day of atonement, than in their other solemn days. That was permitted in others that was not permitted in this, to teach us, that in the day of fasting, above any day, we must get our souls separated from the world, there must be a rest in our hearts, a rest from sin, a rest from the world; it must be a sabbath of sabbaths unto us.

Now, notwithstanding God had given this solemn charge for this day of atonement, yet, Theodoret tells us, that in his time they had so degenerated, that they spent it in sports, and made it a day of mirth. God grant, that from the ordinariness of our days of atonement this abuse may not spring, as in some places it does; by the wickedness of men's natures, the most solemn things that ever God gave us in charge in time degenerate.

One note more from this feast of expiation. We find in Grecian history, that yearly the Grecians were wont to have a kind of expiation for their cities, in imitation of the custom of the Jews. Certain condemned persons were brought forth, with garlands in manner of sacrifices, and were cast down from some steep place into the midst of the sea, and offered to

Neptune the god of the sea, with these words, Be thou a περίημα for us. In times of public infection in their cities, to make an atonement between them and their gods, certain men were brought to be sacrificed to their gods, for an expiation for the whole city; and they were called καθάρματα: this word was used to signify, that that man who was to expiate for all the sins of their cities to their gods, having all their sins upon him, was accounted as filth and obscuring. The apostle, in 1 Cor. iv. 13, uses the same expression, by which we may understand the meaning of those two words he employs; "We are (saith he) made as the filth of the world, and are the obscuring of all things;" περίημα, και περικαθάρματα, alluding to the custom of the Grecians. We, for our parts, (saith he,) are made as despicable and odious in the sight of the people, and are as much loaded with curses, as those condemned persons who had all the sins and curses of the people laid upon them, and were offered to their gods for expiation.

THE FEAST OF TABERNACLES. The history of this feast is in Lev. xxiii. 34. The Jews were to take boughs off the trees, and make booths of them; and those that write the history of their manners tell us, because they could not make booths and tabernacles for all the people, some of them thought it sufficient to carry boughs in their hands, and those boughs they used to call hosanna; Do thou fold, or prepare, the hosanna. Therefore, when Christ came to Jerusalem, they cried, "Hosanna to the Son of David;" the meaning was not a prayer, Save us, O thou Son of David, as some would have it; but, Hosanna to the Son of David; that is, We hold forth these boughs to the honour of the Messiah, the Son of David. Now for those boughs, ver. 40, there was a command of God, that they should be of goodly trees, palm trees, or willows of the brook; but why so? It denoted, that whereas they had lived forty years in the wilderness, in a dry place, they were now brought to a fruitful land, that had much water, which was a great advantage in those hot countries; and therefore they were to bring boughs of the willows of the brook, and of goodly trees, that might most testify the goodness of God in delivering them from the wilderness, and in bringing them to a land filled with sweet and pleasant brooks. Observe the reasons why God would have this feast kept. He aims at these three things chiefly.

I. God would have them bless his name for his mercies to them in the wilderness, when they dwelt in booths. He appointed, that once a year they should call to mind the great mercies of God in his dispensation towards them, who for forty years were in the wilderness, and had not a house all that time, but dwelt in tabernacles. This was a mighty work of God! That so many hundred thousands should live forty years without a certain dwelling, manifested his exceeding protection over them, and his providence every way to supply necessities for them, even as well as if they had had the strongest houses. God would declare thereby, that the church in this world is not to expect any settled condition, but to be as men that dwell in tents, removing up and down, and so seek after a city that hath foundations, as is said of Abraham. At this feast, the Jews were wont to read the Book of Ecclesiastes, principally because it speaks so much of the works of God's providence. All the while God's people dwelt in booths and tabernacles, God himself would dwell in a tabernacle. God would not have a house built unto him, till he had brought his own people to be settled in houses of their own; and therefore when David began to think that he had a house of cedar, and surely God must have one too, God tells him, Did I ever speak, saying, "Why build ye not me an house of cedar?" as if he had said, As long as my people went up and down in booths and tabernacles, I was content to have a tabernacle for my dwelling. Thus God is willing to suit himself to the condition of his people: saith God,

If your conditions be afflicted and unsettled, I will be so too. In all their afflictions, God was afflicted; in all their unsettledness, God seemed to be so too. Afterwards, when God's people were settled in Jerusalem, then God would have a house built him. God would hereby teach us, that if he be content to be in a condition like him; as thus, when we are afflicted, will God be afflicted with us? when we are unsettled, will God be (as it were) unsettled with us? then let us not think it much, if God's truth and gospel suffer, to suffer with God. When God is magnified and praised, our hearts should be enlarged too, and rejoice in his praise. We should consider the condition that God is in in the world, and suit ourselves with that.

Obs. 1. It is good to have a real remembrance of our former low and mean condition. Does God now bring us into a more settled condition than heretofore? Let us not forget our former afflicted and unsettled condition, how ready we were to flect up and down. If God should grant his people to think themselves settled in their own kingdoms, yet let them never forget the time when they were unsettled in this and other countries. Many of the people of God have thought, what shall become of them, and whither shall they go, unless there be some special mercies of God to prevent their scattering; and yet that may be the condition of thousands in the land, before a year has closed. If God should prevent you, ever remember your fleeting condition. It was God's great care of the people of Israel, that they should never forget their dwelling in tabernacles.

Obs. 2. After our humiliations for our sins, and making up our peace with God, it is good to keep our hearts low with meditation of the uncertainty of all things in the world. Note, the time of their feast of tabernacles, they were to dwell in booths upon the fifteenth day of their month, which was but five days after their day of atonement; as if God had said, You have been humbling yourselves, and making your peace with God, yet, when your hearts are comforted with the hope of atonement made, keep them low, take heed of pride; the feast of tabernacles must be kept. And one special means to keep our hearts low, is to remember the uncertainties of the comforts of this world. If your hearts are lifted up, and conceive some excellences in things here, go into your booths, and work your hearts down, keep your feast of tabernacles.

Obs. 3. To keep those humbled who are raised from a low condition to a high one, it is good actually to go into the houses of the poor, and look into their cupboards, and see what provision they have. This will be a means to humble your hearts, when you consider, This was once, or might be now, my condition. God would have Israel's hearts kept low by actually going into booths and tabernacles. Though they had fair and sumptuous houses in the city, yet they were to go out, and live in their booths a while. You might think, Was it not enough for the priest to bid them remember their dwelling in tabernacles, but they must go forth from their houses, and abide in booths?

II. A second end of this feast was, to bless God for all the fruits of the earth they had received, when they had gathered in their vintage. The feast of pentecost was to bless God for their first-fruits, and their harvest; but now they were to join all together, and to bless God for all the fruits of the earth. That this is God's end, is clear in Deut. xvi. 13—15. "Thou shalt observe the feast of tabernacles seven days, after that thou hast gathered in thy corn and thy wine: and thou shalt rejoice," &c.; "because the Lord thy God shall bless thee in all thine increase, and in all the works of thy hands, therefore thou shalt surely rejoice."

From hence there is this lesson.

It is useful to remember what a poor condition we were once in, and the uncertainty of all things we have, even when we have got our riches into our houses. We think them uncertain when they are growing in the field, but after the vintage was gotten in, then they were to keep the feast of tabernacles, to remember the uncertain condition of all things in the world: this we are very loth to do, it is unsuitable to our natures, and therefore this feast of tabernacles was much neglected among the Jews. When God carried them into Babylon, and brought them back again into their own country, they kept the feast of tabernacles more solemnly than ever they had done; Neh. viii. 17, "Since the days of Joshua the son of Nun unto that day had not the children of Israel done so;" they never kept the feast of tabernacles so solemnly from their first coming into Canaan, as then they did. Now, having come out of prison, they could remember the uncertainty of things in the world; men forget this, but if they be driven from house and home, and lose all, then they remember what they have heard and confessed of the uncertainty of all worldly things. Some of our brethren who are plundered and driven from their habitations, if God should ever restore them to their habitations again, their hearts would be enlarged in blessing God, they would be more sensible of the uncertainty of the comforts of the creature than before.

III. The feast of tabernacles had an aim at Christ and the state of a Christian. It was to typify Jesus Christ coming into the world, and pitching his tent amongst us; as John i. 14, he "dwelt amongst us;" he came and pitched his tabernacle amongst us, ἐσκήνωσεν ἐν ἡμῖν. The state of a Christian, likewise, is a tabernacle; 2 Cor. v. 1, "If our earthly house of this tabernacle be dissolved:" till we go where Jesus Christ is gone before us, to prepare mansions for us, our dwelling is in tabernacles.

In the offerings that God appointed to offer in this feast, Numb. xxix. 12, there are some things very observable, but it is difficult to understand their precise meaning. The feast was to be kept seven days; the first day was a great day, and the last day a great day; the first day thirteen bullocks were to be offered, and fourteen lambs; the second day but twelve bullocks, the third day but eleven, the fourth day but ten, every day one decreased, and the last day there was but one offered. Now, divers expositors have sought to find out the meaning of this. Calvin confesses that he does not understand its meaning, and rather than guess, I will, saith he, be silent in it; and yet he ventures upon a very unlikely conjecture, therefore I shall not name it. That which is most likely seems to be in two things: the first is, they must offer every day less and less, that is, (saith another interpreter.) to show their increase in sanctification, that they should grow to more and more perfection every day of their feast, and so have less need of sacrifices than they had before. Thus, it will afford a good note to us, that when we keep days to God, every day we should grow more and more in sanctification, and have less and less sin to answer for, than we had before.

Another interpretation is, that it was to show the cessation of the sacrifices of the Jews, that they were to decrease day by day; and this I take rather to be the meaning, because the last day but one bullock was offered, and yet that was the great day of the feast. "In the last day, that great day of the feast, Jesus stood and cried, saying, If any man thirst, let him come unto me, and drink," John vii. 37. There is somewhat to be noted about Christ there: though it is true it was the feast of dedication, which was their own feast, from whence many would prove the lawfulness of holy-days, yet the truth is, upon examination you shall find there is scarce strength enough from that place to prove it, though it be lawful to take the advantage of such times; but it will appear there, that it was the feast of tabernacles, as in 2 Chron. viii. 9. Their feast of the dedication of the temple was at the same time as the feast of tabernacles. One thing is to be observed from Christ's being at the feast. Why did Christ upon the great day of the feast cry out thus, "If any man thirst, let him come unto me, and drink?" One reason may be, because when men are most strongly possessed with the uncertainties of all outward things in the world, they are fit to entertain the gospel, fit to hear of Jesus Christ. When their hearts are taken off from the world, and they look upon all things here as unsettled, the conclusion of that feast is a special preparation to the gospel. Isa. xl. 6, 7, &c., the preparation to the good tidings of the gospel, is the proclamation that "All flesh is grass, and all the goodness thereof is as the flower of the field;" yea, the withering of the grass and the fading of the flower must be proclaimed again and again. And then seasonably and acceptably it follows, ver. 9, "O Zion, that bringest good tidings," &c., "say unto the cities of Judah, Behold your God!"

Tremelius thinks, that the expression of Christ at this time had reference to the custom of the Jews at this feast. At the feast of tabernacles the Jews were wont with great joy to bring water out of the river of Shiloh to the temple, where, being delivered to the priest, he poured it out upon the altar, together with wine, and all the people sung that song of Isaiah, "With joy shall ye draw water out of the wells of salvation." Isa. xii. 3. Though it was their own invention, Christ improves it, as if he said, What do you expect from this ceremony of yours? your custom will die and perish in the use of it, but come to me, and there you shall have water; I am the well of salvation; a spring of grace shall be continually in the heart of that man that believeth in me.

One note more is observable in this feast. We have a prophecy, that the feast of tabernacles should be kept in the times of the gospel, that is, in the truth of it, not in the ceremony. In Zech. xiv. 16, there is a prophecy, that when Christ comes, then all people shall "worship the King, the Lord of hosts, and keep the feast of tabernacles." Why is it there prophesied that all people shall come and keep that feast? The reason this feast is named may be this; because in the times of the gospel, men shall acknowledge their outward comforts to be from God, and the uncertainty of all things here, and that they are strangers and pilgrims on earth. In the times of the gospel this shall be made more evident to the hearts of people than ever before. The more Jesus Christ is known in the world, the more shall the hearts of men be taken up with this knowledge, and of the uncertainty of every creature, and have them taken off from the comforts of the world, and never expect any settled condition here, but account themselves pilgrims and strangers. It is a sign that the gospel has prevailed with your spirits, if you have your hearts taken off from the creature, and you look upon yourselves as strangers in the world, and expect an abiding city; then do you keep, in an evangelical sense, this feast of tabernacles.

Thus you have had a view of the chief of the Jewish feasts, which God threatens here shall cease.

There are only these three observations to be drawn from all together.

Obs. 1. Even those things which are appointed by God himself, if once abused, God will not own them, they are then accounted ours rather than God's. "Her sabbaths;" why not my sabbaths? why not God's sabbaths? God appointed them, but because they were abused, God would not own them: "her sabbaths, and her solemn feasts." The ordinances of God, though never so good in themselves, if you pollute them, God rejects them, they are your ordinances then, and not God's. See then that all ordinances are as God would have them.

Obs. 2. It is a grievous and lamentable affliction upon any people, for God to deprive them of his sabbaths and ordinances. His ordinances are included in their solemn feasts. Nay, (saith God,) you will go on in your wickedness, and would put me off with your sabbaths and solemn meetings, which were once my ordinances, and attempt to satisfy me with them, though you continue in your wickedness; no, you shall be deprived of them, you shall have no more sabbaths, no more solemn feast days. It is a sad affliction for a people to have no more sabbaths. How many of you neglect solemn meetings of God's people! Time may come, when God will rend these privileges from you, and then your consciences will grate upon you: Oh the sabbaths that once we had! oh the solemn meetings that once we enjoyed! but our hearts were vain and light; we did not make use of them, and now they are gone. Perhaps thou mayst be cast into a jail, or a dungeon, and there thou shalt keep thy sabbaths, and think upon thy solemn meetings. Oh how unworthy is this land of sabbaths! how did many persecute those that kept sabbaths! never any such thing occurred in any Christian nation: other places, though they are somewhat loose upon their sabbaths, yet they never persecute them that will keep sabbaths. How justly might God have taken away our sabbaths! let us acknowledge God's free grace. What reproach has it been in England to assemble to hear sermons! how justly might God have taken away these solemn assemblies from us long before this! Let us pray, that whatever judgment God sends upon us, he will not take away our sabbaths, nor our solemn assemblies; but that we may still enjoy those we have, and enjoy them to better purpose than ever we have done.

Obs. 3. God has no need of our services. If God call upon us to worship him, it is for our good, not for any need he has of what we do. What do I care, saith God, whether I have any sabbath kept or no? I can provide for my glory, whatever becomes of your duties; I need not, I can be glorious without you.

But these threats are but to take away spiritual things; carnal hearts think, if they may live and prosper in the world, what care they for sabbaths, and for solemn meetings? Tell them of taking away ordinances, or removing the truth of God's worship, what is that to them? Let us have our peace, our trading, and our outward blessings, and truth will follow. O no, a gracious heart will rather reason thus; O Lord, let us have thy ordinances, let us have thy gospel, and then for our vines and fig trees, our tradings and our outward blessings, we will leave them to thy disposal; if thou wilt give us thy sabbaths and thy ordinances, we will trust thee for our vines and for our fig trees. But if the Lord be so angry as to deny us his ordinances, how can we think that he will be so merciful to us, as to continue our peace, or our civil liberties? No, be sure, if truth be gone, vines and fig trees will not stay long: the next words therefore are, "I will destroy her vines and her fig trees." The Lord may suffer those places that never had sabbaths and ordinances to prosper in their civil peace a long time; but where they had these, and the wrath of God is so incensed as to take them away, it cannot be expected that outward peace and plenty can hold long there. "Seek ye first the kingdom of God and his righteousness," saith Christ, "and all these things shall be added unto you." No, (say they,) let us first seek the kingdom of earth, and the things of heaven will be added to us; which shows the slightness of their account of heavenly things. As the paper and the thread in a shop is given in with the commodity, if a man bargain for the paper and thread, and think the commodity will be given in, what a folly were it? Many men have their thoughts altogether upon the things of this life, and they think the gospel will be given into the bargain; as, if they have peace, they shall, no question, have truth; as if the gospel were the paper and the thread, and the things of the world were the commodities. It is your wisdom, if you would enjoy outward peace, to fix your hearts on ordinances, to cry to God for ordinances, and then God will take care you shall sit under your vines and under your fig trees in peace.

Ver. 12, 13. And I will destroy her vines and her fig trees, whereof she hath said, These are my rewards that my lovers have given me: and I will make them a forest, and the beasts of the field shall eat them. And I will visit upon her the days of Baalim, wherein she burned incense to them, and she decked herself with her earrings and her jewels, and she went after her lovers, and forgat me, saith the Lord.

In the former verse God threatens Israel to take away spiritual mercies, their sabbaths, and ordinances, and solemn feasts; but because such a judgment would not be so grievous to many as the destroying of the fruit of the ground, the spoiling of their land, and the loss of those things wherein their riches and outward comforts lay, therefore God joins this threat with the former, "And I will destroy her vines and her fig trees." In vines and fig trees there is a synecdoche, by these are meant all her outward prosperity; I will not lop their vines, I will not cut down some branches of their fig trees only, but destroy them.

Obs. If God stand before a judgment comes, he comes fearfully indeed, he comes with destroying judgments; then he strikes at the very root of a people's prosperity, and leaves them hopeless of ever recovering themselves. It concerns us to humble ourselves under God's hand, when he only cuts off some branches of our vines and fig trees, of our outward comforts, lest ere long there follows a destroying judgment, cutting to the very root. Does God come into your families, and cut off a branch or two, a child or two? Humble your souls before him, he may cut down the tree, stub up the root ere long, come to the mother or the father, and so root out the family. So in a nation: that is a very remarkable passage in Ezek. xxi. 27, "I will overturn, overturn, overturn." This was spoken to Israel, and to Israel when they were in captivity, and yet God threatens them thus even there, "I will overturn, overturn, overturn."

"Whereof she hath said, These are my rewards that my lovers have given me:" the word נְתָנָה translated "rewards," signifies merces meretricia. It comes from נָתַן which signifies to hire with wages, but such wages as are given to harlots; and yet idolatry makes her so impudent, that she uses that very word, "These are my rewards."

Obs. 1. Whoredom is a costly sin to many a man. Many men secretly waste and consume their estates, and their neighbours wonder how they come to be so low. Uneleanness is as a gangrene, as it will consume the body, so the purse; it beggars many men, when the world little thinks the cause.

Obs. 2. God may suffer men in wickedness to prosper, to gain their hearts' desires. "These are my rewards," these, that you call idols, give me liberal rewards, I have what I served them for.

Obs. 3. It is a dangerous thing for sinners to look back to the sins which they have committed, and then to bless themselves, as if they had gained by them. Before a sin is committed, the sinner by temptation may be persuaded there is much gain to be had; and in the very act of commission, he may find some flash of false contentment and delight; but usually after the act is over, when he looks back, he sees nothing but shame, guilt, and horror. Sinners dare scarcely look back to their sins, after they are committed, except such as are most desperately hardened; but here you see, they look at what they have done, and bless themselves, as if they had obtained a goodly reward by it. As the sight of the evil consequences of sin is a means to humble, so the apprehending of gain by sin is a special means to harden in sin. Judas thought it a brave thing to get the thirty pieces of silver, yet when he saw the evil fruit his sin had produced, he looked with horror upon his sin, and his soul sunk under the burden of it. If Judas, looking back upon his sin, has his spirit filled with horror, what hope is there then of any one, who, looking back upon it, blesteth himself as a gainer by it? If a man prospers, either at the time he sins, or more a little after he has committed it than he did before, or so prospers as that he conceives his sin to be some way instrumental to bring in the gain that he obtained; this hardens exceedingly.

Obs. 4. It is a provoking sin to attribute the blessings of God to our own wicked, sinful ways, and thereby to harden our hearts in those ways. "These are my rewards that my lovers have given me." It is too much to attribute any of God's blessings to second causes, even to our lawful endeavours, to our industry, to our care, to any instruments; but to attribute them to our wickedness is abominable. God expects glory in the acknowledgment of every mercy, and improvement of it to him: where then there is not only a denial of this to him, but a giving it to his enemy, to wickedness, to the devil, whom he hates; this goes exceeding near to the heart of God. It is a great part of our sanctifying of God's name in the use of all the creatures, to acknowledge him in all, that all depends upon him, and thereby to be quickened in his service: but to think all depends upon that which is contrary to God, and therefore, if we want what we would have, to begin to think we have not served our lusts enough, and to be urged to serve them more; this exceedingly provokes him. I will give you a notable example of this wretchedness of man's heart. There was a consultation of many of the Lutheran ministers of Germany, in Hamburgh, to find out the cause why the hand of God was so heavy in those parts of Germany where they lived, that so they might reform what was amiss, and make their peace with God. The issue of their consultations came to this, that the reason of all their calamities and troubles was, because the images of their churches were not adorned enough; and therefore, for preventing the continuance of those calamities, they unanimously consented to improve all the strength they had, to beautify and adorn the images in their churches more. It was a sad thing for ministers who profess against popery, as the Lutherans do, to keep images in churches. But could it be thought that they should be thus vain, yet wicked, as to attribute the unfruitfulness of their vines and fig trees to the want of their superstitious vanities, and to bring their consultations to this conclusion, that if they were more zealous in the one, they should be more prosperous in the other? was not this a sore and a grievous evil, going near the heart of God?

Many attribute the increase of their estates to their lying, their overreaching, and their swearing, and rejoice, This I have gained by these ways. Zeph. i. 9, God threatens to "punish all those that leap on the threshold, which fill their masters' houses with violence and deceit," that is, the servants of great men, who by oppression and fraud bring in gain to their masters' houses, and then they leap upon the threshold for joy, applauding themselves in the success they have had in their wicked ways. It is usual if men meet with prosperous success, to bless themselves, as if this success came because of their ways, let them be never so wicked. Of late, have not some made the world believe they have had great success, and have argued that their ways were good, and that God had blessed them on account of them, though we know their ways are such as bring most fearful guilt upon themselves and their families; we have all cause to tremble for them, and to pray, "O Lord, forgive them, for they know not what they do;" and as for the success of which they boast, who would not, if he might, wish such success to his enemy?

Obs. 5. Idolaters encourage themselves in their ways from the good they suppose they derive by them; how much more should the saints encourage themselves in the rewards they have from their lover, from the Lord Christ! Psal. cxix. 56, "This I had," (saith David,) "because I kept thy precepts;" this is the reward I have had from my lover; I bless God, I have in some measure got my heart to break before the Lord, and to melt after him, and the Lord has come mercifully to me. Though there is no worthiness in what I have done, yet the Lord has been gracious, he has encouraged his poor servant in his way: these and these mercies the Lord has given me as a fruit of seeking him; he has not said to the seed of Jacob, Seek ye me in vain; I have sought for comfort, for peace, and at last it is come: I will call upon the name of the Lord as long as I live. We should consider what mercies from God we have, and rejoice in them; these are the rewards, these are the love-tokens, that come from our dearly beloved. Hereafter, when the saints come to heaven, how will they bless God, and bless themselves in their God, for those glorious things, those blessed rewards, that they shall then receive from their beloved, and enjoy for ever with him! Then they shall triumphantly say, 'The world said heretofore, What profit is there in serving of the Lord? But blessed be God that I went on, notwithstanding, in the ways of God, and now I see there is profit to purpose: O these joys! O this glory! O this crown! O this happiness! these are the rewards that I have from my beloved.'

Obs. 6. Whatever any man gets by sin, or looks upon as gotten by sin, or uses as a means to harden himself in sin, the curse of God is in it, and it will rend him from it, or he shall never enjoy it. "I will destroy her vines and her fig trees, whereof she hath said, These are my rewards that my lovers have given me." Ahab blessed himself in getting Naboth's vineyard by the device of Jezebel; 1 Kings xxi. 16, he "rose up to go down to take the vineyard of Naboth the Jezreelite, to take possession of it;" but, ver. 19, "Thus saith the Lord, Hast thou killed, and also taken possession? In the place where dogs licked the blood of Naboth, shall dogs lick thy blood, even thine." What! you have got the vineyard, you have obtained possession; how? by wickedness. Though you bless yourselves in it now, as a reward of your vile ways, certainly the Lord will either force you, in the anguish and terror of your souls, to vomit up those sweet morsels again, or some fearful judgment of God upon you will rend them from you. That which many have obtained by unjust and sinful ways, they have rejoiced in for a while; but after a while that estate has been in their consciences, as drops of scalding lead in the very apple of a man's eye; so terrible has it been unto them. I will give you a late example, that came to my own hands, in restoring that that was wrongfully obtained many years ago, from one near myself. I name it because the party desired that the thing might be made known to the glory of God. He sent that which he had wrongfully obtained, many years after, with a letter, with these expressions; "Many a throb of conscience had I about it, many an aching heart, and many promises have I made of restitution, and thousands of times have I wished unto you your silver again. What shall I do? to keep it, it is to continue in sin; to give it to the poor, alas, it is not mine own, or at least the evil purchase of gain hoarded up in the stuff of my iniquity; to send it home, the owner is dead: I would to God I had sent it before, that it might not have lain so hard upon me; but seeing that is past, and cannot be recalled, here I send it you; I ask God forgiveness, and I ask you forgiveness, and pray you fail not to pray for me. Sweet Jesus, forgive me." It was kept divers years, but was biting all the while in the conscience of the poor man, and at length it must break forth in such expressions as these. Consider this, every one who has obtained any thing dishonestly, and has blest himself in it; This is the reward I have got by such a cunning device, by such an unjust and deceitful way: you got it cleverly, and have enjoyed it, and been merry with it; well, one day it may thus lie grating in your consciences. Oh then how terrible will it be to you! The best way to be rid of the rewards of sin, when they begin to cause aching in your consciences, is to cast them out yourselves; all your praying to God for forgiveness will never ease you without, if you be able to restore; but if you will not do so, God may come by some hideous judgment, and force them from you in spite of your hearts; and then how terrible will it be to you when you look upon them as being rent by God from you! Oh, now I must part with all that gain and sweetness, that such ways of sin have brought me! the gain, the sweet is gone; but the guilt, the curse, the dregs, the filth remain upon my spirit, and, for aught I know, must stick by me to all eternity. God's judgments will come upon you one day, as strainers, to let out whatever is sweet and delightful to you, and to keep in the filth and dregs. Remember this, you that have got rewards by sinful ways, your rewards of sin may now delight you, but there is a time you shall have rewards for your sins that will not please you.

"I will make them as a forest." God threatens his people to make them as a forest; the Seventy read, Θήσομαι αὐτὰ εἰς μαρτύριον, that is, μαθήματα, I will put those things (the rewards) as a witness. You will say, Here is a great difference; "I will make them as a forest," and, I will put those things as a witness: those things, that is, those rewards; they rejoice in the rewards of their iniquity, but I will make them as a witness against them. Certainly there is a truth in this; those things in which you rejoice, as obtained by sin, the Lord will make rise up and witness against you. Be sure now you cast them out, they will else be witnesses against you another day. A guilty man would be glad, when he knows one that would witness against him was dead, or out of the way: have you gained any thing by a sinful course? put it out of the way, for otherwise it will be a witness against you, either upon your sick bed, or at the great day of judgment. But how can these two readings be reconciled, I will make them as a witness against you, and "I will make them as a forest." It is true the English words seem to be very wide from the Septuagint, but there is an easy mistake that might cause the Seventy to render them thus, I will put them as a witness, for יָרֵי signifies a forest in the Hebrew, and יָרֵי to witness, so it is used Zech. iii. 6. Montanus reads those words, contestabatur angelus: now those that are skilful in the Hebrew know that, there being no more difference in the words than in those letters ר and י which are so like one another, there might easily be a mistake. But we take it as it is here, "I will make them as a forest." The church is God's garden, hedged in with God's protection, but God threatens to take away the hedge, and let in the wild beasts. The wild beasts are one of God's sore judgments often threatened; those who will not be subject to the blessed holy God, shall be subject unto the ravening and rage of beasts; and it is probable the Seventy understood it literally of the judgment of noisome beasts to be let in upon them; for I find that they add to the words, "the beasts of the field shall eat them," καὶ τὰ περὶ τῶν οὐρανῶν καὶ τὰ ἐπιτῆρά τῆς γῆς, and the fowls of the heaven and the creeping things of the earth shall devour; but they are not in the Hebrew text, and therefore we must let them pass, and only speak of what we have here, of the beasts' eating. Now, according to most interpreters, I am persuaded that it is the intention of the Holy Ghost, to express a judgment beyond the interpretation, of letting in noisome beasts, namely, the Assyrians, the adversaries of Israel, who should come upon them as ravening beasts to devour them.

Obs. 1. Sin makes men like beasts, the beasts of the earth. He means the Assyrians, great ones, and yet he calls them the beasts of the earth. To be like a beast is worse than to be a beast; for to be a beast is but to be as God made the creature, it is no dishonour to it; but to be like a beast is the corruption of a creature, and the deformity of it, the worst deformity that possibly can be. Chrysostom shows it thus, Beasts (saith he) have but some particular evil, take the worst of all, as the swine, sensuality; the tiger and the bear, cruelty; the fox, subtlety, &c.; but wicked men have all evils that all beasts of the world have in them. One wicked man has the sensuality of a swine, and cruelty of a tiger, of a bear, the subtlety of a fox; and whatever is set out emblematically by any beast, a wicked man has it all in his heart; yea, and further, wicked men are worse than beasts in this, that they corrupt themselves in those things which they have in common with beasts, more than beasts do. As the drunkard corrupts himself in his drink, which a beast will not do; a glutton corrupts himself in his meat, more than ordinarily a beast will do; and that I think is the meaning of that text in the Epistle of Jude, ver. 10, "These speak evil of those things which they know not: but what they know naturally, as brute beasts, in those things they corrupt themselves." As for their intellectual parts, they will take upon them as if they knew much; but the truth is, they understand little, and yet will speak evil of that they know not. It is a dreadful text against such, as cry out against men and their ways, when in truth they know not what they are. But, further, "what they know naturally, as brute beasts, in those things they corrupt themselves;" that is, in things they know merely by sense, as they know by tasting, and by smelling, as brute beasts do, in those very things they corrupt themselves more than brute beasts, that is, by excess in meats and drinks.

Would not any account it to be one of the greatest judgments that could befall him, if God should turn him into the fashion of a beast while he lives in this world, though he should still retain the mind of a man? Suppose God should inflict this judgment upon a drunkard, he would still have his intellectual parts as he now has, but his body should be turned into the form of a swine, or a railer into the form of a dog, as they say Heeuba the wife of Priam was, for her railing: would not this be a fearful judgment? Lactantius, from Cicero, observes, If it would be such a judgment as a man would be willing to endure any misery in the world, rather than to have his body turned into the fashion of a beast; is it not as great a misery to keep the fashion of the body, and to have the mind become like a beast, to keep a human shape with the soul of a beast? surely it is worse than to have the shape of a beast with the soul of man.

Obs. 2. God looks upon wicked men, who do great things in the world, with a contemptible eye. "The beasts shall devour;" that is, the great king of Assyria, and all his courtiers above him, and cavaliers with him, shall come to devour them; they are but beasts. God speaks in a contemptible manner, as he does against Sennacherib king of Assyria; in Isa. xxxvii. 29. God threatens to "put a hook in his nose, and a bridle in his lips," because of his rage and of his tumult; that is, he would use him as a beast, to hook his nose, and to put a bridle into his jaws. Mark, likewise, how contemptibly God speaks of the great king of Babylon, and his whole army, Joel ii. 20, "His stink shall come up, and his ill savour shall come up, because he hath done great things." And so in Psal. lix. 7, "They belch out with their mouth," (saith David,) "they make a noise like a dog, and go round about the city." David means his adversaries that were about Saul in his court. And in Ezek. xxxviii. 3, 4, God says to "the chief prince of Meshech and Tubal, I will put hooks in thy jaws." In Dan. vii. the four great monarchies, Babylonian, Persian, Grecian, Roman, are described by four beasts, and the fourth monarchy, which is by most interpreted the Roman empire, Dan. vii. 7, is described to be "dreadful and terrible, and strong exceedingly; and it had great iron teeth: it devoured and brake in pieces, and stamped the residue with the feet of it: and it was diverse from all the beasts that were before it." Now, this beast raged first in the heathen empire, and after it gave its power to the beast antichrist, as you may read in Rev. xiii., and that beast was like a leopard, spotted, full of uncleanness and filth; or, as some translate it, a panther, who by his scent draws other beasts to him, but devours them; and his feet like a bear, and his head like a lion. Thus, you see how God describes the great ones of the world as beasts, and looks with contempt upon them.

Obs. 3. It is a sore and heavy judgment for a people to be delivered up to the rage of cruel adversaries. "The beasts shall devour them." I will give you up to cruel, wicked men, who will bring you under; you will not be obedient to me, but to them you shall. Hence David prayed, "Let me not fall into the hand of man;" when God put him to choose what judgment he would have, he was quickly resolved to refuse to be given up to the hands of men; that he knew was dreadful: and, Psal. lv. 6, 7, he prays, "Oh that I had wings like a dove! for then would I flee away and be at rest. Lo, then would I wander far off, and remain in the wilderness." In the wilderness! why he would be among the wild beasts in the wilderness, and yet he cries, Oh that I had the wings of a dove! What is the reason? It was because of the cruelty of Saul and his courtiers: David apprehended that he had better fall into the hands of tigers and wild beasts in the wilderness, than into theirs. When Scipio came against Numantia in Spain, and the inhabitants were afraid it would be taken, all the young men first took all the old people in the city, and killed them with as easy a death as they could; then they brought all the riches and treasure of the city to the market-place, and set all on fire; and after that they all took poison; and thus, in one day, old and young, and all in the city, were quite destroyed, rather than they would fall into the hands of their enemies. "Deliver my soul," saith David, "from the sword; my darling from the power of the dog," Psal. xxii. 20. The power of the dog, and the sword, is but one the interpretation of the other. Paul declares, 1 Cor. xv. 32, "If after the manner of men I have fought with beasts at Ephesus:" some interpret this literally, that he did indeed really fight with beasts, as being one way of torment to which they subjected the Christians; but most interpreters think that the meaning is, with men that were beastly, with cruel men; and Estius thinks the men to be those who are mentioned in Acts xix. 9, "Divers were hardened, and spake evil of that way before the multitude." Paul then "departed from them, and separated the disciples." Paul saw that it was a most devilish design, to get the multitude together, and there to speak against him and his doctrine, and against Christ; upon which the spirit of Paul was so provoked, that "he departed from them, and separated the disciples." Thus with many, the more sedition is raised, the better are their designs furthered. Christ tells his disciples, Mark xvi. 17, 18, that serpents shall do them no hurt, poison shall not injure them, and they shall have power over devils; but in Matt. x. 17, "Beware of men;" they might say, Why, blessed Master, serpents shall do us no hurt, we shall have power over devils, what need we be afraid of men? But Christ bids them take heed of men; as if there were more danger from wicked men, than from devils, or from serpents. Therefore St. Paul, in 2 Thess. iii. 2, prays that they may be delivered from ἀρόπων, absurd men; those that had lost the very principle of reason, and were even as beasts. There is a generation risen up amongst us, who have sucked the poison of the old serpent, who are set on fire of hell, and the poison of asps is under their lips. As Romulus and Remus, the founders of Rome, were, as reported, suckled by wolves; so these, who desire to build up Rome again, are like the first founders of that Rome, they seem to be men suckled by wolves; or as the poets feign of Lycaon, turned into wolves for their cruelty; or as it is said of their St. Dominic, who was the father of the Dominicans, that before he was born, his mother dreamed that she brought forth a wolf, with a firebrand in his mouth; and according to that representation in her dream, so he proved afterwards. If we look at the cruelty and rage of these men, we may think, that their mothers have indeed brought forth wolves with firebrands in their mouths: Satan rages in them, and we hope therefore his time is but very short. Had they prevailed, to bring every thing under their power, no chronicle of any nation under heaven, would afford similar stories of horrid cruelties, as the chronicles of these times. Where they have prevailed, in Ireland, such barbarisms have commenced, as here would have risen to the perfection of cruelty. The Lord deliver us from being scourged with these scorpions. Let us humble our souls before God, that God may not humble us before such beasts; that he may not say that England shall be as a forest, and these beasts shall devour them. In the mean time, let us not be offended at their prevailing in some places, for then we should be as beasts ourselves. "So foolish was I and ignorant, I was as a beast before thee," saith David. God saith, He will require of the beasts the blood of his people, Gen. ix. 5. Certainly, God will require of these beasts the precious blood they have drunk: had it been corrupt blood, God would not so much have cared for it, but it is the blood of his saints. Let us believe that God will turn the rage of man, the rage of beasts, to his praise, Psal. lxxvi. 10. Surely the Lord cannot possibly behold without indignation his lambs, who are so precious in his eyes, torn and worried by such beasts as these. We may well say with the prophet, Hab. i. 2-4, "O Lord, how long shall I cry, and thou wilt not hear! even cry out unto thee of violence, and thou wilt not save! Why dost thou show me iniquity, and cause me to behold grievance? for spoiling and violence are before me; and there are that raise up strife and contention. Therefore the law is slackened, and judgment doth never go forth: for the wicked doth compass about the righteous; therefore wrong judgment proceedeth." When the Jews made use of Philo to apologize for them to Caius the emperor, Caius used him very ruggedly; when he came out of his presence, to encourage the Jews he said, Surely Caius will arm God against himself for us.

Si nemo est quin emori, malit quam converti in aliquam figuram bestiarum, quamvis hominis sit mentem habiturus, quanto est miserius, in hominis figura animo esse feraculo. Lactant. l. 5. c. 1.

But, some may say, surely these men are not beasts, for they are skilful warriors: mark that text of Ezek. xxi. 31, "I will deliver thee into the hand of brutish men, and skilful to destroy;" they are skilful to destroy, and yet brutish men. We have a promise from God, and our prayers should hasten its fulfilment; "I will cause the evil beasts to cease out of the land;—the beast of the land shall no more devour them," Ezek. xxxiv. 25, 28. Oh that that time were come! Oh that the Lord would so work for us as to cause our beasts to cease out of our land, that they might no more devour! Such a time is coming; "No lion shall be there, nor ravenous beast shall be found there; but the redeemed shall walk there," Isa. xxxv. 9. In the mean time, though our brethren endure hard things by these cruel beasts, and though God may perhaps bring some of us under the rage of them, let us be patient, and comfort ourselves in these promises.

Ver. 13. And I will visit upon her the days of Baalim, wherein she burned incense to them, and she decked herself with her earrings and her jewels, and she went after her lovers, and forgat me, saith the Lord.

This is the conclusion of the threatenings in this chapter; now God will punish them for all their sins together. If a generation succeed in wickedness, God may justly come upon that generation, for all the sins of former generations; all the blood from Abel to Zachariah shall be required of this generation. "I will visit upon her all the days of Baalim;" ever since they served Baal. Let men take heed of continuing in the ways of sin: who can tell what sin may put a period to God's patience with a nation, a family, or an individual? Though God has spared heretofore, upon the next sin committed he may put such a period to forbearance as to come upon the family, not only for that sin, but for all the sins it has committed since it was a family; and so for all the sins of a nation, since it was a nation; and for all thy sins, ever since thou wast a sinner! Men go on awhile in the ways of sin prosperously, but when God visits, what will become of them? "What will ye do in the day of visitation, and in the desolation which shall come from far? to whom will ye flee for help? and where will ye leave your glory?" Isa. x. 3. Now you are merry, now you fear nothing, but "what will ye do in the day of visitation?" what will become of you then? whither will you flee then? "and where will you leave your glory?"

"I will visit upon her the days of Baalim;" in the plural number. Baalim; by which some think, and not improbably, that their inferior gods are meant, which they called Baalim; for the heathen had their chief gods, and their Dii minores, their lesser gods, who were as mediators to their chief gods; and so our papists have their Dii minores, lesser gods, who are tutelar gods, either over nations, or over families, or over particular diseases, &c. As they say, for England, St. George; for France, St. Dennis; for Ireland, St. Patrick; for Wales, St. David; for Scotland, St. Andrew, &c. These saints are in imitation of the heathens. Baal, or, in the Chaldee dialect, Bel, was the first king of Babylon after Nimrod, the first that was deified, and reputed as a god after death; whence those men who were deified after their death, and worshipped as gods, as the papists worship their saints, they called Baalim; as from Julius Cæsar, those kings who followed after were called Cæsars. This interpretation throws light upon 1 Cor. viii. 5, 6, "Though there be that are called gods, whether in heaven or in earth, (as there be gods many, and lords many,) but to us there is but one God, the Father, of whom are all things, and we in him; and one Lord Jesus Christ." If the apostle had spoken in Hebrew, it would have been, "Though there be many Baalim, there is to us but one God, and one Baal;" for in Hebrew, Baal is Lord; there are many gods, (say they,) i. e. divers greater gods, and many lords, i. e. many Baalim, which are mediators to their chief gods; but to us (saith he) there is but one God, and but one Lord, but one Baal; we have not Baalim, not many mediators between us and God; but as we have but one God, so we have but one Lord, but one Mediator, who in regard of his human nature is inferior to the Father, but yet such a Lord, "by whom are all things, and we by him:" the papists acknowledge but one God, but they have many lords, many mediators, many that must stand between God and them. This is a heathenish opinion.

Again, Baalim, in the plural number. Another reason not improbable, given by some, is, that it intimates the several images they had of their Baal, in various places, even in their private houses; for idolaters did not satisfy themselves with worshipping their gods in public, but worshipped them in their private houses also. Now, though the Jews had only two idols set up, one in Dan, and another in Bethel; yet they had some representations of those images in their private houses, which may be grounded upon Hos. x. 5, "Because of the calves of Beth-aven," that is, of Bethel, calves of Bethel. Why, how many calves were there there? there was but one calf set up there, and yet here it is plural: now the reason of that is given, that though there was but one calf set up for public worship, yet they had in their private families the picture of that calf, and so brought the worship of Baal into their families. A good lesson for Christians, not to satisfy themselves with public worship, but to bring as much of the worship of God as they can into their families.

"Wherein she burned incense to them." Incense was a typical signification of prayer, in two respects. First, in the sweet savour of it. And secondly, in its ascending by fire: so all our prayers should be as incense, sweet before the Lord, and ascend up with the fervency of zeal and faith: it is proper to God alone to have such incense burnt to him: the heathens burnt incense to their idols, imitating the worship of God.

"She decked herself with her earrings and her jewels." They worshipped their idols in a sumptuous manner, adorning themselves with costly apparel, especially in front: the word זָהָב translated jewels, signifies the nose jewel; and in Isa. iii. 21, is translated "nose jewels:" they hanged upon their faces jewels to make themselves beautiful before their idols. Harlots adorn themselves more pompously than grave matrons. By this many simple people are drawn to the love of idolatry, which is spiritual whoredom. They thought that God would accept of their service the rather, because of the costly jewels, that hung about their ears and nostrils. From whence

Obs. To think that God will accept our service the rather because of any apparel, or any thing of our own devising, is to deal with God as the heathens with their idols. We must take heed of that. The heathens instituted garments that they might be accepted.

A council in the year of Christ 333, by one of its canons, anathematizes all those who shall judge one vesture more holy than another. We are to learn from idolaters to beautify and adorn our souls when we come into the presence of God; did they deck their bodies and hang jewels about ears and noses, when they came before their idols for acceptance? let us beautify our souls every time we come before the living God. And would you know what fine clothes you should wear when you come into God's presence? I will tell you, and especially those women who delight so much in fine clothes, 1 Pet. v. 5, "Be clothed with humility:" the word ἐγκορβώσασθε, means, to clothe with a dress that gentlewomen used to wear in those times, of ribands about their heads: Well, (saith the apostle,) would you have a fine dress, ye women? "be clothed with humility," the finest dress you can possibly have. I will tell you of another garment, 1 Pet. iii. 4, adorned with "a meek and quiet spirit, which is in the sight of God of great price," πολυτέλεις, much set by of God, so translated in some of your books. If you come into God's presence with quiet and meek spirits, and clothed with humility, you will be beautiful in the very eyes of God; but withal remember, both men and women, except you come clothed and decked with the robe of Christ's righteousness, you can never find acceptance.

"She went after her lovers, and forgat me, saith the Lord." Their lovers were remembered, but I was forgotten, saith God. God here speaks as a man bemoaning his sad condition; as if he had said, How am I slighted by my people! the idols can be followed, they can be remembered; but I am neglected, I am forgotten; they have activity for their idols, but none for me; memory for them, but none for me!

Obs. God takes it very ill, when men can find memory, strength, and activity enough for their sinful ways, but none for him. Many complain of weakness, but who was ever so weak, but had strength enough to sin? though memories are weak, yet sinful ways can be recollected.

"Forgat me;" that is, first, they have forgotten what a God I am; secondly, what I have done for them, the great works I have done before them; thirdly, all their engagements to me. Many follow wicked ways, yet sometimes they have checks of conscience, some remembrances of God, and so long there is hope; but when a sinner has so far departed from God, and followed his ungodly ways, as that God is quite worn out of his thoughts, then he is in a sad case indeed. I appeal to you, is it not the case of some here? There was a time when you had mighty impressions of God upon your spirits, and then you could never transact your business, or go into the streets and fields, or awake in the night season, but the thought of God was in your hearts; but there was some haunt of wickedness which you hankered after, temptation came, and you have given way to it, and now, friend, you can go one day after another, and scarce think of God at all. Why have you no thoughts of God now, as you were wont to have? Now and then there come darting in some thoughts of him, but your guilty conscience knows they are very terrible to you; now you can never have a thought of God, but it is as a dagger at your heart. Well, take heed what thou doest, O sinner, go not on in thy sinful ways, till thou wearest out all thoughts of God. Some have done so, though they had checks of conscience. When they have been in wicked company, God has come into their thoughts, and troubled them; but they have gone to wicked company again, and some thoughts of God have followed them; but they have gone again and again, and now they have forgotten God as much if there were no God in heaven; as if God had nothing to do with them, and they nothing to do with God. Oh this is a sad condition indeed! If any of you are declining into such a condition as this, the Lord stop you this day; the Lord awaken your consciences! Ordinarily, the more prosperity men have, the more forgetful they are of the Lord. They "forgot me." As, Gen. xlviii. 20, Jacob set Ephraim before Manasseh, first Ephraim, then Manasseh; Ephraim signifies fruitfulness, and Manasseh signifies forgetfulness: thus it is with men; Ephraim comes first, fruitfulness, God is fruitful to you, and blesses your estates; and then comes Manasseh, forgetfulness. My brethren, if always we had such impressions of God as we have sometimes, oh how happy were it! When God shall again present himself to you, and cause you to remember what impressions of his Divine majesty once you had, it will terrify you. I will give you this rule for your lives: Live such lives, as by them you may hold forth to your brethren such remembrances of God, that they may conclude by what they see in your conversation, Certainly there are deep impressions of the Divine majesty upon the heart of this man; there was a time when he walked lightly, vainly, and foolishly; but now he is serious, considerate, heavenly, and walks with fear. If we act so, how joyful will it be to us hereafter, when God shall appear in his glory! Then to have our consciences tell us, I now see the glory of the great God shining, and, blessed be his name, even this God that appears so gloriously, has appeared often to my soul before; I have kept the impressions of his glory upon my heart, and he was continually in my thoughts. It is a wonder that God should ever think of us, who are so forgetful of him. Psal. viii. 4, "What is man, that thou art mindful of him?" What is man? The word  $\text{נשׂוּבֵה}$  translated man, some would derive from  $\text{נשׂוּב}$  which signifies forgetfulness. I find Eusebins taking it thus: "What is man, that thou shouldst remember him?" that is, what is forgetful man, that thou shouldst remember him? Yet I think it comes rather from  $\text{שׁוּבֵה}$  which signifies weakness, sickness: what is weak man, what is sick man? yet if this word come not from the root that signifies to forget, I am sure there is a word derived from such a root, used for women, because of their forgetfulness. We would be glad to have God remember us in the day of our adversity; let us remember God now. All you young ones, remember your Creator in the days of your youth: you old people, whatever you forget, forget not the Lord: let us all remember the Lord, who has remembered us all; who has remembered England in her low estate, for his mercy endureth for ever.

Concilium Gangrense anathematizat eos qui aliam vestem alia sanctiorem, aut plus facere ad pietatem, judicant.

Ver. 14. Therefore, behold, I will allure her, and bring her into the wilderness, and speak comfortably unto her.

The former part of this chapter was spent in conviction, threatening, and pronouncing of judgment; but from ver. 14 to the end, contains the opening up of the free and rich grace of God to Israel. It may be said of this chapter, "Mercy and truth are met together; righteousness and peace have kissed each other," Psal. lxxxv. 10. There is a blessed connexion between threatening of judgment and proffering of mercy; but where is the copula of this conjunction? what is it that knits these two together? Here is a bond of union, but it is a very wonderful one, it is in the first word, "therefore;" "Therefore I will allure her:" wherefore? This "therefore" has a very strange and wonderful wherefore, if we dwell on what precedes: "She went after her lovers, and forsook me, saith the Lord. Therefore, behold, I will allure her:" there needs indeed a behold to be put to this therefore. "Therefore, behold, I will allure her." Lyra could not see how these things could be joined together, therefore he thinks that this verse has not reference to the one immediately preceding, but to the words in the beginning of the chapter; "Say ye unto your brethren, Ammi, my people, "and to your sisters, Ruhamah," she that hath obtained mercy; "therefore, behold, I will allure her." And Cornelius à Lapide, not understanding the cause of such a connexion, would refer the beginning of this verse to the end of the seventh; "She shall say, I will go and return to my first husband; for then was it better with me than now: therefore, behold, I will allure her." Both of these, though learned men, are papists, and therefore understand but little of the free, rich grace of God, and hence are so much at a loss to connect what goes before with this "therefore;" but the right knowledge of the fulness and the riches of the grace of the covenant, will help us out of this difficulty, and tell us how these two, the greatness of man's sin and the riches of God's grace, may have a connexion one with another, and that by an illative "therefore." I confess, the Hebrew word is sometimes con-conjunctio ordinis, rather than causalis; a conjunction intimating the order, rather than at all implying the cause of a thing; but the reading here by way of inference, I conceive to be according to the scope of the Spirit of God, and it gives us this excellent note.

Obs. Such is the grace of God to those who are in covenant with him, that it takes occasion from the greatness of their sins, to show the greatness of his mercy; from the vileness of their transgressions, to declare the riches of his grace. And the Scripture often adopts this form of expression; as in Gen. viii. 21, "The Lord said in his heart, I will not again curse the ground any more for man's sake;" why? "for the imagination of man's heart is evil from his youth." Strange reasoning: "I will not curse the ground any more for man's sake, for the imagination of man's heart is evil from his youth." One would have thought it should have been rather, I will therefore curse the ground for man's sake, because the imagination of man's heart is evil from his youth; but the grace of God knows how to make another manner of inference than we could have imagined. So likewise, Isa. lvi. 17, 18, "For the iniquity of his covetousness was I wroth, and smote him: I hid me, and was wroth, and he went on forwardly in the way of his heart. I have seen his ways," saith God: now one would have thought that the next word should have been, I will therefore plague him, I will destroy him, I will curse him; but mark the words that follow, "and will heal him: I will lead him also, and restore comforts unto him and to his mourners." This is a consequent at least, if not an inference. David understood this reasoning to be agreeable to the covenant of grace, and therefore pleads thus with God, Psal. xxv. 11, "Pardon mine iniquity, for it is great:" Lord, my iniquity is great, therefore pardon it. Hearken, ye saints, hearken, I say, this is the great blessing of God to you, this is the glorious fruit of the covenant of grace; whereas otherwise your sins should have made you objects of God's hatred, they now render you objects of his pity and compassion.

I would saints alone heard me in this thing; but why do I say so? I will recall my word; let all sinners hear me, let the vilest, the worst sinners in the world, hear of the riches of the grace of God in this his covenant, that, if they belong to God's election, they may, seeing the fulness and the glory of God's grace, be enamoured and have their hearts ravished with it, and never be at rest till they get evidence to their souls, that God indeed has actually received them into this his covenant. If, then, God be pleased in the riches of free grace to make such an inference, let us take heed that we cross not the mind of the Spirit, by dwelling on the greatness of our sins, instead of the infiniteness of God's grace. God reasons thus: You have followed your lovers, you have forgotten me, therefore will I allure you. An unbelieving heart would make this inference: I have followed my lovers, I have followed after vanity and folly, and therefore God has rejected me, God will have no mercy upon me, I am undone, the gates of mercy are shut against me. O unbelieving heart, do not sin against the grace of God: he saith, You have forgotten me, therefore will I allure and speak comfortably to you; do not you say, I have forgotten the Lord, and therefore the Lord will for ever reject me: these discouraging, despairing therefore are very grievous to the Spirit of God, which would have us all entertain good thoughts of God, and not to regard him as a hard master. It is an excellent saying of Luther, That the whole Scripture principally aims at this; that we should not doubt, but that we should hope, and trust, and believe, that God is a merciful, bountiful, gracious, and patient God to his people. Master Bradford, in one of his epistles, thus expresses himself: O Lord! sometimes, methinks, I feel as if there were no difference between my heart and the wicked, a blind mind as they have, a stout, stubborn, rebellious spirit, a hard heart as they have; shall I therefore conclude thou art not my Father? nay, I will rather reason otherwise; because I do believe thou art my Father, I will come to thee that thou mightest enlighten this blind mind, that thou mightest soften this hard heart, and sanctify this unclean spirit. This is good reasoning indeed, and worthy of one who professes the gospel of Jesus Christ. Again, as the inference of the unbelieving heart is grievous to God's Spirit, as it draws it therefore from the greatness of sin against God's mercy; so the profane heart taking it therefore from the greatness of God's mercy, to the hardening of itself in sin, "treasures up for itself wrath against the day of wrath." What! shall God make his therefore from our sin to his mercy, and shall we make our therefore from his mercy back again to our sins? Where sin abounds, grace abounds; but where grace abounds, sin must not abound. Because God takes occasion from the greatness of our sins to display the greatness of his mercy, let not us take occasion from the greatness of his mercy to be emboldened in the greatness of our sins.

Tota Scriptura hoc agit ne dubitemus ac speremus, confidamus, credamus, legamus misericordem esse benignum, patientem. Luther.

"Behold." Here is a wonder in this inference to occupy the thoughts of men and angels to all eternity; behold, notwithstanding all this, yet you, men and angels, behold the fulness, the riches of God's grace. "I will allure her." What! will not God cast us away notwithstanding the greatness of our sins? let not us then reject God's ways, notwithstanding the greatness of any sufferings we meet with in them: this surely is most reasonable: you should bear with sufferings in God's ways, and yet embrace them, as God bears with sins in your hearts, and yet embraces you. But there follows, "I will allure." The Hebrew פיה word translated "allure," signifies to entice, and is often used in a bad acceptation, blandiendo decipere, to deceive by subtle enticing: the Seventy, in their translation, render it by παρωδω, "I will deceive them;" the Vulgate, by lactabo; and others, by seducam, "I will seduce them:" God made use of the word to express the sweet and gracious ways in which he intends to deal with them from his gracious affection towards them.

What God means by alluring his people, when once he is reconciled to them, may be expressed in these three things.

First, I will unfold the beauty and excellency of the infiniteness of my goodness and loving-kindness, and set in array before their souls the exceeding glory of the riches of my grace.

Secondly, Whereas before they went a whoring from me, because their hearts were allured by their lovers, proffering unto them various contentments, and so subtly beguiling their minds; I will now deal with them in a more powerful manner than their lovers possibly could, and outbid them all. Did their lovers proffer to them comfort? I will bid more than they. Did their lovers proffer gain? I will bid more gain. Did they proffer more honour and respect? I will outbid them in this too: so that I will persuade their hearts that they shall enjoy more in me, than they possibly could in all that their lovers could do for them. And indeed, then the gospel has the true, full, and gracious work upon the heart of a sinner, when it yields to its proffers, as finding that all that the world can bid is now outbidden, and that there is more gain in Christ than in all else besides. You know, when one comes to offer so much for a commodity, and another outbids him, he carries it away: so when the world and sin proffer to the soul such and such contents, if God come and outbid all, the bargain is made up, and God carries away the heart.

Thirdly, I will come upon them even unawares, and, as it were, steal away their hearts by a holy guile; as St. Paul tells us, that he caught the Corinthians with guile, 2 Cor. xii. 16. I will secretly insinuate myself, and draw their hearts in such a sweet and hidden way, that I will take them before they are aware. God deals thus with many a soul, taking it before it is aware, and the soul afterward comes to understand some of the dealings of his grace. Indeed the sinner himself sees he is not where he was before: Surely there has been something working on my heart; I find it is otherwise with me now than it has been; but how this comes to pass I understand not at present, but shall understand hereafter. "Or ever I was aware, my soul made me like the chariots of Ammi-nadib," Cant. vi. 12; that is, the chariots of "a willing people," so the word Ammi-nadib signifies. My heart was caught, and run amain to God, before ever I was aware; God's grace came in such a manner into my heart, and so ravished my soul, that it ran freely and swiftly after the Lord. And this is a blessed deceit when the heart is so deceived and so allured. Thus Christ sometimes sends such a glance of his eye into the heart of a sinner, as surprises the soul, and brings it involuntarily into love with the ways and with the truths of God. His grace has a subtlety in it, as well as the serpent, Prov. i. 4. It is a blessed thing to be thus outwitted, as I may so speak, for the grace of God to be too subtle for our sins. As I remember, Luther, when he was charged with apostacy, acknowledged it, saying, "I confess I am an apostate; but how? an apostate from the devil, falling off from the devil, and returning unto God; such an apostate I am." And happy that man who can say, Blessed be God, I am deceived indeed; but so deceived that my sin is beguiled: I am seduced, but it is out of the ways of sin, into the paths of God and of peace.

"And bring her into the wilderness."

There is some difficulty here; how comes this in between alluring, and speaking comfortably? I told you, that this second part of the chapter was altogether mercy; what can be meant then by bringing into the wilderness? Some, in order to show that it is yet a way of grace that God intends by this phrase, "and bring her into the wilderness," translate the words, after I have brought her into the wilderness, postquam perduxero eam. So Tremelius, who was a Jew, and therefore could well understand the Hebrew, renders them; telling us that ו which we translate and, is equivalent to אחר postquam, after, and then the meaning would be, after I have humbled them thoroughly, as I did their forefathers in the wilderness, then will I speak comfortably unto them. God humbled their forefathers in Egypt, yet that did not suffice; he humbled them afterwards in the wilderness, and then brought them into Canaan. Many times God sends successive afflictions upon his own people, to break their hearts, to humble them thoroughly, and at last "speaks comfortably unto them." It has been so with us; the Lord, not many years since, brought us into bondage, it might have humbled us and broken our hearts before him; but when we began to be delivered, the Lord brought us into the wilderness, and follows us with afflictions to this day, that he may thoroughly subdue us; and yet our trust is, that these trials are working together for our good, making straight the paths, and preparing the way for us into Canaan.

But, secondly, if you take it as it is here translated,

"I will allure her, and bring her into the wilderness;" then the scope of it may be not the afflicting part of the wilderness, but only a declaration to Israel, that he would show to them the great and wonderful works of his power, and wisdom, and goodness, as he did to their forefathers in the wilderness. Whatever the condition may be into which you shall be brought, yet you shall have me working in as a glorious way for your good and comfort, as ever I did for your forefathers when they were in the wilderness; and this exposition is rather strengthened by that which we have ex

Operabor miracula, et grandis fecinora, quous edidi in deserto, Thargum Jonathae.

Thargum Jonathae, "I will work miracles, great, wonderful, and famous things for them, such as I wrought in the desert."

Has God wrought gloriously for his people hitherto in the ways of his mercy? if reconciled to him, they may expect the same wonderful manifestations for their good, even to the end of the world. We may read the stories of God's wonderful power displayed in delivering his people out of their straits in the wilderness, and make them our own; and plead with God, that he would show forth that old, that ancient power, and wisdom, and goodness of his, as he did unto his people formerly. This is the ground of that excellent prayer, Isa. li. 9, 10, "Awake, awake, put on strength, O arm of the Lord, awake, as in the ancient days, in the generations of old. Art thou not it that hath cut Rahab, and wounded the dragon? Art thou not it that hath dried up the sea, the waters of the great deep?" Awake, awake, thou art he who hast done such great things formerly. It is a great help to our faith to consider what God has done for the church of old.

But, thirdly, Parens saith, this expression is taken from the condition of a poor man drawn aside out of his way by a thief, who, having allured him from his path, carries him into some desolate place. Then the man begins to bethink himself where he is, and seeing himself in a sad condition, knows not what to do; and yet at that very time there may come in supply, comfort, and help. So, saith God, I will bring you into the wilderness, that is, I will allure you, as the thief allures, and put you into a condition similar to that in which such a poor man is placed. I will, by specious proffers of abundance of good, draw you into situations wherein you shall meet with very great straits for a while, and be confounded, and sore amazed, as not knowing what to do; and then, in the midst of all your distresses, will I come with the fulness of my grace, and "speak comfortably" to your hearts. Thus, though God speaks of bringing into the wilderness, yet still it is with an intention of showing mercy there. And does not this just agree with our condition? have not the ways of God towards England for these two or three years been ways of allurements? God has proffered to us a great deal of mercy, and raised the hopes of his people; and the ministers of God have spoken encouraging words, that surely the Lord intends great goodness towards us, and God knows that we have endeavoured to follow the leadings of his providence, and to render instant obedience to his commands; and yet we are now brought even into the wilderness, into a kind of desolate condition, that for the present we are at a stand, and see afflictions round about us, and the very beasts ready to come and tear us, and pull us in pieces: and yet we can say, to the comfort of our hearts, Lord, if we be deceived, thou hast deceived us; for, Lord, thou knowest that whatsoever we have done, it was our duty to do; and although we are brought into great straits for the present, yet we repent not of having thus followed thee, and the gracious intimations of thy mercy towards us in the beginning of the parliament. We will not therefore say, What is now become of all our hopes? but we expect God, even in this wilderness, to "speak comfortably" unto us. Let not men then upbraid us for what we have done: we repent not, for God has brought us into this situation; and if we are in no other wilderness than that into which he has allured us, we may fully expect deliverance. In this lies the difference between men bringing themselves into trouble, or being brought into it by the allurements of the devil or the world, or by the dealings of God's providence. In the one we cannot, but in the other we may confidently, expect that God will speak comfortably unto us.

Further, there is yet another interpretation, which I think the fullest and most genuine. That you may understand what I shall advance, you must know, that from the beginning of this part of the chapter to the end, God is expressing himself to his people conjugally; that is, whereas his people had gone a whoring from him, yet he would receive them again into conjugal affection and communion. By this expression, then, of God's "bringing into the wilderness," the prophet appears to me to allude to a custom observed by the Jews in their marriages. The bridegroom used to conduct his bride out of the city into the fields, and there they sang their nuptial songs, and delighted themselves one with another; and afterwards he brought her back again, leaning upon him, into the city, to his father's house, where they rejoiced together, and solemnized the nuptials. Now, these fields are called the wilderness, either because they might be some champaign, dry fields surrounding the city; or, because he would allude to the mercy of God in bringing his people up out of Egypt into Canaan, and by giving these fields this title, would remind them of it. Allusion seems to be made to this custom of the Jews in Cant. viii. 5, "Who is this that cometh up from the wilderness, leaning upon her beloved?" Such was the ceremony of marriage, they came out of the fields, leaning upon their beloved, and so were brought into the house of the bridegroom's father. So Christ brings his spouse through this world, which is as the wilderness, and here has his nuptial songs, and takes "his delights among the children of men;" and the church, leaning upon her Beloved, is carried onward to his Father's house, where, ere long, she shall be with him for ever, solemnizing her marriage with the Lamb in a more glorious manner. Thus then we may see the meaning of this expression, "I will allure her, and bring her into the wilderness." As "the bridegroom rejoiceth over his bride," so, God saith, I will deal with you in the fulness of my grace, I will perform all the nuptial rites with you, and be married again to you; and look, whatsoever solemnities are publicly regarded as most sacred and most glorious in your city of Jerusalem, or in any other of your cities, with these will I betroth thee unto me for ever. Let all backsliders, then, amongst us learn from hence, that if they return and repent, God is willing to manifest all expressions of love and goodness to them. "Turn, O backsliding children, saith the Lord; for I am married unto you; and I will take you one of a city, and two of a family, and I will bring you to Zion," Jer. iii. 14.

"And speak comfortably unto her."

The words translated, "And I will speak comfortably," mean, And I will speak to her heart; I will speak to her, either so as to prevail with her heart, or speak to her so as to do her good at the very heart. Many scriptures may be brought to show, that speaking kindly, friendly, or comfortably, the Hebrews express by "speaking to the heart:" thus, Gen. xxxiv. 3, "Shechem spake kindly unto the damsel," the Hebrew is, Shechem spake to the heart of the damsel: so, Ruth ii. 13, "Thou hast spoken friendly unto thine handmaid;" that is, Thou hast spoken to the very heart of thy handmaid: and in Isa. xl. 2, "Speak ye comfortably to Jerusalem;" that is, Speak ye to the heart of Jerusalem. What should be spoken to the heart of Jerusalem? "Cry unto her, that her warfare is accomplished, that her iniquity is pardoned." These are the comfortable words which God required should be spoken to the heart of Jerusalem. Oh that God would speak thus to England! it would do her good at the very heart, if God would cry from heaven, Thine iniquity is pardoned, and thy warfare is accomplished. But a place still more in accordance with the expression in the text, is Judg. xix. 3; there you have the story of a Levite, who was willing to be reconciled to his wife after she had played the harlot, and the text saith, that he "went after her, to speak friendly unto her;" now the words are in the Hebrew, he went after her to speak to her heart; and indeed it is a word that must reach the heart of an adulterous spouse, if that heart be humbled, when she knows that her husband will be willing, notwithstanding all her transgressions against him, to be reconciled to her. This was the condition of Israel, they had gone a whoring from God, and when God promises a renewal of the marriage rites, he saith he will speak to her heart; from whence we might

Obs. 1. That an apostatizing people, or an apostate soul, require words of comfort spoken to their hearts, or else their terrified consciences can find little ease. We read that Spira, that famous apostate, had words of comfort enough spoken to his ear; but God did not come in and speak to his heart, therefore his conscience could not be quieted, the tumult of it could not be allayed. How many lie under the troubles of an accusing conscience, and have to endure the corrodings of a guilty spirit, because they have been backsliders from the truth; and though they come to sermons one after another, and hear the covenant of grace opened to them in all its fullness, and the riches of God's goodness set before them in all its beauty, yet go away without comfort, because the words come to the ear first, God all this time speaks not to the heart! Sometimes, however, it pleases God, when the time of his love is come, to take but the hint of a truth, and dart it upon the heart of a troubled sinner, to work effectually in him, so that he is constrained to say, Well, this day God has spoken to my heart; and he then goes away rejoicing, eased, comforted, and pacified. God shows hereby that it is not in the word of man to comfort an afflicted conscience.

Hence an expression Luther has in his comment upon Genesis, It is far harder to comfort an afflicted conscience than to raise the dead. You think it is nothing to apostatize from the Lord, you think it is easy to receive comfort; you will find it no such light matter. But you told us before, how, in the riches of his grace, God takes advantage from the greatness of our sins, to show the greatness of his mercy. Grant it, let the grace of God be never so rich, but till this grace be applied, till God be pleased to speak himself to the heart of a sinner, it will avail nothing. One who had made profession of religion, afterwards apostatized and scoffed at it. His acquaintance told him that he now did what he would smart for one day; but he thought that he understood something of the gospel, and that it was merely to believe in Jesus Christ, that he came to pardon sinners. On his sick-bed, however, being in great horror of conscience, and bitterly lamenting his apostacy, there came some of his acquaintance to him, and spake words of comfort, and told him that Christ came to save sinners, and that he must trust in God's mercy, &c. At length he began to close with this, and to get a little ease by applying it to himself; upon which his companions began to be hardened in their ways, because they saw, after a life so ill spent, it was so easy a matter to gain comfort; but not long before he died, in a most miserable anguish he exclaimed, Oh! I have prepared a plaster, but it will not stick, it will not stick. We shall find, though the grace of God be rich, and the salve a sovereign one, unless God be pleased to apply it by speaking to our hearts, human efforts are unavailing.

* Remittant aliquid de cura nitoris cultusque verborum venustatis et numerositatis sententiarum, et vere humilitati et mortificationi, impendant ut charitatem habeant, sine qua si

Obs. 2. That as, when God speaks comfortably to his people, he speaks to their hearts; so God's ministers, when they come to speak in his name, should labour to speak to the hearts of his people. It is true, indeed, it is impossible for man of himself to reach the heart, but God both assists and blesses the earnest endeavours of his servants; and though I know God can take that which comes but from the lips, and render it effectual, yet, ordinarily, that which comes from the heart goes to the heart. Ministers, therefore, when they come to declare the great things of the gospel, should not seek so much for eloquent terms and enticing words of man's wisdom; but try to get their own hearts warmed with the grace of the gospel, and then they are most likely to speak to the hearts of their hearers. Ribera saith,* Let ministers remit somewhat of their care for fine, curious words, brave, neat phrases, and cadences in their sentences; but let them bend their studies to manifest humility and mortification, and to show love to the souls of people; otherwise, though they speak with the tongues of men and angels, they shall become but "as sounding brass, or a tinkling cymbal." A Jesuit thus expresses himself, and it were surely then a great shame for God's ministers not to labour to speak so, that they may speak to the hearts of the people. You must be desirous of such kind of preaching as you find speaks to your hearts, not that which comes merely to your ears. Many men love to sit, like Israel of old, listening to the words of the preacher as to "a pleasant song;" but when you find a ministry which speaks to your hearts, close with it, bless God for it, and count it a sad day when you go from a sermon unaffected.

But because many godly and learned men understand by "the wilderness" a continued series of afflictions, wherein God would comfort his people, I dare not wholly reject that interpretation: and we may on this

Obs. 1. That there are many obstructions in the hearts of men whilst in prosperity; but when afflictions come, though they cannot of themselves convert the heart, yet by them God often opens a way for his word to reach their hearts. Many of you have heard thousands of sermons, and scarce know of one that has come to your hearts; but when God casts you upon your sick-beds, and you apprehend death, then you feel the same truths that you were not sensible of before; the threatening word of God that went but to the ear before, now reaches the heart, now it terrifies, now you lament your sins, and relish the sweet promises of the gospel that afflictions make way for. To his brother, who was a riotous and profane soldier, Bernard gave many good instructions, wholesome admonitions and counsels; but his brother seemed to slight them. Bernard came to him, and putting his hand on his side, said, God will one day make way to this heart of yours by some spear or lance; meaning God would wound him in battle, and so open a way to his heart, and then his admonitions would get to his heart: and as he said, so it happened, for going into war, he was wounded, and then he remembered his brother's admonitions, they lay upon his heart to purpose. If God should let the enemy in upon us, their swords or bullets may make way to our hearts, that God's word may come to have entrance linguis hominum loquantur et angelorum, facti sunt sicut aes sonans vel cymbalum tinniens. Ribera

there: the Lord rather pierce our hearts by his Spirit, than gain that way to our hearts.

Obs. 2. Great afflictions are the time for God's mercies. This should make us not be so much afraid of afflictions. How alarmed are we! how do we shrink back when we see them coming! Why art thou so cast down, O Christian? the time of affliction is the time for God to speak to the heart of a sinner: many a one may say that their condition has been like Jacob's, who never had a more sweet vision of God than when he lay abroad in the fields, with no other pillow under his head than a stone. It may be God will take away all your outward comforts, and when they are all gone, then may be God's time to speak comfortably to your heart.

Obs. 3. The words of mercy, oh how sweet are they when they come to the heart after an affliction! "When their judges are overthrown in stony places, they shall hear my words; for they are sweet," Psal. cxli. 6.

Again, There is yet one more interpretation put on this expression, of bringing into the wilderness, and speaking to the heart; but as it is not very probable, I will only briefly mention it for the sake of the improvement to be drawn from it; it is this: that, by bringing into the wilderness, God means that he would take them off from their engagements, from their houses, lands, shops, estates, friends, and acquaintance, from all the pomp and glory of the world which they enjoyed, and were snared by in their own country; and so carry them aside into desolate places, and there, when he has got them, as it were, alone, instruct them. God often works thus toward those upon whom he has set his love. There is an illustration of it in Mark viii. 23, where it is said of the poor blind man, whose eyes Christ intended to open, that Christ took him by the hand, and carried him out of the city, and there, apart from the tumult of the people, wrought the miracle upon him: so many of God's people have found by experience, that, whereas there were many truths of his word which they had read and heard much of here, and in some slight measure understood, yet would not be persuaded of them, and still their consciences bore them witness that they were not walking against its light; but when God took them aside from their engagements, and from the pomp and glory of their own land, and carried them into remote places, where the glory of their own country did not so glitter before their eyes, they then could clearly discern truths which they saw but imperfectly before, and their hearts were opened to receive them in the "full assurance of faith." When God had taken them aside, then God opened their eyes.

Ver. 15. And I will give her her vineyards from thence, and the valley of Achor for a door of hope: and she shall sing there, as in the days of her youth, and as in the day when she came up out of the land of Egypt.

Some translate the word צמח her vine-dressers, and indeed the Hebrew words for vine-dressers, vines, and vineyards, differ only in the vowel points; but we will read it as it is here. "From thence;" either from the time they are in the wilderness, or from that condition of their affliction in it, wherein I will speak comfortably to her, thence I will give her her vineyards: God threatened to destroy her vineyards, now God saith, he will give vineyards.

Obs. God can as easily restore, as he can destroy. It is an easy thing for men to make havoc, and do mischief, but not so easy for them to restore; it is easy to ravage a country, but not so easy to heal the breaches thereof. Psal. lii. 1, "Why boastest thou thyself in mischief, O mighty man?" There is no reason for this vain-glorying. Plutarch tells us of one commending the power and valour of Philip, for having utterly destroyed Olynthus, a city of Thrace: a Lacedemonian standing by, answered, But he cannot build such a city. And some amongst us make it their boast, that they can roam about the country, plundering, spoiling, and making havoc; but it is not in their power, nor in the power of thousands such as they, when peace comes, to remedy the unhappy consequences of their actions. This is God's property alone, who, when reconciled to a nation, can restore her her vineyards, and "bless her latter end more than the beginning."

But, moreover, on this passage Calvin remarks, that God saith not, I will give them their corn, that is, supply their necessities, but, I will give them their vineyards, that is, minister to their delights. When God is reconciled to a people, he will not only give them subsistence, but abundance; even for delight, as well as for necessity.

Obs. 1. When God is reconciled to a people, although he reserves an abundance of mercy for the future, yet he always comes immediately with some real evidences and demonstrations of love. He saith not only, I will speak comfortably to Israel, and they may expect mercies hereafter; no, but "I will speak comfortably to her, and I will give her her vineyards" again; I will give them present manifestations of my love: so it should be with us, when we come in to be reconciled to God, we should approach him with real expressions of unfeigned repentance. Many, when they lie upon their sick-beds, will promise what they will do for God, if he restore them; but they cannot resolve on an immediate surrender of themselves to his service, and so the opportunity passes away unimproved. When, therefore, you find your hearts wrought upon, broken, and melting, do not content yourselves with fair promises, but set upon the work presently, and so engage your hearts to God; and if once you be engaged by doing something, the work will go on. This is of the greatest consequence, for a man has even a natural reluctance to turn back, after having put his hand to the plough.

Obs. 2. When God restores vineyards, after speaking to the heart, then they are blessings sweet indeed, for they are the fruits of reconciliation with him. Many a poor afflicted soul knows the comfort I allude to: I thought my sinfulness had forfeited all my mercies, and God indeed took away many comforts from me; but it pleased him to come in graciously upon my heart, and in some measure to break and humble it before him; so that I hope peace is made. Notwithstanding those great offences of mine, he has now restored mercies; he took away a child, but he has given another, a better; he has taken away one mercy, and he has given a greater; and this I do confidently, yet humbly regard as a fruit of my reconciliation with God. Oh how sweetly may such a one enjoy that mercy from God! If after the meltings of thy heart after God, he then comes in with mercies to thee, thou mayst take them as tokens of love; now thy house is a comfortable blessing to thee, and thy yoke-fellow, and thy children about thee; yea, the meat on thy table is sweet with a double sweetness, when thou canst look upon all as the fruit of God's reconciliation with thee: as the Christians, when they once believed on Christ, "did eat their meat with gladness and singleness of heart, praising God," Acts ii. 46, 47. We may enjoy all our common mercies, in another manner than other men, they will be blessings doubled, yea, a hundred-fold increased: I will speak to her heart, and then, "I will give her her vineyards." Perhaps God has given thee an estate in the world, more than thy neighbours, or brother; but has God spoken to thy heart? Are God's blessings upon thee as a fruit of God's speaking to thy heart, through reconciliation? Otherwise it is but a flat comfort, to have an estate, and not to feel God speaking to our hearts.

I will restore unto you your vineyards from thence. From whence? From the wilderness.

Obs. 1. God can bring vineyards out of wildernesses. Let us not be afraid, only let us make up our peace with God, and then, though we be in a wilderness, God can from thence bring us vineyards. Our brethren have found vineyards in the wilderness, and many of God's people in the midst of their straits have found abundance of mercy.

Obs. 2. "From the wilderness:" they shall have more love, mercy working more strongly for them now, it seems, than it did before. They had vineyards before, but they had none in the wilderness. God will draw now mercies out of those things that were unlikely; he will bring forth good to them, from what seemed to be for evil: the Lord has done so for us, out of those things which seemed against us; God has brought much good, as if he had made vineyards to spring out of a wilderness. But the close of all is,

Obs. 3. Those mercies that come to us out of great difficulties, and seem to be raised out of contraries, are sweet mercies indeed, and what we are to rejoice in; and therefore it follows, "and she shall sing." Deut. xxxii. 13, "He made him to suck honey out of the rock, and oil out of the flinty rock." When did God so? when did God cause his people to "suck honey out of the rock," or, "oil out of the flinty rock?" we read, indeed, that the rock was smitten, and water gushed out; but where is it said that oil or honey came out of the rock? No where; and the meaning therefore is, that God brought forth water out of the rock by a mighty hand, and it was as oil and honey to them, being given in an hour of greatest need. So all the mercies which God gives his people when he brings them out of difficulties and straits, are sweet and glorious mercies. Let us be patient awhile; though we seem to be in the wilderness, and see nothing to fetch out water from, but only rocks, stones, and difficulties, God at length will bring mercies out of those difficulties; and they will be honey mercies unto us, mercies for which we shall sing and praise the name of our God with joyful hearts.

"And the valley of Achor for a door of hope." The words are an excellent expression of mercy to Israel. To open which, these three things are to be inquired into.

I. What this "valley of Achor" was.

II. The reason of the name.

III. Why said to be "a door of hope."

I. Achor was a very pleasant and fruitful valley, near Jericho; the first place that Israel came to when entering upon and taking possession of the land of Canaan. "And Sharon shall be a fold of flocks, and the valley of Achor a place for the herds to lie down in, for my people that have sought me," Isa. lxx. 10. First, It is joined with Sharon, Cant. iii. 1, "I am the rose of Sharon," which was a sweet, pleasant place. Secondly, It is said to be "a place for the herds to lie down in;" a fat pasture that they shall even tumble in. And, thirdly, It is promised as a blessing to them that "have sought the Lord."

II. The reason of the name Achor. Josh. vii. shows that Achan, who, in 1 Chron. ii. 7, is also called Achar, having taken the accursed thing; God left the camp, and Israel fell before the men of Ai, which was the first battle they fought for the possession of Canaan. Upon this their minds were exceedingly troubled: notwithstanding all the experiences of God's mighty power going along with them, so lately bringing them over Jordan in such a wonderful manner, and so miraculously giving them Jericho; yet at the loss of thirty-six men their hearts begin to fall, and Joshua falls with his face upon the earth. Josephus, in his Jewish Antiquities, gives us his prayer at large, and in it occur these expressions: "Beyond all expectation, having received an overthrow, being terrified by this accident, and suspicious of thy promises to Moses, we both abstain from war, and after so many enterprises, we cannot hope for any successful proceedings; by thy mercy relieve our present sorrow, and take from us the thought of despair, wherein we are too far plunged."

God then asks him why he lay upon his face, and bade him get him up, for Israel had sinned in the accursed thing. Upon search being made, Achan is detected; whereupon Joshua tells him, that he had troubled the host of Israel, and God would trouble him; upon which they stoned him, and from hence the valley was called עֵקֶב עָאֹר the valley <sup>קר</sup> of Achor, that is, the valley of trouble. <sup>Turbavit.</sup>

III. Why this valley is called "a door of hope." And here we shall inquire, first, How it was "a door of hope" to Israel then, when they first came into Canaan: secondly, How it is promised to be "a door of hope" to repenting Israel in after-times.

1. It was "a door of hope" for them in two respects.

First, Because it was the first place of which they took possession in Canaan, and began to have outward means of subsistence, and to eat of the corn of the land. While they were in the wilderness, although God provided wonderfully for them, by sending them manna from heaven; yet because they had no way of subsistence by ordinary means, they always feared lest they should want upon any strait into which they were brought. Now in this valley God gave them outward means, and this raised their hopes that their danger was over, and that they should do well enough. This is our nature, when ordinary means fail, our hearts fail; yea, though, in regard of God's extraordinary workings, we have never so many gracious encouragements; and when God grants means again, then we hope.

Secondly, God made their great trouble there a means of much good to them, for by that they were brought to purge their camp; they learned to fear the Lord, and were prepared, more than before, for so great a mercy as the further possession of the promised land. The Septuagint, instead of "a door of hope," render the clause, ἰδιαιτέα σύνεσις αὐτῆς, "to open their understanding;" for there indeed they learned the dreadfulness of God, who, for one man's sin, was so sorely displeased, and began clearly to see that the God that was amongst them was a holy God, and that he would have them to be a holy people.

2. How this "valley of Achor" was to be "a door of hope" to Israel in after-times.

First, The Jews think that Israel shall return into their own country again by the same way to Canaan, by that valley, which shall thus be a door of hope to them.

Secondly, As God turned this valley of trouble to much good to them; so he would turn all the sore afflictions of Israel in after-days to their great advantage, grievous afflictions should make way for glorious mercies.

Thirdly, and chiefly, In this expression God follows the allegory of marriage: now it was the custom amongst the Jews for the husband to give his spouse, as a dowry, some piece of ground, more or less, according to his means; and this, as a pledge of love, to assure her that whatever was his, she should have the benefit of: so saith the Lord, Although you have gone a whoring from me, and may justly expect that I should for ever reject you, yet I will betroth you to myself, and fully perform all marriage rites, to show my love towards you to the uttermost; and that you may know that you are married to a wealthy husband, I will give you a rich and plentiful dowry, that valley of Achor; and this but as a token and pledge of further love, mercy, and riches, that you shall receive at my hand as the first-fruits of all those glorious things that I have treasured up for you.

From this "valley of Achor," as it concerned Israel of old, we may

Obs. 1. Sometimes when God gives men their hearts' desires, and they think themselves happy, as if all trouble were past, then he visits them with great and sore afflictions.

Obs. 2. Although God has been humbling men's hearts with long and sore afflictions, yet, just before he bestows great mercies, he afflicts again, to humble and break their hearts still more.

Obs. 3. Sin will make the pleasantest place in the world a place of trouble.

Obs. 4. The afflictions of the saints are not only harbingers of mercies, but doors of hope to let in mercies, means to advance their progress. God commands light to shine, not only after darkness, but out of darkness. Joseph's prison, David's persecution, Daniel's den, made way for the glorious mercies God had in store for them. That which once Themistocles said to his children and friends, the saints have much more reason to say to theirs; I had been undone, if I had not been undone; had it not been for such a grievous affliction, I had never come to the enjoyment of such a mercy. Hence we must learn not only to be patient in tribulation, but joyful.

But the especial thing intended in this expression is this. When God is reconciled to his people, then present mercies are doors of hope to let in future mercies. Every mercy a door to another mercy, and all mercies here put together, are a door to eternal mercy. When Rachel had a son she called his name Joseph, saying, "The Lord shall add to me another son," Gen. xxx. 24. Every mercy the saints have may well be called Joseph, it brings assurance of mercy to be added; such is the high privilege of the saints: every mercy that a wicked man has, he may look upon as his utmost, his all, he may write a ne plus ultra upon it. One misery, one judgment upon a wicked man makes way to another, but not one mercy: however God in the riches of his forbearance may extend mercies to him, yet it is more than he should expect, and he has rather cause to wonder that he has received so much, than reason to look for more. But God ever draws out his loving-kindness to his saints. "Continue thy loving-kindness unto them that know thee; and thy righteousness to the upright in heart," Psal. xxxvi. 10. First, The good which others receive from God is bounty, patience; but that which the saints have is loving-kindness. Secondly, That which others have is in no way tied to them by promise, but that which the saints have they have by promise, it is righteousness. Psal. xxiii. Thou makest me lie down in green pastures, thou anointest my head with fresh oil, my cup runneth over. Here is much; but is this all? no, ver. 6, "Surely mercy and goodness shall follow me all the days of my life." What we read of David in 2 Sam. v. 12, is very observable; from God's prospering him in his present way, he draws an argument to assure himself for the future, that his kingdom was established to him: why? did not Saul prosper at the beginning of his reign, as well as David? and yet it was no evidence of his establishment: but David could see God's mercy coming to him after another manner than Saul could. All mercies the saints have, come from the covenant in which there is a most rich treasure of mercies, a blessed connexion of mercies. The covenant between David and Jonathan was, 1 Sam. xx. 15, That loving-kindness must not be cut off from the house of Jonathan. The covenant between God and the saints is, That loving-kindness shall never be cut off from them, but the links of mercies shall be fastened one to another, so as to be coeval with eternity.

Mercies to the saints proceed from love, and amor nescit minimum, love knows no such thing as excess. The saints, understanding this mystery in the dealings of God's grace toward them, follow on to seeking his face then, especially, when he is most in the way of mercy; whereas the men of the world, who know not this, seldom seek after mercy, but in times of affliction, when God is in a way of justice and wrath: this is their folly.

Infinite reason there is, O ye saints of the Lord, that one duty should be but an inlet to another, seeing mercy ever succeeds mercy. Here lies the great difference between performing duties from the strength of common grace, and from the power of sanctifying grace; in the one, the spirit after a few efforts is wearied, and thinks it may now rest; but in the other, the very doing still increases strength, and incites the heart to greater activity. But may not security promise continuance of mercy? Yes, but if so, then when affliction comes, the heart will sink from an apprehension of continuance in misery, as before it hoped for continuance of mercy.

When then may we assure ourselves that our mercies are doors of hope to further mercies?

First, When they are created mercies, wrought by the more immediate hand of God. Generation may be imperfect, but creation never: omne creatum est perfectum. "Lord, thou wilt ordain peace for us;" what is the argument? "for thou also hast wrought all our works in us," Isa. xxvi. 12.

Secondly, When they are spiritual mercies. Ezek. xxxix. 29, "Neither will I hide my face any more from them;" what is the argument? "for I have poured out my spirit upon the house of Israel." But is not this your private opinion that this argument will hold? No, the words following are, "Thus saith the Lord God."

Thirdly, when mercies carry us to the God of mercy, and are turned into duties. As if we can turn our duties into mercies, that is, account every duty a mercy, it is a good argument that we shall persevere in duty; so when we can turn mercies into duties, that is, make every mercy an engagement to duty, it is a good argument that mercy will continue to abound.

But are there not interruptions many times in the course of God's mercy to his own people?

It must be granted, that an interruption may sometimes occur, as after Israel's return from captivity and beginning to build the temple, from various hinderances seventy years elapsed before it was finished; but though there may be a temporary interruption, yet the work ceases not entirely; there is still strength in the grace of the covenant sufficient to carry it on, and perfect it at last. By ceasing in one way of mercy, God prepares for another; the very ceasing in such a way may be a mercy. We ourselves at this day are a sad spectacle of the interruption of the course of God's mercies towards a nation. Mercy, that formerly shone in her beauty upon us, now seems in a great measure to have withdrawn the beams of her glory; our door of hope, which we thought so wide open, appears almost shut against us. I dare not say that it is shut, lest I should wrong the present grace of God yet continued to us. But,

1. Sin, yea, our many and fearful sins, lie at this our door, Gen. iv. 7.

2. A crowd of difficulties seem even to stop up the door, they come thronging still to it, as if they would certainly shut it against us.

3. As the prophet, Ezek. xi. 1, 2, saw "at the door of the gate five and twenty men;" among whom there were some "princes of the people who devised mischief, and gave wicked counsel in the city:" so may we at this day see many, even of the chief ones, devising mischief, and giving wicked counsel, by which they labour to shut, yea, to lock and bolt up this our door of hope.

4. We hoped that this our door of hope would have been like the doors that entered into the oracle, of which we read, 1 Kings vi. 31, 32, made of the olive tree, yea, the side posts and lintels of olive tree, and carvings of palm trees and cherubims, all overlaid with gold; but now our door seems to be of iron, and the way to our help and mercy must be through the iron gate, we must get to it by suffering hard things.

5. Our door that was wide, at which mercy began to flow in freely, now seems to be straitened, and we must be content to strip ourselves of a great part of our estates, of many of our outward comforts; yea, we must venture them all, and judge ourselves happy "if by any means at length" we may crowd in.

6. Yea, our door-posts are like the Israelites' in Egypt, besprinkled with blood; the keeping up our means of mercy has cost us much blood, and may cost more.

7. Now when we knock, and would step in, the dogs bark at us, and are ready to fly upon us; yea, the servants, yea, some of our brethren, are discontented with us, frown upon us, and speak against us.

8. Alas, we have rejected the right key that should have opened this our door; no marvel, then, though we stand blundering before it and it open not to us. What is that right key which would have opened it before this time, had we made use of it? That "key of David" that we read of, Rev. iii. 7, which "openeth and no man shutteth." This key the church of Philadelphia had, therefore it follows, ver. 8, "I have set before thee an open door, and no man can shut it."

But what is this key of David?

It is the ruling power of Jesus Christ in his church. David in his government was a special type of Christ, the first godly king over the people. Government is emblematically set forth by a key: thus, Isa. xxii. 22, God promises to commit the government to Eliakim by this expression, "The key of the house of David will I lay upon his shoulder." And in Isa. ix. 6, 7, the government is said to be upon Christ's shoulder, and he sits upon the throne of David. It is worthy of remark, that to Eliakim there was promised only the key of the house of David; but to Christ, the key of David himself: the one was to govern but as a steward, the government of the other was to be princely. If we had been like the church of Philadelphia, united in brotherly love, and had this key of David amongst us, we might before this time have had set before us an open door that no man could have shut; but woe unto us! how many amongst us say of Christ, "We will not have this man to rule over us!" Mr. Brightman, more than thirty years ago, compared this church of Philadelphia with the church of Scotland, applying it typically to set forth the dealings of God toward that church in after-times; and, indeed, in many things they have been similar. 1. They are both Philadelphians, united in a brotherly covenant, no churches in any kingdom more. 2. It was said of Philadelphia, it had but a little strength, and yet it kept God's word. What churches in any nation have been more contemptible than those in Scotland? They have been accounted a poor, beggarly people, despised of all, and yet God has enabled them to do great things. 3. God has caused their enemies to come and bow before them, and to know that he has loved them; even those who said "they were Jews and were not," that they were the only church, when indeed they were "the synagogue of Satan;" and they have rejected false government, and received much of the government of Christ; the key of David is more amongst them than in any kingdom in the world: no wonder, then, that their door be so opened through God's mercy, that none can shut it. Our houses of parliament have cast away the false key, the Lord deliver them and us from ever meddling with it any more, whatever befall us. They have, moreover, professed their desire to inquire after the true key. This door of hope, we trust, will open to us in due time, so that none shall prevail to shut it.

9. We have lost many fair opportunities for the opening this door, and we cannot look back upon them without trembling hearts; we may see cause to lament their loss with tears of blood. Even already it has cost us much, and is likely to cost much more blood.

10. Yea, woe unto us! our Father comes forth and seems to be angry with us, and commands the door to be shut against us, yea, he shuts us out himself. Is not that complaint of the church's truly ours, "O Lord God of hosts, how long wilt thou be angry with the prayer of thy people?" Psal. lxxx. 4. If God be angry with our knocking, what shall we do?

11. And well may God command the door to be shut upon us, for we have shut it upon ourselves. This our door of hope has a spring lock, and is easily closed, but cannot so easily be opened again: we have stood wrangling and struggling one with another, and shut the door upon ourselves before we were aware. Hos. vii. 1, belongs as truly to us, as ever it did to Israel; "When I would have healed Israel, then the iniquity of Ephraim was discovered, and the wickedness of Samaria." When the Lord would have healed England, then its iniquity has been more fully developed. The vilest spirit of malignity against godliness, against the saints, against the way of Christ in his ordinances, now reigns. Men care not though they ruin themselves, bring themselves and posterity to be bond-slaves, so they may but gratify themselves in the suppression of the godly. The controversy now is almost grown to such a height, that the kingdom divides itself into those who have some show of religion, and the haters of it. The times complained of in Micah vii. 5, are even ours; "Trust ye not in a friend, put ye not confidence in a guide: keep the door of thy mouth from her that lieth in thy bosom:" yea, we are almost come to the pass spoken of in the 4th verse, "The best of them is a brier: the most upright is sharper than a thorn hedge." There is much frowardness and perverseness even in the best, many contentions and grievous breaches amongst them; they cannot endure you should be jealous of them, and they give you cause of jealousy daily. The greater part of this generation show themselves to have spirits so defiled with superstitious vanities, and so imbittered by a spirit of malignity, that we may fear God has no pleasure in the generality of it: yea, Moses and Aaron have sinned, the best have so sullied themselves with antichristian pollutions, that it were just with God that this whole generation should be first taken away, and that the young, who have not so defiled themselves, should have this door into Canaan opened to them, that they only might go into and possess that good land, but our carcasses fall in the wilderness.

Ye godly youths, whose hearts began betimes to yearn after Christ, know that his heart yearns after you: and although some of you may fall fighting for your brethren, and so be received into heaven; yet you are of that generation to which God will open this door of mercy, you shall go in and possess Canaan, all this valley of Aehor is but a door of hope to you. Continue then in your sincerity, and God will reveal himself more fully to you than he has done to us. If we be cut off before those treasures of mercy that God has ready for his people be opened, we must accept of the punishment of our iniquity, and even bear this indignation of the Lord, because we have sinned against him.

12. Yea, the Lord has struck us with blindness at the door, we grope up and down and cannot find it, Gen. xix. 11. Never were a people at a greater loss, or in greater confusion, than we now are; every man runs his own way, and we know not what to do, nay, the truth is, we know not what we do.

13. Many, because they have found some difficulties at the right door, have gone away from it, and sought back doors to help themselves by, even base, false, shifting, treacherous ways, seeking to comply for their own private ends, as if themselves must needs be saved, whatsoever becomes of the public.

14. This enhances our misery, that we are groping up and down at the door, and night is coming upon us, storms and tempests are rising, dangers are approaching, and yet God opens not to us.

15. Above all our misery, this is yet the greatest, that even our hearts are shut up too: were they open, our condition had still comfort in it; but there lies a stone rolled at their door, and such a stone, as is beyond the power of an angel to remove.

What then shall we do?

1. Let us yet resolve to wait at this door, wait upon God in those ways of help which in mercy he still affords us: certainly we are at the right door; let us then say with Shecaniah, "We have trespassed against our God: yet now there is hope in Israel concerning this thing," Ezra x. 2. Let us resolve, whatever becomes of us, not to go from our Father's door; if we perish, let us perish at his gates.

2. It is said, Ezek. xlvi. 2, 3, "The prince shall worship at the threshold of the gate," and "the people of the land shall worship at the door:" so let us worship the Lord at this our door, though we be not entered in; let our hearts bow before our God in acknowledgment of his greatness, power, dominion over us, to do with us what he pleases.

3. Let us look in at the key-hole, or at any crevice that we can, to see something of the riches of mercy into which this door opens. We may discern within, liberty of conscience, enjoyment of ordinances, the blessing of God's true worship, and the ways of God and his saints made honourable in this kingdom, in a higher degree than any where upon the face of the whole earth; we may see too many sweet outward liberties, the free enjoyment of our estates, peace, plenty, and prosperity in abundance: all these, and more than we can think of, would appear, if this door were but once opened to us: however, it is good to look in, to quicken our hearts meanwhile, and to excite more strongly our desires and endeavours. Oh how happy were we if we possessed these mercies!

4. Let us knock louder still, and cry still louder at our Father's door. But did not you tell us our Father seemed to be angry at our knocking? Yes, but mark what we have in that very scripture, where the church complains that God is angry with her prayer; Psal. lxxx. 4, "How long wilt thou be angry against the prayer of thy people?" Yet, ver. 14, "Return, we beseech thee, O God of hosts: look down from heaven, and behold, and visit this vine: and, ver. 19, "Turn us again, O Lord God of hosts, cause thy face to shine; and we shall be saved."

5. Let every one sweep his own door, and take away the sins that contribute to stop up this avenue of hope. "Again have I thought in these days to do well unto Jerusalem and to the house of Judah: fear ye not." But mark what follows; "These are the things that ye shall do; Speak ye every man the truth to his neighbour; execute the judgment of truth and peace in your gates: and let none of you imagine evil in your hearts against his neighbour," Zech. viii. 15-17. Both private men and men in public place must reform. How far are we from this! Never more plottings, more heart-burnings one against another, and those in public station neglect the execution of judgment; they would stretch their policy beyond God's wisdom. God joins these two together, the execution of judgment and peace, and commends one as a means to the other; but they aim at something more, they will not execute judgment for fear of the breach of peace. It is just with God that we should never have peace till we can trust God for it in his own way.

6. Let us seek to God again, and call to him for the right key. Lord, reveal the way of thy worship and thy government to us, and we will yield ourselves unto it.

7. Let us stir up ourselves against all difficulties. Things are not yet so bad, but we may help ourselves if we took courage. Our Father hears us, he can command many angels to come to help to roll away the stone; yea, he has opened divers doors to us already. We are indeed come to the iron gate, yet the Lord can make that at length fly open of its own accord; as, in Acts xii. 10, the church was praying, and after the prison doors were opened to Peter, and he had passed the first and second ward, he came to the iron gate that led unto the city, and there he found as easy passage as any where else. "In the mount will the Lord be seen."

8. Let faith act as well as prayer; let us exercise faith in the blood of Christ; let us, as it were, besprinkle this our door with the blood of the Lamb; yea, look up to Christ as the true door to all mercy.

9. Let us now especially watch all opportunities of mercy, and take heed we no more neglect, as we have many times most inexcusably, lest hereafter we knock and cry, "Lord, open to us," and it proves too late.

10. Let us open to God who knocks at our doors, if we would have him open to us. God knocks at the door of every one of our hearts, let us set all wide open for him. "Lift up your heads, O ye gates; and be ye lift up, ye everlasting doors, and the King of glory shall come in," Psal. xxiv. 6, 7. Those who do thus are the true generation that seek the Lord. Let England open, for God yet stands at the door and knocks, and if we will yet open to him, he will yet come in and sup with us, and we shall sup with him. It is true, God rebukes and chastens us severely; so he did Laodicea at the time when he stood at her door and knocked, Rev. iii. 19, 20. If any church was like to that of Laodicea, it is ours; we have been lukewarm as she was; a mixture in God's worship has been amongst us, more than in any other reformed church; we have been a proud people, thought ourselves rich, and wanting nothing, whereas we knew not that we were indeed wretched, and miserable, and poor, and blind, and naked; and those who would be the angels of this church, how has God spued them out of his mouth, and cast them forth as an abominable thing! With all that belonged to their courts, they have made themselves loathsome. He is now at our door and knocks, calling to us to let him in, that he may come and rule us, and bring peace and salvation unto us; but, however, whether Christ be admitted by the state or no, yet let the saints who are willing that Christ should rule over them, hold on to the end; the promise is, even to those in Laodicea, "To him that overcometh will I grant to sit with me in my throne, even as I also overcame, and am set down with my Father in his throne."

11. Let us encourage, as far as we are able, all our faithful door-keepers, those who are the public instruments of God for our good, and upon whom, under God, so much of the great affairs of the kingdom depends.

And for the quickening of our hearts that we may do all we can, that this our door of hope be not shut against us, consider further,

First, This door was opened to us when we began to think, yea, almost to conclude, that all doors of hope had been shut against England, and were ready to give up all for lost.

Secondly, It was opened to us after much knocking by prayer. If ever there was a parliament of prayer since the world began, this was, and is. How dreadful then would it be to have this door shut against us!

Thirdly, It was opened by a mighty hand of God. Josephus tells us of a door of the temple that used to have thirty men to open it, and yet, as a prognostication of some great occurrence, it opened of its own accord. This our door was more hard to be opened; thousands of men could not have prevailed, it was work for the mighty hand of God to effect.

Fourthly, It is a door which opens to the greatest mercies that ever England had: how happy would England be in the happy success of this parliament!

Fifthly, It is a door which our adversaries have laboured all they can to shut, by policy and by force; but hitherto, through God's mercy, they have laboured in vain.

Sixthly, How sweet have the manifestations of God been to us, in the beginnings of his goodness, and in the infancy of our endeavours! "My beloved put in his hand by the hole of the door, and my bowels were moved for him. I rose up to open to my beloved; and my hands dropped with myrrh, and my fingers with sweet smelling myrrh, upon the handles of the lock," Cant. v. 4, 5. The hand upon the door is sweet; what then would the work completed be!

Seventhly, If this door should be wholly shut against us, what a miserable people would we be! If these men have their wills, then never expect parliaments more, nor any good from parliaments; they will be the most contemptible and servile things imaginable, doors to let in all misery, agents to legalize mischief. Then what would we and our posterity be, but slaves? The popish party must, yea, would, be gratified, and their designs effected: what contempt of the saints and of religion would ensue! what hatred! what persecution! what horrid blasphemies! how will they be hardened in all manner of wickedness! our estates, our liberties, our religion sacrificed; yea, perhaps our very lives, and if not, so miserable would our existence be, that it were better to have the grave open her mouth upon us and shut us in, than to live to see, and hear, and feel such things as we and our friends are like to hear, and see, and feel.

It would be the most horrid judgment that ever befell a nation, a thing to be told to all the kingdoms of the world: God gave England a fair opportunity to help itself, to be a most happy nation, but they had no hearts, they were besotted, blinded, their hearts taken from them; the worthies whom they chose, and who ventured themselves for them, they basely deserted and betrayed: moreover, they vilely betrayed themselves, their liberties, their religion, their posterity, and are now become the most miserable nation, the most fearful spectacle of God's wrath, upon the face of the whole earth. Wherefore, beloved in the Lord, let us at all risks make sure of Christ, who is our hope, and who saith of himself that he is "the door;" as indeed he is, to let in upon us all the mercies of God, that however our hopes here be frustrated, yet we may not be disappointed of our last hopes; and that though it should prove that here, looking for light, behold darkness, yet when looking for the light of God's face eternally, we may not be driven out into the blackness of darkness for ever. But shall I end thus? nay, the close of all shall rather be the close of the 31st Psalm, "Be of good courage, and he shall strengthen your heart, all ye that hope in the Lord;" hope yet that God will make our valley of Achor a door of hope unto us. The next words in the prophecy before us are words of joy, "She shall sing as in the days of her youth." Was there ever a time wherein England had cause to sing praise unto God? there are times coming that shall be as joyful as ever yet times have been; God hath mercy in store for his people, he hath singing times for them.

"And she shall sing there, as in the days of her youth, and as in the day when she came up out of the land of Egypt."

You heard of the valley of Achor, which God gave to his people to be a door of hope. This day you shall hear of God's people standing singing at this door of hope. Though it be but a door of hope, yet at that day she "shall sing there, as in the days of her youth, and as in the day when she came up out of the land of Egypt."

There are six things needful to be opened, for the meaning of God's mind here, in their singing at the door of hope.

First, The reading of the words are to be cleared.

Secondly, The scope is to be showed.

Thirdly, What the days of youth here spoken of are.

Fourthly, What was the song of the days of their youth.

Fifthly, What cause they had to sing in this, the day of their youth.

Lastly, How this is applicable to repenting Israel, and what time this prophecy aims at, are likewise to be manifested.

I. The reading of the words. There are only two words that require explanation.

First, the word translated singing. Secondly, that which is translated, coming out of the land of Egypt.

The word for singing the Sept. translate, She shall be humbled; a sense very ταπεινωθησεται. different from what is in our books; but I find several translate the words so; amongst others, Cyril and Theodoret, who explain it, that she shall be humbled by the Assyrians as she was before humbled by the Egyptians. But certainly this is not the meaning of the words, for it is spoken of ascending or coming up out of the land of Egypt. But they might easily mistake in rendering the words, because the Hebrew signifies both to be humble, and to sing; as it is usual with that language, by the same word to express contrary things; thus כרת signifies both to bless and to curse, and many similar might be named.

The word translated singing, signifies also "she shall answer," and it is so rendered by some, as Cyril and others observe on this. "She shall answer as in the days of her youth." What answer did she make? Thus, God in the days of her youth, when she came out of Egypt, declared to her his covenant; "Now therefore," saith God, "if you will obey my voice indeed, and keep my covenant, then ye shall be a peculiar treasure unto me above all people:" a sweet promise to all in covenant with God, that they "shall be a peculiar treasure unto me above all people," Exod. xix. 5. Now, ver. 8, "All the people answered together, and said, All that the Lord hath spoken we will do." And some would explain the passage before us by referring to this; as if the meaning were, Whereas God in the days of their youth told them, that "if they would keep his covenant," they should be "a peculiar treasure unto him above all people," and they all with one consent answered, "All that the Lord hath spoken we will do;" so, saith God, when I shall again convert them to myself, I will renew my covenant with them, and upon my setting it before them they shall freely and willingly answer, Lord, we accept of this thy covenant. Thus some interpret the passage; and the exposition is very sweet.

But we shall join both these significations of the original together, which I take indeed to be the meaning of the Spirit of God: they shall sing by way of answering; thus, they were wont to sing alternis choris, in their joyful songs to answer one another, his præci- nentibus, atis succinentibus, some singing before, and some answering, a canticum dramaticum, or a kind of song admitting of alternate responses. And thus, saith God, shall be the melody of my people, when I am again reconciled to them upon their repentance, there shall be mutual singing; one singing to another, and the others answering in a joyful way.

The other word requiring explanation is, עלוה, "when she came," that is, ascended "up out of the land of Egypt." They may be said to have ascended out of the land of Egypt, partly because Egypt was a country that lay very low; but chiefly because they were in a low condition, their lives being made "bitter with hard bondage."

II. The second thing to be showed, is the intent of the Spirit of God: they shall sing as in the days of their youth, when they ascended out of the land of Egypt. Read it so, and

It is a further expression of the nuptial solemnity that there should take place between God and his people, in the time of their reconciliation, as if he should say, Marriage is an ordinance I have appointed for the mutual joy and delight of the man and his wife; so I will bring you and betroth you to myself, and there shall be the singing of the Epithalamium, the nuptial song, between us, and I will rejoice over you. Think with yourselves the greatest joy that ever you experienced in your lives, and I will realize it all to you. Whatever mercies you received when you came out of the land of Egypt, and rejoiced in, you shall hereafter enjoy again. Did I then appear in a miraculous way to you? I will do so again. Were mercies long promised fulfilled, blessings long prayed for bestowed? you shall receive the like again. Did Moses and Miriam go before you singing, and you follow after, making melody in your hearts unto the Lord? the like time shall come again, when both governors and people shall join together in singing and praising the name of the Lord.

III. What is meant by "the days of her youth?" This is the same that is afterward expressed by "the day when she came up out of the land of Egypt," that is, the time when they were delivered out of bondage, after they had passed through the Red Sea, and seen the great works of God in their deliverance. "I remember thee, the kindness of thy youth, the love of thine espousals, when thou wentest after me in the wilderness, in a land that was not sown," Jer. ii. 2. When this people were delivered from Pharaoh, and saw the great works of God in the wilderness, that is the season of their youth. In the time of their bondage they did not outwardly appear to be the Lord's; but when God manifested himself so gloriously in their deliverance, then he took them, as it were, again to be his people, and they seemed to be born again, and the years they passed in the wilderness were God's training time. For a people under bondage can scarce be said to be born, they are at least in that prison but as the embryo in the womb, they cannot be said to be a people, a living people. Hence, chap. xiii. of this prophecy, when they were in bondage under Jeroboam's wicked commands, it is said, ver. 1, that they died; "When Ephraim spake trembling, he exalted himself in Israel; but when he offended in Baal, he died."

But here a question arises: How can God refer to this time, and tell them they shall sing as then, whereas in the beginning of the chapter we find, that when God threatens them, he tells them he will set them as in the day wherein they were born? so that there to be brought again into the same condition, would appear to imply a threatening; how can it here be a promise?

We may answer, It is very true, when they came up out of Egypt was indeed a time of much mercy, but still they were in great straits with regard to outward means, a succourless and helpless people. When therefore God threatens to set them as in the day wherein they were born, he only refers to their former destitute condition with regard to creature-helps; but when he promises mercy, and tells them he will bring them into the state they were in in their youth, he rather looks at all the loving-kindness shown them in their deliverance out of Egypt. As it is a great affliction for a people to be brought into the same condition they once were in, that is, to have all the sour and bitter without any of the sweet; so it is a great privilege for a people to be brought into a former condition, when they shall have all the blessings without the cursings; when God shall take away all the bran, and give them only the pure grain, strain out all that is evil, and give them all that is good. Such mercy the promise before us holds forth.

IV. What the song was that they then sang in the days of their youth, when they came out of the land of Egypt. That song you find, Exod. xv. 1, "Then sang Moses and the children of Israel this song unto the Lord," &c.; and afterwards you read that "Miriam and all the women" sang likewise. In this song of theirs there are these five things observable.

First, This song of Moses, Exod. xv., was the most ancient that we know of. Orpheus, Musæus, and Linus, the earliest of the poets, were five hundred years after this time.

Secondly, It was a song of triumph; "Then sang Moses and the children of Israel, The Lord hath triumphed gloriously," &c. When they saw God's judgments upon the adversaries, then they sang in a triumphant manner. But you will say, How could they sing thus when they saw such a dreadful spectacle before their eyes, the Egyptians so miserably destroyed; when they heard their shrieks and doleful cries, and beheld their bodies cast upon the sea shore? shall Moses and the people of Israel sing then, and triumph over their adversaries thus fearfully perishing? To that we answer, We must not be more pitiful than God is; "The righteous shall rejoice when he seeth the vengeance: he shall wash his feet in the blood of the wicked," Psal. lviii. 10.

But you will say, This is austerity, they are cruel-hearted people who could do so.

Not so. Moses was the meekest man that ever lived upon the face of the earth, the most full of tender compassion; yet Moses sang thus when he saw the Egyptians destroyed: so that to rejoice in God's judgments against the ungodly, may consist with meekness and quietness of spirit, with a loving and sweet disposition as Moses had. It is true, we ought not to insult over wicked men in way of revenge on our own account; but when we consider the righteous judgments of God on his adversaries, we may be swallowed up in the consideration of his justice, and rejoice in it; but so, as not altogether to be without some pity and commiseration of the persons perishing; as Titus Vespasian is said to have wept when he saw the destruction of Jerusalem, though a hostile city. But there is a time coming, when all the saints shall be so swallowed up with God, that they shall rejoice in the destruction, yea, in the eternal damnation, of the wicked, without the least mixture of pity or commiseration; they shall wholly have a regard to God and his glory without consideration of them; yea, though they were the fruit of their own bodies, and came out of their own loins. But for the present, though we are to rejoice and triumph in the works of God and his judgments upon the wicked, yet our joy is not to be unmixed with feelings of pity and compassion towards the persons of the sufferers.

And mark by the way, the difference with which God regards his own people and the wicked. When God's people come to be in a distressed condition, if there be any that dare to rejoice over them, God will avenge himself on them; yea, if they do but look upon his afflicted servants with any kind of satisfaction, the Lord will be avenged on them for it. But when the wicked are destroyed, God not only gives us leave to look at them, but to rejoice and sing praises to God for their destruction. Thus, Obad. 12, "Thou shouldest not have looked on the day of thy brother in the day that he became a stranger; neither shouldest thou have rejoiced over the children of Judah in the day of their destruction." Mark, God has a quarrel against them who only looked upon the day of their brother's distress and rejoiced. But when destruction comes upon the enemies of God, then the people of God may look, and rejoice, and triumph.

Thirdly, It is a song most excellent, in regard of the elegance of the expressions, and variety of the matter. There is great force and beauty in the expression, ver. 1, "He hath triumphed gloriously," or, He is become gloriously glorious, or, In magnifying himself he hath magnified himself; or, as some render it, He is magnified above the magnificent. All God's works are glorious, but some are gloriously glorious; and so is the work of God toward his people. Rivet observes on this, The greatest glory of God, in which he is most glorious, is in doing good to his own people: so, adds he, great men should account their true glory to consist, not in spoiling others, especially those that are their own, but in doing good. In Isa. xiv. 20, a dishonourable burial to the king of Babylon is threatened, "because," saith the scripture, "thou hast destroyed thy land, and slain thy people:" yea, the threatening is continued to his seed, "the seed of evil-doers shall never be renowned."

Again, the abstract terms employed are very elegant, thus, "The Lord is my strength and song, and he is become my salvation."

So, beside many other instances, that elegant epiphonema, with which he breaks forth in the midst of the song, though it would more properly have been introduced at the close as a summary of all the rest; "Who is like unto thee, O Lord, among the gods? who is like thee, glorious in holiness, fearful in praises, doing wonders?"

Fourthly, A prophetic song, not only narrating the past, but prophesying of what is to come: "The dukes of Edom shall be amazed; the mighty men of Moab, trembling, shall take hold upon them," &c., ver. 15.

Fifthly, A typical song, that is, a song pre-signifying the rejoicing of God's people in after-times, when the saints shall overcome antichrist, and the song of Moses shall be sung over again. Of those that overcome the beast, Rev. xv. 2, 3, saith they sung "the song of Moses," that is, they sung that song of which this of Moses was but a type.

Sixthly, A miraculous song, according to some; so Augustine, De Mirabilibus Scripture, calls it, a miracle worthy of unlimited admiration.

Wherein did he think the miracle of this song to consist?

In this; he imagined that both Moses and all the people were at once inspired by God to sing this song: which idea has been received by some; but as we have no authority for this from Scripture, we rather think that God inspired Moses only, and the rest of the people followed him as he sung.

I note it the rather, because hereby we may see that singing is an ordinance in the church of God, not only in the time of the law, but in the time of the gospel; for this place, "she shall sing as in the days of her youth," refers to gospel times. Therefore, not only when one man has an extraordinary gift (as the Scripture speaks, if any one hath a psalm, an extraordinary gift in the congregation of making a psalm) he should sing; but others are enjoined to unite with those who have the gift of making a psalm; so were the people to do here.

V. The reason of their singing thus in the days of their youth. It was briefly this, they sang on account of the great deliverance they had experienced out of Egypt. Observe,

First, They then sang because of their freedom from outward bondage. Bondage implies three things.

1. That a man is under the power of another, under some law, without his consent given, either explicitly or implicitly.

Here you may see the difference between a free subject and a slave; the former, as in England, is not bound to any laws of men, as men's laws, but such as some way or other he gives his own consent to; whereas the latter, like the Turks, are subject to the mere will of their rulers.

2. That a man serves another, aiming to satisfy his will alone, without any reference to his own benefit. A slave is forced to obey thus, although there is naturally no such distance between man, that one should serve another, without respect to his own good. Such a distance indeed exists between God and us, and the more we are swallowed up in aiming at God, and the less at ourselves, it is the better and more reasonable service; but as regards our fellow creatures, it is far otherwise. In England, therefore, when any thing is granted to the king, it is usual to send up some other bill for the good of the subject, thus giving the ruler somewhat, but withal expecting some benefit from him in return. Indeed in our very service to men we are to aim at God, and in the condition God has put us, to seek to glorify him, more than to provide for ourselves; but as regards man only, we are not bound to serve him, further than with respect to ourselves, and the good of others. Wherefore subjects may know that they are not made merely for the will of those above them; they indeed render them obedience, but do it for the good they expect from them.

3. That a slave is forced to serve with rigour; his service is not one of love.

Now the people of Israel were under bondage in all these three respects. First, they were forced to serve without any consent at all. Secondly, they who governed them, did not at all aim at their good; it concerned not them; Let them perish as dogs, we will have our work done, and well done too. When men govern so as to care not what becomes of thousands of others, provided they may have their own wills satisfied, this is to make free subjects bond-slaves. And thirdly, all was done with rigour; the Egyptians "made their lives bitter with hard bondage," but cared not for Israel's love. Wherefore when freed from these three things, they sang, and they had cause to do so.

Secondly, They sang when they came out of the land of Egypt, because they were not only in bondage in Egypt, but in bondage under such a king. For, consider this, and surely to be delivered from such a one afforded abundant matter for rejoicing.

1. They were bond-slaves to a king of another nation. Sometimes regard for country and kindred moves compassion; but of Israel, being strangers, he desired merely to get his own turn served, and cared little what eventually became of them.

2. They were bond-slaves to a king whose rule was arbitrary, and his will the law, who imposed what tasks he pleased, the number of bricks they should make, and when he pleased took away their straw, and yet tied them to making the number. He governed them not by law, but by will.

3. They were in bondage under a cruel king, who in the Scripture is called a dragon, on account of his cruelty; "I am against thee, Pharaoh king of Egypt, the great dragon," Ezek. xxix. 3.

4. They were in bondage to an unnatural king. A progenitor of the Israelites had saved Egypt from perishing, and the king and his family from destruction; yet now, without any regard to former services, the new king who "arose up over Egypt" "made their lives bitter with hard bondage."

5. They were in bondage under a king, in whose eyes they were impure and unclean. "The Egyptians might not eat bread with the Hebrews; for that is an abomination unto the Egyptians," Gen. xliii. 32.

6. They were in bondage under a wilful king. We scarcely read of any one so set upon his will as this king was. Judgments were denounced and executed in vain, his language still was, "I will pursue, I will overtake, I will divide the spoil; my lust shall be satisfied upon them; I will draw the sword, my hand shall destroy them," Exod. xv. 9. Something similar has been remarked of the king of Babylon, but of none else; and the text refers partly to their deliverance from under the king of Babylon also; as if he should say, You sang joyfully when you came up out of Egypt, because you were delivered from such a cruel, wilful king; you shall sing so once more, for you shall hereafter be delivered from a like bondage; for though all the ten tribes came not back, yet it was in part fulfilled to many of them.

7. They were in bondage under a king suspicious and jealous, lest they should "multiply" and rise up against him, Exod. i. 10. It is a sad thing when there are such suspicions betwixt a king and his people, that they cannot confide in and trust each other. Well might they sing therefore in the days of their youth, when they came up out of the land of Egypt.

Thirdly, They sang when they came up out of the land of Egypt, because they were then freed from hinderances in the exercise of religion; as Moses told Pharaoh that they could not sacrifice in Egypt, but must go three days' journey into the wilderness to sacrifice unto the Lord their God, Exod. viii. 25—27.

Fourthly, They sang, because their deliverance out of Egypt was wrought with a mighty hand: "The Lord hath triumphed gloriously," hath been gloriously glorious, Exod. xv. 1; and, ver. 6, "Thy right hand, O Lord, is become glorious in power." The "hand of God" is God's strength, the "hand of God in power" implies something more, and still more "God's right hand in power;" but, "the right hand of God is glorious in power," is a most forcible expression, denoting the greatness of the work wrought by God in their deliverance: and to enhance it still more, it is said, ver. 16, "by the greatness of thine arm;" not only God's hand, but his arm, and "the greatness of his arm," were engaged on their behalf. In ver. 7, there is a phrase more expressive still, "in the greatness of thine excellency," in the multitude of thine elation, or proud lifting up of thyself (for the word translated excellency there signifies pride also); and God indeed in this wrought for his people in the multitude of his excellency, that is, in a manner which combined in it a multitude of glorious works, which if you could analyze, you would find each replete with a multitude of glorious excellences. Well might they sing, when God did manifest himself thus.

Fifthly, They sang when they came up out of the land of Egypt, because this mercy was the fulfilling of a promise made long before. "At the end of four hundred and thirty years, even the self-same day, the hosts of the Lord went out of the land of Egypt;" which refers to a promise, and shows us that God kept his word to a very day. Hence, Exod. xv. 2, "He is my God, I will prepare him an habitation; my father's God, and I will exalt him." As if he would say, O Lord, thou didst make promises to our forefathers, and now thou hast fulfilled them to us, thou art our God and our fathers' God.

Sixthly, It was a mercy got by much prayer. They cried unto God by reason of their afflictions, Exod. iii. 7; and their prayers being now answered, their hearts rejoiced.

Seventhly, It was a mercy succeeding a sore and long bondage.

Eighthly, It was a mercy precursive to an entrance into Canaan; therefore this they mention as the especial cause of the joy of their hearts, in ver. 13, "Thou hast guided thy people in thy strength to thy holy habitation;" and, ver. 17, "Thou shalt bring them in, and plant them in the mountain of thine inheritance." The Holy Ghost speaks here as if the thing were done already; O Lord, thou hast indeed granted unto us a great mercy in delivering us out of Egypt, but herein we especially prize it, as bringing us to thy holy habitation, and planting us at length in the mountain of thine inheritance.

Now, saith the Lord, you shall sing as you did then; look, whatever causes you had then for rejoicing, you shall have the same when I am reconciled to you.

VI. The time referred to when this was fulfilled, is the last thing requiring explanation; and this prophecy seems to relate to four periods.

First, It began in some degree to be fulfilled at their return out of captivity from Babylon. Though it is true, few of the ten tribes returned; yet it is clear from Scripture, that many of them did then rejoice in the first-fruits of this mercy. The whole of Isa. xii. is a song, blessing God for their return; "Jehovah is my strength and my song, he also is become my salvation."

Secondly, In reference to spiritual Israel, it is applied, as in Rom. ix., to the calling of the Jews and Gentiles together, when the gospel was first preached. Jews and Gentiles being then called home, became the spiritual Israel of God, and there was singing: "And again he saith, Rejoice, ye Gentiles, with his people," Rom. xv. 10.

The third period referred to, is the delivery of God's people from under the tyranny of antichrist, typified by that of the Egyptians: "And I saw as it were a sea of glass mingled with fire: and them that had gotten the victory over the beast, and over his image, and over his mark, and over the number of his name, stand on the sea of glass, having the harps of God. And they sing the song of Moses the servant of God, and the song of the Lamb, saying, Great and marvellous are thy works, Lord God Almighty; just and true are thy ways, thou King of saints. Who shall not fear thee, O Lord, and glorify thy name? for thou only art holy: for all nations shall come and worship before thee; for thy judgments are made manifest," Rev. xv. 2—4. In this song, which I make no question but the scripture before us refers to, there are divers things observable.

First, The singers were those "that had gotten the victory over the beast, and over his image, and over his mark;" that is, a full victory, not only abominating antichrist himself, but the very image or character of him, any thing whereby they might seem to allow of him, to be owned by him.

Secondly, They stood upon "a sea of glass mingled with fire." The sea of glass I find interpreted, Christian doctrine; so called for its clearness; though not so clear as afterward it should be, for there is some darkness even in glass, but clear in comparison of what it was before, for, 2 Kings xxv. 13, the sea was of brass, which is far thicker and more opaque. But there was fire mingled with this sea of glass; that is, though they had a clearer doctrine than before, yet there were many contentions in the church through diversity of opinions, and much division even amongst the godly. It is a sad condition indeed, yet not unusual, especially when doctrines are first cleared, to have great contentions arise in the church among godly men. It is no wonder that they should differ in opinion, yea, and contend with some heat of spirit, when the light first breaks forth. When men are in the dark they sit together, and walk not at such a distance from each other; but when light comes, it cannot be expected but there will be differences. But yet, mark, the godly then did not reject the doctrine, because there was fire, heat of contention, mingled with it; but, "stood on the sea with their harps in their hands," professing the doctrine, and rejoicing that ever they lived to have the gospel so clearly revealed to them.

"And they sing the song of Moses," and not only of Moses, but "the song of the Lamb" too. What was that? First, "Great and marvellous are thy works;" in that we see we are delivered from antichristian bondage, as the people of Israel from Egyptian, with a mighty hand of thine: oh it is a marvellous work of God that we are thus freed. Therefore know this, that whensoever the church shall be delivered from antichristian bondage, it shall be by an extraordinary manifestation of God's power; and let us not be discouraged, because we meet with some trials by the way, for our deliverance would appear as nothing marvellous, except our difficulties were many and great.

Further, "Just and true are thy ways." God, in that deliverance, will show the fulfilling of all his promises, and will fully satisfy the hearts of his people who have been a long time seeking him, and suffering for him. Whereas the adversaries, who, because of the forbearance and long-suffering manifested towards them, thought there was no God in heaven that regarded them, but scoffed at the fastings, and prayers, and faith of the saints, will find that God avengeth his own elect; and the hearts of the saints, ready to fail, at last shall say, "Just and true are thy ways;" Lord, we now see all thy good word fulfilled, all thy promises performed; now we see it is not in vain to seek thee, and to wait upon thee, for "just and true are thy ways."

"Thou King of saints." God is indeed the King of the world now, and the King of his saints; but the glory of Christ's kingdom, being now obscured by the surrounding shades of this world's sin and guilt, its manifestations do not shine forth so brightly as they will then appear. We have somewhat indeed of his priestly and prophetic office discovered to us, but very little of his kingly; but when God shall fully deliver his people, then shall they magnify Jesus Christ as in very deed the King of saints.

Lastly, Who will not fear thee, thou King of nations, "for thy judgments are made manifest:" as if they should say, We see now it is good to fear God, he has now made a difference "between him that feareth God, and him that feareth him not." The angel, John saw flying "in the midst of heaven, having the everlasting gospel to preach," cries, "with a loud voice, Fear God, and give glory to him;" Rev. xiv. 6, 7. The fear of God will powerfully constrain the hearts of the saints in those times. This is the song of Moses to which this scripture refers; and they shall thus sing, as Israel did in the days of her youth, when she came up out of the land of Egypt; yea, and their song shall be much the more glorious one.

The last period this prophecy refers to, is the great calling in of the Jews. Then the Scripture saith, "Everlasting joy shall be upon their heads: they shall obtain gladness and joy; and sorrow and mourning shall flee away;" Isa. li. 11. They shall sing as those who will mourn no more in this world, on account of the malice and rage of adversaries. This was not fulfilled at their return from the Babylonish captivity, but the Scripture is explicit about its accomplishment even in this world: Rev. xxi. 4, is almost a repetition of the words of the prophet; "God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes; and there shall be no more death, neither sorrow, nor crying, neither shall there be any more pain." The former things shall be passed away for ever, and they shall sing, as they did in the days of their youth, when they came up out of the land of Egypt.

From these remarks many important observations will flow.

Obs. 1. It is a great mercy for people to be delivered from outward bondage. It will be found a great mercy, when the world shall be delivered from their outward bondage, and men shall see that they were born freemen, and not slaves; and that the world was not made for twenty or thirty to do what they pleased in, and to account all the rest as beasts, yea, dogs; as if the lives of thousands might be recklessly squandered for the gratification of their humours and lusts. When men shall become sensible that they are subjects and not slaves, men and not beasts, and so shall not suffer themselves, like beasts, to be driven at the will of others, this will be a great mercy.

But to be delivered from antichristian bondage, is a greater mercy than it was for the children of Israel to be delivered from their Egyptian bondage. For,

First, We read not of any attempt in Egypt to bring their consciences under the thralldom of any false worship. Pharaoh did not this, but antichrist forces to idolatry.

Secondly, Though Pharaoh imposed heavy tasks and burdens, yet he did not kill them; at length indeed he commanded their first-born to be slain; but the people of Israel themselves continue to exist, though with their lives made bitter by hard bondage. But antichrist thirsts for blood; papists are men of blood.

Thirdly, It was the affliction of God's people to be in bondage in Egypt, but not their sin; but to be in bondage under antichrist, is not only an affliction, but it is sin, and that of a high nature.

Fourthly, Though under Egyptian bondage, yet they were delivered from Egyptian plagues; but those who are under antichristian bondage, shall come under antichristian plagues. "Come out of her, my people, that ye receive not of her plagues," Rev. xviii. 4. You must not think to escape as they did out of Egypt; if you stay in that bondage, you will be involved in their plagues. How, therefore, should we regard those who would bring us into this bondage again, when God has begun to revive us a little! "O my lord the king," (saith Jeremiah,) "let my supplication, I pray thee, be accepted before thee; that thou cause me not to return to the house of Jonathan the scribe, lest I die there," chap. xxxvii. 20. So let us cry to the King of heaven and earth, O Lord, our King, let our supplication be accepted before thee; since we are begun to be delivered from that bondage, cause us not to return to that house again.

Obs. 2. A reconciled condition is a singing condition. When there is a harmony between heaven and the soul, between God and a sinner, there is sweet melody indeed, there may well be singing. "The ransomed of the Lord shall return, and come to Zion with songs and everlasting joy upon their heads," Isa. xxxv. 10. And chap. xlv. 23, "Sing, O ye heavens; for the Lord hath done it: shout, ye lower parts of the earth: break forth into singing, ye mountains." "We being justified by faith have peace with God," saith the apostle, and not only rejoice in hope of the glory, but we even "glory in tribulation also." Having peace with God, though war with all the world, we rejoice.

Obs. 3. It is a great mercy when magistrates and people join together in praising God; when Moses begins, and Miriam and the leaders of Israel follow, and then all the people join in, and answer one another in their singing. When that day shall come that God shall stir up the hearts of the magistrates and the great ones amongst us, to sing hallelujahs to him that sitteth upon the throne, and to the Lamb for evermore; and when he shall so move the hearts of the people, that they shall answer one another in their singing, and join, with one accord, in this sweet melody; this will be a blessed time indeed. Now, perhaps, in one place there is singing and blessing of God for what is done; in another, cursing and blaspheming against those engaged in praise. Some men's hearts are rejoicing, whilst others fret and rage when they hear of the great things God is doing; and this discourse has rent asunder, not only the political, but the social relations of life. Such is our condition at this day, but there are better times coming, when our Moseses, our Aarons, and Miriams, and all our people, shall join together in singing praises to our God.

Obs. 4. Thankfulness to God for mercy implies joyfulness. A sad, grumbling, discontented spirit consists not with true thankfulness of heart. God will not accept, in this sense, of the bread of mourners. It is grievous to his Spirit, that we should hang up our harps and be sad in the midst of abundance of mercies.

Obs. 5. When God brings into straits, yet if he sanctify them and make them means of good to us, we have cause to rejoice. "She shall sing there." Where? At the "door of hope" in "the valley of Achor;" that is, that God would make the greatest troubles and afflictions of his church to be a door of hope, an inlet to mercy. "In the wilderness shall waters break out, and streams in the desert; and the parched ground shall become a pool, and the thirsty land springs of water." What seemed most contrary to you, I will make to work for your good, saith God; and "then shall the lame man leap as an hart, and the tongue of the dumb sing," Isa. xxxv. 6, 7. Though our tongues be dumb, yet it should make us sing when we see God bringing good out of evil; and things that of themselves tend to our ruin, and would reduce us to misery, that are as the valley of Achor, yet rendered by his mercy a door of blessed hope. If men, we ought; if Christians, though dumb before, we must sing and tell of all his loving-kindness.

Yea, this overruling providence is introduced as an argument to strengthen the weak hands and the feeble knees, and as a reason why those who are faint-hearted should not fear; but stay themselves upon God, who brings sweet out of bitter, good out of evil. "Say to them that are of a fearful heart, Be strong, fear not, behold your God will come with vengeance, even God with a recompence: he will come and save you."

Are we in "the valley of Achor," a place of trouble and straits? we have cause to sing even there, for we have not yet been brought into any difficulties which God has not overruled for our good; he has turned "the parched ground into a pool, and the thirsty land into springs of water." And it is our great sin, that when God calls us to singing, we are dejected and cast down, and ready to conclude that "all these things are against us." Oh no, God calls you to singing, notwithstanding all your difficulties. "Sing, O heavens; be joyful, O earth; and break forth into singing, O mountains: for the Lord hath comforted his people, and will have mercy upon his afflicted." But mark now what follows: "But Zion said, the Lord hath forsaken me, and my Lord hath forgotten me." At the very time when the Lord was calling them to singing, even then they were concluding of rejecting. Let us take heed that this be not our condition.

Obs. 6. When the Lord is beginning with his saints in the ways of his mercy, though they have not all they desire, yet is theirs a singing condition. That is, that valley of Achor was some special mercy, which God gave at first as a door of hope to further mercies which he had in store, and there they should sing. Though you be but brought into the valley of Achor, and only at the door of hope, and not yet entered in, nor gotten possession of all the mercy God intends for you, yet he expects you should sing. You must not stand complaining and murmuring because you have not all that you desire; though God makes you wait at the door, you must wait there singing. It may be said of his mercy as of his word; "The entrance of thy word giveth light," Psal. cxix. 130; so the entrance of God's works of mercy gives light. And Psal. cxxxviii. 5, "Yea, they shall sing in the ways of the Lord: for great is the glory of the Lord." In the ways of the Lord they shall sing, though their day be but still the day of small things.

Because we stand at the door murmuring and quarrelling one with another, whereas God expects that we should wait there singing and praising his name, is certainly one great reason why our door of hope is not yet fully opened, or, at least, that we have not that abundant entrance into it which we desire. Yet, though the mercy we look for should be reserved for the generation that shall follow, we have cause to bless God that ever we lived to this day, to see so much of God as we have done. Let us then stand singing at our Father's door; and if we must sing at the foot of Zion, what song shall we sing when we come to the height! "They shall come and sing in the height of Zion, and shall flow together to the goodness of the Lord," Jer. xxxi. 12.

If God is dealing with any of you in a way of mercy, though you can see but a little light through the key-hole, yet you should sing there. There are many poor souls, with whom God is beginning in very gracious ways, yet because they have not their minds enlightened, their hearts humbled, as they desire, complete power over corruptions, and ability to perform duties; are presently ready to conclude against themselves, Surely the Lord will not have mercy, we are rejected. They think they have nothing, because they have not all they desire. O unthankful heart! this is the very thing which keeps thee under bondage; because, when the Lord is setting open a door of hope to thee, thou wilt not take notice of it, but art presently murmuring and repining, because all thy desires are not fulfilled. Wouldst thou enter in at this door, and have God perfect the mercy he has begun? be observant of the beginnings, and bless God for what thou hast. This would be of marvellous use to many a drooping soul, if it taught them, by this day's coming hither, to sing hereafter at the door of hope.

Obs. 7. It is often the condition of God's own people, when first made free, to be in a singing condition, but afterwards to lose their joy. "She shall sing there, as in the days of her youth." When God's mercies were new to them, in the days of their youth, oh how their hearts were affected! how then with joy and gladness sang Moses and all the people! but in process of time it appears they kept not up this singing, this making melody in their hearts; therefore God promises they should sing as in the days of their youth.

We find it so when people first come out of a state of bondage to enjoy church liberties. How they rejoice in them! how they bless God for them! how sweet are these mercies to their very hearts! they rejoice that ever they lived to this time; but soon the flower of their youth is gone, and the "teats of their virginity bruised." At first, indeed, oh the sweetness, the blessed condition that God has brought us to, to have these liberties and ordinances according to his own way! But stay a while, and you shall find contention or scandal arising among them, or deadness of heart befalling them; and we may say, as the apostle to the Galatians, "Where is then the blessedness you spake of?" Gal. iv. 15. They "would have plucked out their eyes" for Paul. What is become of all now? All their beauty and glory is quite faded. Let us take heed that, when our hearts seem raised and strongly affected by mercies, we do not soon lose the vigour and warmth of our zeal.

When the city of Berne was first delivered from anti-christ, they wrote the day of their deliverance upon pillars, with letters of gold. Was it not so with us in England? When mercies were fresh we rejoiced in them exceedingly. I will only instance that deliverance upon the fifth of November; how mightily were both king and parliament affected with it! their hearts elated, and blessing God for having saved them from popists. Then there were prayers and thanksgivings set forth, and in them this expression against popery, "Whose faith is faction, whose religion is rebellion, whose practice is murdering of souls and bodies." When the mercy was new, how did their spirits work! then they protested against all kinds of popery. From the proclamation about the solemnity of that time, and the expressions in the prayers then set forth, one would verily think that popery could never more have prevailed in England; who would have deemed it possible for a popish army ever to be countenanced in England again? Certainly, if it had been raised then, when men's feelings were so excited, all the people of the land would have risen and beaten them to pieces, if it had been but with clubs.

It is so with many young persons, when God first begins to work upon their hearts; oh how zealous are they for the Lord! then their spirits are mightily up for Christ. "O satisfy us early with thy mercy; that we may rejoice and be glad all the days of our lives," Psal. xc. 14. It is a sweet thing when the latter part of that prayer follows, when God satisfies young people with his mercy, and that satisfaction abides, so that they rejoice all the after-days of their lives in him. The Lord many times satisfies young ones with his mercy, but they quickly grow dead and cold; their hearts soon become hardened and polluted, and they cease to rejoice.

Obs. 8. Restored and recovered mercies are very sweet and precious. "She shall sing as in the days of her youth." They were once in a sweet singing condition, but had lost it; and now God promises to recover them. "Oh that I were as in months past, as in the days when God preserved me; when his candle shined upon my head, and when by his light I walked through darkness; as I was in the days of my youth, when the secret of God was upon my tabernacle!" Job xxix. 2—4. The patriarch desired this earnestly, that he might have restored, recovered mercies. What a happy condition should I be in, saith he, if it were now with me as in the days of my youth! May not many in this place say so? God has been gracious to them in former days, given them many sweet manifestations of his love, many soul-ravishing communications of himself; but oh, how have they lost them! They may well say, Oh that it were with us as in the days of our youth! Oh that God would restore to us the mercy we once had! how blessed then would be our condition!

But God here gives a gracious promise that he will restore them, that he will grant them the petition of David, "Restore to me the joy of thy salvation," Psal. li. 12: Lord, I have lost it; oh that I might have it again! how happy should I be! So Psal. cxxxvii. 1, 2, "By the rivers of Babylon, there we sat down, yea, we wept, when we remembered Zion. We hanged our harps upon the willows." If one had come to them and said, What will you say if you be restored and go to Zion again, and have songs there, as many and as delightful as before? Their hearts could not but have leaped for joy. This mercy would be like the wine mentioned Cant. vii. 9, so sweet that it "causes the lips of those that are asleep to speak;" if there be any life left, such a mercy would raise and animate it. "When the Lord turned again the captivity of Zion, we were like them that dream. Then was our mouth filled with laughter, and our tongue with singing," Psal. cxxvi. 1; 2. As a poor prodigal, who, having left his father's house and become reduced to want, misery, and bondage, sits down beneath a hedge, wringing his hands, lamenting the loss of his father's house, and, considering what comfort he had in that father's presence, exclaims at his own folly and madness: if one should then come and say to him, Your father is reconciled to you, and sends for you home, and promises to put you into as comfortable a condition as ever; what heart-music would this cause! Thus God promises to his people, that he will restore them to their former singing condition.

Obs. 9. Promised mercies are sweet mercies. "Blessed be the Lord God of Israel; for he hath visited and redeemed his people, and hath raised up an horn of salvation for us in the house of his servant David; as he spake by the mouth of his holy prophets," Luke i. 68—70: and ver. 72, "To perform the mercy promised;" there is the cause of singing. Blessed be the Lord God of Israel, that hath performed the mercy promised.

The declaration of a promise is sweet to a gracious heart, it can sing then; much more sweet is the promise fulfilled. 2 Chron. xx. 17, "Stand ye still, and see the salvation of the Lord;" there is the promise. Mark now how Jehoshaphat and the people were affected with it: ver. 18, 19, "And Jehoshaphat bowed his head with his face to the ground: and all Judah and the inhabitants of Jerusalem fell before the Lord, worshipping the Lord. And the Levites, of the children of the Kohathites, and of the children of the Korhites, stood up to praise the Lord God of Israel with a loud voice on high." And ver. 21, "He appointed singers unto the Lord, that should praise the beauty of holiness, and say, Praise the Lord; for his mercy endureth for ever." Jehoshaphat had not the promise fulfilled, it was only made; they had not obtained the victory over their enemies; but only a promise that God would be with them, and presently Jehoshaphat and all the people began singing. A gracious heart sees cause enough to sing if it receive but a promise, but much more when it is enjoying the fulfilment. If the promise of a mercy has such sweetness in it, what sweetness then has the mercy of the promise!

Obs. 10. When God appears remarkably, with a high hand in delivering his people, then the mercy is to be accounted precious indeed, and all the people of the Lord should sing and praise him; as in Isaiah, when God had told of an extraordinary manifestation of mercy, I will plant them in the wilderness, and so on: then, saith he, shall this be, that they may "see, and know, and understand, and consider, that the hand of the Lord hath done this, and the Holy One of Israel hath created it." When a thing is effected by God's hand immediately, which helps a people much, he expects that they should see, and know, and consider, and understand together: all these expressions are heaped one upon another. And if any people be called to this, we are at this day; God has appeared extraordinarily to us. Oh that we had eyes to see! oh that we had hearts to consider and understand, that we might give God the glory due to him!

Obs. 11. Mercies which have been much sought for, and to obtain which many cries have been sent up to God, when once granted, should cause us to sing his praises. The people of Israel cried much before God granted them deliverance from Egypt. "I have heard their cry," saith God, Exod. iii. 7. And here, They shall sing as in the day when they came up out of the land of Egypt. "They shall praise the Lord that seek him," Psal. cxvii. 26. The more we seek to God for any mercy, the more we shall praise him when we have obtained it. "Blessed be the Lord, because he hath heard the voice of my supplications; my heart trusted in him, and I am helped." What follows? "Therefore my heart greatly rejoiceth, and with my song will I praise him," Psal. xxviii. 6, 7. Because God had heard the voice of his supplication, therefore with his song he would praise him. The mercies we get by crying unto God are singing mercies indeed; such as come to us only through a general providence, without seeking to God, are not so sweet: as Hannah said to Eli concerning her son, whom she obtained by prayer, (and therefore named Samuel, that is, "Asked of God,") "As thy soul liveth—for this child I prayed; and the Lord hath given me my petition which I asked of him." This she spake, triumphing in God's goodness. Mercies gotten by prayer may be triumphed in. When you want a mercy, pray much for it; the more you pray for it, the more you will sing when you receive it; and the less prayer that went before, the less praise will follow after.

Obs. 12. Mercies which make way for the enjoyment of ordinances are truly sweet, singing mercies. They shall sing as they did when they came up out of the land of Egypt. Why did they sing then? Because the deliverance from Egypt made way for that richer mercy, the enjoyment of God's worship in his ordinances, as appears from Exod. xv. 2: "I will prepare him an habitation," saith Moses, rejoicing that Israel was now going on in the way to build God a habitation; and ver. 13, "Thou hast guided them in thy strength unto thy holy habitation:" as if he should say, It is indeed a great thing to be delivered out of bondage, but it is only a foretaste of a higher mercy that we look for, that is, the guiding of thy people "in thy strength unto thy holy habitation:" we look upon this present mercy of our deliverance, for which we now sing, and give thee praise, in this light; and although, Lord, there are many difficulties between this and our coming to enjoy thy habitation, thou wilt guide us in thy strength, and carry thy people all the way through to the house of thy holiness: this made them sing so cheerfully. And again, ver. 17, "Thou shalt bring them in, and plant them in the mountain of thine inheritance, in the place, O Lord, which thou hast made for thee to dwell in, in the sanctuary, O Lord, which thy hands have established." So David, Psal. xxvii. 4, "One thing have I desired of the Lord, that will I seek after; that I may dwell in the house of the Lord all the days of my life, to behold the beauty of the Lord, and to inquire in his temple." This is a choice mercy, therefore all mercies that make way for it are indeed sweet. So we should look upon all our deliverances from outward troubles, and whatsoever peace God gives us, as sweet and comfortable preludes to this mercy of enjoying God's mountain, of living in God's habitation, that we may dwell there all the days of our life.

Obs. 13. New mercies should recall the memory of old. They shall sing as in the day when they came up out of the land of Egypt; that is, I will grant to them yet further mercies, and these shall renew the memory of all the former ones they have enjoyed from me. As new guilt summons up the recollection of former transgressions, so new mercies recall the memory of former ones. Has God rescued you from any danger now? were you never delivered before? if even when a child, the present deliverances should remind you of what you then received. So in a nation; does God grant it any new mercy? this should bring to their remembrance all the mercies they ever have received. "Bless ye God in the congregations, even the Lord from the fountain of Israel," Psal. lxxviii. 26. You who are true Israelites, bless God now; but in your praises, let present mercies be to you as streams to lead you to the fountain. Consider in order the whole series of them till you come to the source, even that covenant which God has made with Israel.

Obs. 14. All former mercies to God's people should strengthen our faith in future ones. Why does the prophet remind them of coming out of the land of Egypt? that he might help and strengthen their faith in believing the mercy which was to come. As if he should say, That God who has wrought so wonderfully for you, in delivering you out of the land of Egypt, is able and willing to make good his word in granting you deliverance hereafter. Many scriptures confirm this, as Psal. lxxvi. 6, "He turned the sea into dry land, they went through the flood on foot: there did we rejoice in him." Mark, "they went through the flood," and "there did we rejoice in him." How did we rejoice in him? it was many hundred years after, that we rejoiced. But by the manifestation of God's great goodness to his people in former days, our faith is strengthened in his mercies for our times; and "there did we rejoice in" his leading of Israel through the Red Sea upon dry land, as an argument to us of the power, goodness, and faithfulness of God. Again, Hos. xii. 4, "He had power over the angel: he found him in Bethel, and there he spake with us." Mark, "He had power over the angel: he found him in Bethel." Who "found him?" Jacob, who lived many years before. But "there he spake with us;" not with Jacob only, but with us, that is, whatsoever goodness the Lord showed to Jacob in Bethel, it concerned us for the strengthening of our faith. So, Matt. xx. 31, 32, "Have ye not read that which was spoken unto you by God, saying, I am the God of Abraham, and the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob?" This was spoken to Moses many hundred years before; but that expression of God's grace then, was a strengthening of the faith of the godly when Christ spake, and now confirms ours.

Obs. 15. Mercies ought to be met with proportionate thankfulness. They shall sing as they did in the days when they came out of Egypt. I will grant you as great mercies as they had, and I expect as much gratitude: as they sung to my praise, so must you sing also. God shows as much mercy to you now, as heretofore, and I appeal to you, nay, God appeals to your consciences, Is there proportionate thankfulness? There has been a time when your hearts have been enlarged to ascribe praise to God, why should it not be so now?

Obs. 16. Deliverance out of Egypt is an ascending condition, as in the original, "They shall ascend out of the land of Egypt:" as then God would never rest till he brought them up to Mount Zion; so when he begins to deliver his people from antichristian bondage, they should never rest in their minds until they reach the height of their deliverance, that is, come to enjoy God's ordinances in his own ways, in the purity and power of them. Our misery and baseness lead us upon some little deliverance presently to rest, whereas we should aim yet higher and higher, and expect that God would go on still with us, and exalt us in the ways of mercy, until he has brought us even to the top of Mount Zion.

Obs. 17. When God raises the spirits of people to rejoice in his mercy, and their hearts are warmed, inflamed, and enlarged with his goodness; then is the time, if ever, to set upon a thorough reformation, to cast out all the remainders of superstition, and every species of false worship. This observation is derived from the connexion of these words with what follows, "And it shall be at that day, saith the Lord, that thou shalt call me Ishi; and shalt call me no more Baali; for I will take away the names of Baalim out of her mouth, and they shall no more be remembered;" that is, there shall be a most glorious reformation, and so complete, that they shall be delivered from all the remainders of their idol worship, and not so much as remember the very names of their false gods. "Thou shalt weep no more: he will be very gracious unto thee at the voice of thy cry," Isa. xxx. 19: the Lord promises abundance of mercy, tells them that they shall weep no more, and that he will be very gracious; now, mark what follows in ver. 22, "Ye shall defile also the covering of thy graven images of silver, and the ornament of thy molten images of gold: thou shalt cast them away as a menstruous cloth; thou shalt say unto it, Get thee hence." And 2 Chron. xxx. 26, you find "there was great joy in Jerusalem" on the celebration of their passover, such joy as was not "since the time of Solomon." Mark then the beginning of the next chapter; "Now when all this was finished," that is, when they had celebrated a passover so full, and had such abundance of joy as had not been in Jerusalem since the time of Solomon, "all Israel that were present went out to the cities of Judah, and brake the images in pieces, and cut down the groves, and threw down the high places and the altars out of all Judah and Benjamin." Their hearts were inflamed with the joy, and they went with full purpose of mind, and brake down the images, &c. And mark, it was Israel that did this; "Israel went out to the cities of Judah, and brake the images in pieces, and threw down the high places, and the altars out of all Judah." What had Israel to do with Judah? Judah and Israel were divided; but now their hearts were so inflamed for God, that they were not able to suffer any false worship among their brethren. Though it belonged to Judah, yet they would help their brethren to cast down all their images, and to cut down their groves and altars, when their hearts were warmed with joy in blessing the name of God. In such a case, men will do much for God; they will not stand examining every point, but commence work directly; the joy of the Lord will be the strength of their hearts. As when wicked men get together drinking, at feasts and in taverns, and their lusts become inflamed, what desperate resolutions to do evil are they filled with! so when God's saints are exercised in his ordinances, and refreshed with the sweetness of his love, when that lies glowing at their hearts, how resolved are they for God! they can then do any thing for him. Now the very names of Baalim must be taken away.

Ver. 16, 17. And it shall be at that day, saith the Lord, that thou shalt call me Ishi; and shalt call me no more Baali. For I will take away the names of Baalim out of her mouth, and they shall no more be remembered by their name.

Here we have a prophecy and promise of a thorough reformation of the church, as full as any I know of in Scripture. God has a time to reform his church thoroughly, the very names of their idols and the remembrance of them shall be taken away. This reformation is God's work, I will do it, saith God, "I will take away the names of Baalim."

"Thou shalt call me Ishi, and shalt call me no more Baali."

Why? what great difference is there between these two names, Ishi and Baali, that God will have one, but not the other?

Both of them signify almost the same thing; names very fit for a wife to apply to her husband. But Ishi comes from a word signifying strength, and the woman being the weaker vessel, therefore calls her husband Ishi, my strength; for the husband should be strength to the wife, he should live with her as a man of knowledge, be a protection to her, and help her in all her weaknesses and afflictions. Baali signifies my lord, as well as my husband; it is a word denoting rule and authority, and marking the inferiority of the wife; but Ishi has more love and familiarity in it: now God saith he will be called Ishi, but not Baali. Why? the word Baali is a very good word, and has a good signification, and is as proper to God as any name that can be given to him; by the church (except that God forbade it here): for when the church calls God Baali, it only means, O God, that art my Lord, my Husband, who art to rule and govern me: yea, and we find that God applies to himself this name, Isa. liv. 5, "Thy Maker is thine husband;" in the Hebrew, Thy Maker is thy Baal; so that husband and Baal are the very same. But now, because they had abused this word Baal, and given it to their idols, therefore God would have it no more. As the word tyrannus was a name once for a king, kings were called tyrants, without any such bad meaning as now; but because when kings had gotten the sole power into their own hands, they so often abused it to oppression, therefore oppressors were called tyrants. So fur, a thief, was once the ordinary term for a servant, fures and servi implying the same; but because many servants were false and dishonest, therefore fures began to be altogether understood in the worst sense, and at length applied only to thieves. So sophista, a sophist, was one who studied wisdom; but because they so much degenerated, and many, under pretence of the study of wisdom, deceived others, therefore the name sophist became equivalent to deceiver. I might instance many others.

But further, God saith that he would "take away the names of Baalim out of her mouth." May not we use then this word Baali?

Yes, it is not unlawful for us to use it, notwithstanding this, for the Holy Ghost long afterwards saith, "I have reserved to myself seven thousand men, who have not bowed the knee to the image of Baal," Rom. xi. 4. Thus it is mentioned and remembered even by the Spirit of God, therefore it is not a sin. Nay, not only the word Baal, but it is not unlawful to mention the names of any idols of the heathen; for the Holy Ghost, Acts xxviii. 11, speaking of the ship Paul sailed in, saith, "whose sign was Castor and Pollux," the names of two heathen idols. And you may observe, that in our text the remembering is as much forbidden as the mentioning. Now if it were a sin merely to mention the names of the heathen gods, it were a sin to remember them; therefore God means the mentioning of them honoris gratia, by way of honour, or without marked detestation of them.

From the words thus opened, there arise many observations very useful and seasonable for our times.

Obs. 1. There is much danger in words and names. You shall call me Ishi, I will not have you call me Baali, I will not have that word used. The devil has obtained much by words and names, formerly by the word puritan, though men knew not what it meant, and now by this new name that he has lately invented; the devil has always some words, some names, in which he sees advantage to distinguish men. Speaking of the ways of religion in the language of superstition does much injury. Concerning this, we have a notable observation from the papists themselves in the Rhemist Testament, in their notes on 1 Tim. vi. 20, "Keep that which is committed to thy trust, avoiding profane and vain babblings;" so we translate it: they render it, profane novelties, and observe on it, "Let us keep our forefathers' words, and we shall easily keep our old faith. The heretics call repentance amendment, but let us" (say they) "keep the old word penance; they call it the Lord's supper, but we will keep the old word mass; they say communion table, but let us retain the word altar; they use the terms elders and ministers, let us say priests; they say superintendents, but let us retain the word bishop;" (it is a Scripture word indeed, but not in the sense they use it: for in the Scripture sense every presbyter is a bishop:) "they say sacrament, let us keep the words sacrifice and host; they say congregation, let us keep the word church; they, morning and evening prayer, let us keep the words matins and evening song; and so oblation, and Lent, and Palm Sunday, and Christmas day," &c. This was the policy of papists, and it has been the means many of us have used to bring in popery. Let us take heed of this, for the devil is subtle in it, and though these words have some kind of good sense in the original, yet there is danger in the use of them. Augustine, in the preface to his Commentary on the Psalms, has this expression, "It is a better thing for Christians to speak according to the manner of the church."

So we may well say, It had been better, that in the mouths of protestants there had been the ordinary language of protestants, and not the language of papists. Certainly, if God had not been very merciful to us, the very language of papists that began to be used amongst us would have done abundance of mischief; and you should avoid it, and take heed, whatever pretence they may have for their words. In that place of the Rhemist Testament quoted, they say, "Let us take heed of the words of heretics;" they there confess that heretics (as they call us) use many words which have no great danger in them; but because they are the words of heretics, let us not (say they) use them: they are wise in their generation, they will not use our words; though they confess the words themselves contain no harm, yet because they consider them as our proper language, distinct from themselves, therefore no catholics should use them. Why should not we be as wise as they?

Obs. 2. Idolatry is a most loathsome and abominable thing. Why? Surely that is most loathsome that we may not so much as mention, nor even remember. We must seek to abolish the very name, the very remembrance, of idolatry as much as possible. We do not love the presence of one whom we hate; if we hate him very much we do not love so much as to see him; and if, perhaps, we see him afar off, our hearts rise against him; but if we cannot endure to name him, that is a greater degree of hatred; and if not even to remember him, it evidences still more our hatred. Yet thus should it be in our manifestation of our hatred to idolatry; we should not admit it into our company, much less then into the ordinances of God. We should not admit the sight, the name, no, not even the memory of it, without much indignation. "Oh, do not this abominable thing that I hate," saith the Lord, Jer. xlv. 4; exclaiming emphatically, as, if any of you should see one ready to murder your child or your father, you would shriek out, Oh, what mean you to do! do not such a horrible villany as this. So God as it were cries out, "Do not this abominable thing." It is observable in the second commandment, that God saith, He will visit the sin upon the third generation of them that hate him: none seem to love God more than will-worshippers; they not only worship God as he has appointed, but devise ways of their own; and yet God charges the breakers of no other commandment with hatred of him but these. As if God should say, You pretend love to me, in finding out new ways to worship me by you pretend decency and reverence, but I account it hating me, you can in nothing provoke me more.

Principale crimen
generis humani, summus seculi
peccatus, tota causa iudicii, idololatria.
Tertul. lib. de Idolat.

Tertullian remarks, Idolatry is the most heinous crime of mankind, it is the chief guilt of the world, and the only cause of judgment in the world.

It were good therefore, seeing God hates and loathes it so much, that we should hate and loathe it also, and therefore cast out even the name and memory of it; it were a happy thing if the names of popish, as well as heathenish, idols could be banished from the church; but I know not how it happens that we Christians still retain the use of them; the very days of the week among us are called by the names of planets, or heathen gods: not that I think it a sin, when it is the ordinary language of the world, to speak so as may be understood, for the apostle mentions the name of Castor and Pollux; but if there could be an alteration by general consent, (as our brethren in New England have,) it were desirable; and still more so, that our children might not be educated in the use of heathen poems, whereby the names of heathen idols are kept up fresh amongst us: the papists themselves acknowledge so much in the Rhemist Testament, in their notes on Rev. i. 10: "The name Sunday is heathenish, as all other of the week-days, some imposed by the Romans after the name of planets, some from certain idols which the Saxons worshipped, and to which they dedicated their days before they were Christians. These names the church rejecting, has appointed to call the first day Dominic, (the Lord's), the others by the name of Feries, successively to the last day of the week, which she calls by the old name sabbath, because that was of God, and not by imposition of the heathen." And in their Annotations upon Luke xxiv. 1, "The first day of the sabbath; that is, the first after the sabbath, which is our Lord's day. And from the apostle, 1 Cor. xvi. 2, commanding a collection to be made on the first day of the sabbath, we learn." (say they,) "both the keeping that day as the sabbath, and the church's naming the days of the week the 2nd, 3rd, and 4th of the sabbath, and so on, to be apostolical, which St. Sylvester afterward named the 2nd, 3rd, and 4th Feriam." Thus you have the papists acknowledging the Lord's day to be apostolical, and the calling of the days of the week the second, the third, the fourth, &c., to be likewise apostolical. The heathenish Roman names of the days were taken from the seven planets: 1. Sol, thence Dies solis, Sunday, dedicated to the sun. 2. Luna, Monday, dedicated to the moon. 3. Mars, Tuesday, dedicated to Mars. Our Tuesday is a Saxon name, from Tuisco, who they say was, since the tower of Babel, chief leader and ruler of the German nation, who, in honour of him, called this day Tuesday, Tuisco's day. 4. Mercurius, to whom Wednesday is dedicated, and we call it so, is from the Saxons' Woden, who was a great prince among them, and whose image they adored after his death. 5. Jupiter, to whom Thursday is dedicated; so called by us from the Saxon Thor, the name of an idol which they anciently worshipped. 6. Venus, to whom our Friday, which name is given it from Friga, an idol of the Germans. This idol was an hermaphrodite, and reputed to be the giver of plenty, and the causer of amity; the same perhaps which the Romans called Venus. 7. Saturnus, dedicated to Saturn, whence our Saturday; or, as others think, from Seater, an idol of the Germans. Exod. xxxiii. 13, we have this charge, "In all things that I have said unto you, be circumspect: and make no mention of the names of other gods, neither let it be heard out of thy mouth." And Psal. xvi. 4, David professes he will not take the names of idols into his lips.

Obs. 3. In God's worship, even trivial things, any way tending to idolatry, are to be avoided. The mere mention of the word Baali one would think to be one of the smallest things imaginable; but yet we see God would have his people avoid even that.

There is no commandment in which God speaks of himself as a jealous God, but in the second. Now jealousy, you know, not only causes one to be offended at some gross action, but with any thing tending to it; as a husband, if jealous, watches suspiciously the very looks of his wife. So saith God in this commandment, "I am a jealous God;" to note, that though we should not agree to gross idolatry, yet if we do any thing that even tends that way, that faintly approaches superstition, the Lord is jealous of that, and displeased even by such a thing. In his worship little things are not to be contemned, when we come to deal with him we should conscientiously perform even the smallest. The Pharisees, doubtless, when they washed their hands, and Christ would not wash his, would be ready to accuse him of being too scrupulous; What! is there any harm in the washing of a man's hands? yet Christ would not wash his. Though this might appear a little matter before others, yet because it tended in some measure to show some respect to their superstitious observances, Christ would not consent.

That noble servant of God and minister of the church, Marcus, bishop of Arethusa, in the time of Constantine, caused the overthrow of an idol's temple. When Julian came to be emperor, and forced the people of that place to rebuild it, they were ready to do it, but he refused; whereupon the people over whom he had been bishop, took him and stripped him of all his clothes, abused his body, and gave it up to the children to lance with their pen-knives, and then caused him to be put in a basket, and having anointed his naked body with honey, set him in the sun to be stung with wasps. All this cruelty they showed because he would not do any thing toward the building up of this idol temple; nay, they were content to spare him, if he would do even the least thing towards it, or give the merest trifle: but though the aiding in the smallest degree the re-edification of that idol temple might have saved his life, he would not do it; for a little thing in that which concerns the worship of God in religion, is of more concernment than your life or mine.

Theodoret recounts that Valentinian, who was afterwards emperor, going before Julian into the temple of the goddess Fortune, the priest had his holy water, (just as the papists, who imitate the heathen,) and as he sprinkled it upon Julian, there came by accident a drop on Valentinian, who presently struck the priest, and taking his garment, cut that part of it in pieces upon which the water had fallen. Some would say, Alas, why that? It was but a little water that dropped on him, and that by accident; yet, in detestation of idolatry, he cut in pieces that part of his garment. We cannot show our hatred against idolatry fully, except we show it in little, as well as in things very gross and vile.

Theodoret, lib. 4. cap. 15, tells of the zeal of children of Samosaten, who because a tennis ball with which they played had but touched the foot of the ass whereon Lucius, their heretical bishop, rode, they cried out it was defiled, and burnt it in the market-place. Hatred is much shown in little things.

Obs. 4. It is the duty of all God's people, to keep themselves as free as possible from all appearance of idolatry and superstition. Here they are forbidden so much as to mention the names of their idols, certainly therefore they must scrupulously avoid idolatry. We must not think it enough to say, Can any man convince us that this is idolatry? Though it be not, yet if it borders on it, it is our duty to abstain. "There shall be no strange god in you," or "by" you, Psal. lxxxi. 9. It is not only forbidden you to worship a false god, but you shall not even have a false god by you: as Deut. xxv. 13, when God would forbid the sin of injustice, of selling wares by false weights, mark the expression, "Thou shalt not have in thy bag divers weights, a great and a small;" it was a sin to have a great and a small weight in a man's bag. Why? Because, on detection, a man might say, But can you prove that ever I sold wares by the small, or took wares in by this great weight? Yea, but, saith God, that you may be far off from the sin of injustice, I require of you that you shall not have them in your bag: God would have us keep from the very verge of that sin, much more from idolatry, which is the worst of all sins. Isa. lxxv. 4, God charges upon them, not only that gross sin of "eating swine's flesh," but having the "broth of abominable things in their vessels." They might say, We use not the flesh but the broth. No, you must not have the broth of abominable things in your vessels; you must keep far off from that defilement: as the Lord speaks concerning "the strange woman," "Remove thy way far from her, and come not nigh the door of her house," Prov. v. 8. If one should say, We will not commit uncleanness; But, saith God, you must remove your way far from her, and not come nigh her, no, not nigh the door of her house. We must not come nigh popery, but abstain from the appearance of that evil. Certainly, it has been a great distemper in many of your hearts, that you went so nigh to popery, especially when the tide was coming in upon you. To stand at the edge of the water when the sea is coming in, especially in some places, as in the Washes in Lincolnshire, is dangerous; but when the tide is going away, is less dangerous. Many of you, when the tide of popery and superstition was flowing, stood upon the very edge of the water: this is a sin of which you ought to repent.

Obs. 5. The church of God must not worship God after the manner of idolaters. They must not even make mention of the names they did; certainly, then, not worship God in a manner conformably to their customs. Deut. xii. 30, 31, "Take heed to thyself, that thou be not snared by following them, after that they be destroyed from before thee; and that thou inquire not after their gods, saying, How did these nations serve their gods? even so will I do likewise. Thou shalt not do so unto the Lord thy God:" and ver. 32, "What thing soever I command you, observe to do it: thou shalt not add thereto, nor diminish from it." Thou shalt not so much as inquire how others serve their gods, what their rites and ordinances and manner of serving their gods are, thou shalt not worship me so. As if he should say, "Whatsoever thing I command you, observe to do it, thou shalt not add thereto, nor diminish from it;" you must keep to that, and not think to worship me as others worship their idols. The Lord insists much on this, though the thing in itself be lawful, yet because adopted by idolaters, it must therefore be rejected. In Ezek. xlv. 20, there is a commandment to the priests of the Lord, that they shall not "shave their heads," nor suffer their "locks to grow long;" but "they shall only poll their heads." Arias Montanus translates the words, "They shall clip equally their hair all of a length;" and the old translation, "They shall round their heads," both which are agreeable to the Hebrew, and refer to the practices of the idolatrous priests, and their several ways of worshipping their idols; some of them shaving their heads, others wearing long hair as women, and both carrying it to an extreme. Now, saith God to his priests, you shall do neither, but "only poll" or "round your heads." Certainly, the devil forgot this scripture, when he raised up such a name as Round-heads, to reproach men by; seeing the word of God is thus express on the point. And on the other side, when the Scripture would describe the enemies of God, it notices, on the contrary, their "hairy scalp," Psal. lxxviii. 21.

When the Lacedemonians wished to reform excess in apparel, which prevailed amongst them, they at length resolved, that there should be a law forbidding any but harlots to wear rich and showy clothes; thinking by this means to induce all women who regarded their reputation, to adopt mean or plain clothing, and they succeeded. If by the light of nature, when a thing became fashionable with harlots, grave and sober matrons disused it; then what idolaters adopt in worship, the church should abstain from: if there must not be a conformity between matrons and harlots, there must not surely be a conformity between the church of God and idolaters.

Tendendo equae
atooedebunt.

—Tredecim mensas lapideas in Atris exterioribus fuisse, quibus adstantes homines orant: fuerit vero ille partim ad meridienam, ad occidentem, ad septentrionem sita, ad orientem nulla. Montan. de fabrica Templi, l. 56.

Arias Montanus saith, that the Jews report of thirteen tables of stone that were in the outward court of the temple, at which men were wont to pray, all of them were made, so that some looked to the north, some to the south, and some to the west, but not one toward the east.

And God built his temple so that the holy of holies should not look toward the east, but toward the west. Hence, Ezek. viii. 16, it is said that those who worshipped the sun with "their faces toward the east," had "their backs toward the temple;" so that it appears plainly that the temple stood westward. As there were so many among whom the Jews lived that were worshippers of the sun, and in their adorations would ever look eastward, for that very reason the Lord would not have the holy of holies built eastward. Now all your chancels in England are built eastward; and it used to be the custom of your superstitious worshippers, when they came into such a place, to look eastward, and bow solemnly themselves not only to the altar, but toward the east. I have myself seen a bishop, when the communion table was set in another place, neglect that, and go to the east end of the chancel and bow himself, though his back was toward the table. And you may observe, that in all your burials the corpses are laid east and west, in order (say some) that when Christ comes to judgment they may be ready to look him in the face; it being a tradition that he shall come from the east. You must not think that those who do not follow the old customs of superstition are influenced by perverseness of disposition; God thus enjoined his people, when they saw idolaters worship one way, that they should worship another. We must refrain from borrowing of the Egyptians, lest with the imaginary riches we contract their botches and boils. We have sufficient in the word of God, and need not to imitate idolaters and papists in their forms of worship.

Obs. 6. Things that, in themselves considered, are harmless, yet, if abused to the service of idolatry, must be cast away. On this the text is most explicit: "I will take away the names of Baalim out of her mouth." The name was good, but being abused, was to be taken away; yea, not only such things as originate with idolaters, but even such as at first were of God's own institution; if they cease to be so, if he require not the continuance of them, they must be not only reformed, but wholly rejected from God's worship. Many will easily grant that the inventions of idolaters should be rejected by us; but they say that the present ceremonies originated with the ancient fathers in the primitive times, before popery appeared. For a full answer to this objection you have an express command, Exod. xxxiv. 13, "Ye shall destroy their altars, break their images, and cut down their groves." Here the groves were to be cut down, and they originated not with idolaters, for Gen. xxi. 33 saith, that "Abraham planted a grove, and called there on the name of the Lord, the everlasting God;" groves had a good original in Abraham, but afterwards being abused by idolaters, God requires them to be cut down. And 2 Kings xviii. 4, the "brazen serpent" spoken of originated with God himself, as a temporary ordinance, and they might think and plead that it was kept as a religious monument; but Hezekiah, according to the command of God, beat down the brazen serpent, and called it, by way of contempt, Nehushtan, a piece of brass. It had once been a notable instrument of good to the people of Israel, but now it was but Nehushtan, a piece of brass. And further, to the abolishing things that have been abused to idolatry, there is added a gracious promise, Isa. xxvii. 9, "By this therefore shall the iniquity of Jacob be purged; and this is all the fruit to take away his sin; when he maketh all the stones of the altar as chalk-stones that are beaten in sunder." Then indeed has Jacob's correction produced the desired effect on him to purge away his sin, "when he maketh all the stones of the altar as chalk-stones." And Josiah is commended, 2 Kings xxiii., for destroying the high places, the groves and altars, and the chariots for the sun. And repenting Manasseh, 2 Chron. xxxiii. 15, is commended for taking away the strange gods, and the idol out of the house of the Lord, and all the altars. And Daniel, chap. i., would not eat of the king's meat, because it had been abused and consecrated to his idols.

But to explain this matter fully it will be necessary to meet an objection. You will say, Do not those prohibitions particularly concern the Jews, and not so fully apply to us? they sometimes are forbidden to take off the gold and silver off the idols; do such prohibitions concern us in every thing abused to idolatry?

For answer, I confess, I think we are not bound in every particular to follow the commandments that God gave them; neither do I think that if they had not been prohibited by some express commandment, their using the silver or gold of an image for some civil purpose, had been no sin in them; these things being required of them by a positive law, and not contained in the second commandment, further than by moral implication.

But how far do these commands bind us?

In a three-fold manner.

First, We must retain nothing that conduces to honour any false worship. If Mordecai would not bow to a living monument of that nation whose name God had ordained to be blotted out from under heaven, much less should we reverence dumb monuments of those idols which God has devoted to destruction. We must not show respect to any thing that idolaters have abused, when our reserving or respecting them may in any way maintain their honour. Therefore, certainly, this is true, that to take a ceremony from papists, and introduce it into the most solemn ordinance of Christ, yea, to incorporate it with it, that it may add to the honour of that ordinance, can never be justified. There never was any ceremony more abominably abused than that of the cross: now though it be not a sin to make a cross, yet to bring it into one of the most solemn ordinances of Christ's church, and to make it there conduce to the honour of that ordinance, is plainly a great evil, if men will but open their eyes to the extent of it. So for vestments; suppose there might be some use in them, yet to bring them to add decency to the worship of God, to think that those vestments that have been so notoriously abused should do honour to Divine worship, must needs be sinful: surely all those scriptures that required the Jews to abolish things abused by idolaters, if they carry any moral obligation in them, prohibit these.

Secondly, When any thing once abused to idolatry, implies in the use of it any communion with idolaters, then it must be rejected. This is clear from Rev. ii. 20, where the church of Thyatira is charged that they did "eat things sacrificed unto idols." Why? the meat sacrificed to idols was good meat, a good creature of God, for we know that "every creature of God is good, if it be sanctified by the word and prayer," yet they are charged as sinning against Christ in the use of it. You will say, What is it to them if it were offered to idols? they might eat it as God's creature. But it was a sin, because the eating argued communion with the idolaters: this is plain in 1 Cor. x. 18—21, where you have the argument of the apostle against eating things offered to idols, and he reasons thus; When you eat the same bread in the sacrament, it is a mark of your communion one with another; so your eating of the things sacrificed to idols, is an acknowledgment of your communion with them. Such is the argument of the apostle in that place, and upon that ground it is made a sin; "You cannot" (saith he) "be partakers of the Lord's table, and of the table of devils;" in eating of their meat you communicate with them, and so sin.

Thirdly, It is a sin against God to make use of any thing abused by idolaters when it becomes a scandal to our brethren, a snare to the weak, 1 Cor. x. 28. Eating meat offered to idols is forbidden in the place before referred to, on the ground of communicating; but in this place it is forbidden upon the ground of scandal. Calvin, in his Epistle to the Lord Protector in King

Quid enim ille cere-monie aliud fuerit quam totidem Iero-solianis, quæ miseræ animas ad malum perducerent?

Edward's days, saith, What were the ceremonies maintained in England, but so many pleasing allurements, that insnare poor miserable souls, and bring them into evil? Certainly, what we have retained have brought in abundance of evil, and been the means of insnaring many souls. In these three things the rules that concern the Jews have a bearing on us.

But yet they must be observed with some cautions, and understood to regard,

First, Things that are not ordinances continued by God; for certainly if it be an ordinance that God has appointed, though idolaters abuse it never so much, we must maintain it. It is true, the brazen serpent was an ordinance of God, but only to serve a temporary occasion, and therefore, being abused to idolatry, was to be destroyed; but when a thing is an ordinance appointed by God to be continued in the church, we must persevere in the use of it, though it be abused. As in baptism, the ordinance is water; though they abuse water we must continue its use: in the Lord's supper, the elements are bread and wine; and though they are abused we must continue them. Why? Because no abuse is an argument to refuse that which is a duty: the subject causing scandal may in itself be a thing indifferent; but if it be an ordinance, we must continue our obedience, whether men be offended or not.

Secondly, Neither do any of these rules affect any thing indispensably necessary for the worship of God. Suppose idolaters have abused a place of meeting for God's worship; when we have no other place to assemble, this is, for the present at least, necessary for God's worship; a place is required, and if no other can at the time be had, we are bound to worship in that place: the abuse of men must not hinder the service of God. God has never put his worship under the power of wicked men, that they should deprive his people of it at their pleasure.

Thirdly, Any ceremony that naturally, and not merely by virtue of man's appointment, has such decency in it, that its absence would be improper, then, though never so much abused, we are to preserve; for it is the duty of God's people to worship him in a decent way; it is the rule of the apostle, "Let all things be done decently," that is, conformably to what the light of nature teaches, though not expressly revealed in the Scriptures. Such a decency as a thing derives from the institution of man is not here referred to; but such as God in the nature of the thing puts upon it, so that if it were wanting there would be a deficiency. But if the things be merely man's inventions and institutions, having their supposed decency, not from what is indeed in the things themselves, but from that which man's institution puts on them, then they come not under that rule of the apostle; but the abuse of them is a sufficient argument for their rejection.

But it may be objected, If we can instruct people what the abuse is, and what right use they may make of such things, will not that excuse the retaining of them?

No, certainly; it was not allowed the Jews to use the name Baal, though their prophets might teach them in what the abuse of it consisted. Things that have had poison in them, none will be so unwise as to keep by them, under pretence of washing them clean; if they be broken vessels of which there is no use, they are cast upon the dunghill with less trouble and more safety.

All things that are of man's invention, yea, those things that have been God's ordinances, but now are out of date, the Scripture calls "beggarly elements:" you cannot compare men's inventions to clothes, or any thing worth the airing or keeping; but the truth is, all such things as have been abused to idolatry, are but as dirty rags and plasters laid upon plague-sores.

But, further, you will say, If the use we retain them for be not the same they were employed in, why may we not do so?

The text answers that, though the Jews should call God Baal in a right sense, it was not enough, they must wholly reject the very mentioning of the name. The church is the wife of Christ, he is jealous, and has cause to be so, for he knows, while we are in the flesh, that we are prone to spiritual adultery; and if we take any ceremony from popish idolatry, and join it with his ordinances, and think to plead that we intend to make no ill use of it, this will not satisfy Christ.

If any say, Why should we not retain our liberty if the things be good?

But why shouldst thou not manifest thy hatred to all idolatry? And why shouldst thou not tender thy brethren so, as to prevent all scandal that may come by the use of such things?

But, you will say, the idolatry of papists and the idolatry of heathens is not the same, there is a great deal of difference between the heathens in their worship of their idols, and the papists worshipping of God, though in a false way.

Indeed the difference seems great, but yet the idolatry is the same in both; for you are mistaken, if you think that many of the heathens worshipped a false god, otherwise than the papists do; though they made stocks and stones their idols, yet they worshipped the God that was Primum Ens, the First Being, in and through those idols. Therefore, Austin upon Psal. xvi. introduces one answering thus, We do not worship a stone, but the virtues, the strength, and the powers of the great God. And one Maximus Madaurensis, whom Austin speaks of in his 43rd Epistle, saith, Who is so mad, or so void of sense, as to doubt whether there be more gods than one? we invoke the virtues of this one God, under many names, diffused through the frame of the whole world. What more fair answer can papists give for their idolatry? Therefore the thing continues still clear, that (with the rules and cautions before-mentioned) such things as have been abused to idolatry must be wholly cast away; we must not retain them and think to excuse ourselves to God with such distinctions. To what end do we retain them? Is there not sufficient in the worship of God itself to make it acceptable to him?

To add a word or two more upon this subject; it has always been the care of the churches of God, to distinguish their worship from that of idolaters. The Manichees were wont to keep their fasts on the Lord's day, on account of which the churches utterly prohibited the keeping of fasts on that day, because they would not do as the Manichees. Tertullian saith, it is nefas, a detestable wickedness, to fast on the Lord's day. And Ignatius saith, to fast on the Lord's day is to kill Christ. Tertullian states, that a Christian soldier in the army of the heathen, who, when they, in honour of their idol gods, wore on their heads coronets of bays, instead of wearing his on his head, held it in his hand; upon which there arose a great mutiny in the army, his fellows being indignant that one soldier should be in a different garb from all the rest: Surely this is some nice-conscienced soldier, that, forsooth, cannot do as others, he must hold the coronet of bays in his hand, whereas others wear it on their heads. The murmurs of the soldiers reached at length the officers of the army, and the Christian being asked why he differed from his fellows, gave this answer, I am a Christian, and therefore it does not besem me to do as these do, who wear the bays on their heads in honour of their idol gods: at this they were all greatly incensed, and not only he himself, but all the Christians near at hand, were in danger of great persecution. Nay, there was much murmuring amongst other Christians, that this one man, by such over-scrupulousness, should endanger not only

Non lapidem colimus, sed virtutes Dei magnæ.

Tert. de Coron. Milit. Ignat. ep. 3. ad Philap.

*Sanctorum ceteris
fœderibus qui dæabus dominis servire se posse presument.
Tertul. de Corona
Militæ.*

himself, but others. Tertullian therefore, in his defence of this soldier, saith, that he was holier than his brethren, who thought and presumed they might serve two lords, that, in order to avoid persecution, they might comply with the heathens in their observances; and exclaims, in commendation of this action, O most glorious soldier, who would thus venture himself, and refuse to comply with idolaters! And whereas some, even Christians, who would rather comply than endanger themselves, would plead against him, and say, Where is it written in all the word of God, that we should not wear bays upon our heads? Tertullian replies, Where is it written that we may do it? We must look into the Scriptures to see what we may do, and not think it enough that the Scripture does not directly forbid this or that particular act. By this we see, that some, to avoid trouble and persecution, will, as far as possible, comply with the ways of idolatry; yet those who are truly of a Christian spirit, will courageously refuse, and rather hazard the sorest persecution.

Thus it should be with us, we must not retain, with the view of doing it honour, any thing that has been abused to idolatry; we must not so comply with idolaters, and especially in regard of that great idol, the cross, as to retain it, and bring it into the ordinances of God, into the very sacrament, which is surely doing it a great honour; yea, and too great an honour is put upon it, by placing it in the highest part of the city, and thinking it is an ornament to it, whereas it is indeed a great disgrace and dishonour, and retains the memory of your forefathers' superstition and shame.

Augustine saith, It is better to die with hunger than to eat things offered to idols: so far were these ancients from conforming with idolaters. Gabriel Biel saith, The church of Rome thought fit to use leavened bread, lest in unleavened they should seem to resemble Ebron the heretic; and Bellarmine would not have Paul called divus Paulus, but beatus, because divus and diva were terms applied by the heathen to their gods and goddesses.

*Medius mori fame
quam idolothytis vesci. August. de Bono Conjug. c. 18.*

Obs. 7. When God is reconciled to his people, there will be a thorough reformation both outward and inward. This promise to take away the names of Baalim, is introduced upon God's reconciliation to this people. Idolatry is cast out not only from the heart, but from the mouth; the taking away the names from their mouths is a synecdoche, and denotes the utter abolishing of all ways of idolatry in the outward practice, as well as in the inward affection. The more perfect the reconciliation with God is, the more enmity against idols and superstitious worship. A fearful proof then it is, that we in England were never thoroughly reconciled to God, because we never yet have cast off our idols. As some remnants of superstition, still abiding amongst us, not long since broke forth in the most horrid and vile forms of false worship; so some remainders of God's wrath amongst us this day break forth into a most dreadful flame. When the Jews shall be called again, and God shall be perfectly reconciled to his churches, then idolatry shall be wholly rejected, and their idols shall not even be mentioned any more; and to these times this text refers, and shall then be perfectly fulfilled.

Obs. 8. When a people is reconciled to God, then they call God theirs. My husband, "Ishi." Psal. xvi. 3, 4, David professes that he would not so much as take up the names of idols into his lips; and mark what follows, ver. 5, The Lord is my portion; when the prophet is so taken off from idols, as not to mention their names, then "the Lord is the portion of his inheritance:" so here, now, "Ishi," the Lord is my husband; now can we claim a peculiar interest in God. This is the evil of sin, it hinders a nation, it prevents a soul, from claiming this interest in God. God is a blessed and glorious God; yea, but what is that to this apostatizing people? what is that to this apostatizing soul? but when the soul comes to God, and begins thoroughly the work of reformation, then, This God is my God, Ishi, my husband. Can any comfort, any profit, that you have in ways of sin counterbalance this great loss? you gain some contentment to the flesh, some profit in your estate; but you lose the comforts of your interest in God, and "what profiteth" it you? Think of this when temptation comes; I may be yielding to it gratify so far the flesh, but I shall lose the blessed privilege of claiming an interest in my God, I shall not be able to say, Ishi, my husband.

Obs. 9. God delights to have his people look upon him with love and delight. It is his care and good pleasure that his people should not look upon him so much as one that has dominion over them, but regard him with joy and love, and call him Ishi, and not Baali. But the more reconciled we are to God, the more may we use loving appellations. For a soul to be always under the spirit of bondage, to look unto God merely as the Lord of all, is not so pleasing to him; but when you come to have the spirit of adoption, the spirit of grace, an evangelical spirit, so that you can regard him with affection, and use that title of love and goodness, Ishi, my husband, this is well-pleasing to God. It is reported of Augustus, that he refused the title of lord, and would rather have his people look upon him under the notion of love as a father, than fear him as a lord. It were happy if all princes were of this mind, to desire that their people should rather love than fear them! It is a most wicked and cursed principle, that which some infuse into the mind of princes, Let your people fear you, no great matter whether they love you or no. Suetonius relates of Augustus, that when a poor man came to present him a petition, with hands shaking and trembling from fear, the emperor was much displeased, and said, It is not fit that any should come with a petition to a king, as if a man were giving meat to an elephant, fearing every moment to be destroyed by him. God loves not the bread of mourners to be offered up in sacrifice; but to have his people come before him with a holy boldness, with a filial, not with a servile and slavish spirit. Christ laid down his life to redeem us, that we might serve the Lord without fear.

Obs. 10. The church should look upon Christ as the strength of it. "They shall call me Ishi," that is, My strength. "Thy Maker is thine husband;" and who is he? "The Lord of hosts is his name: thy Redeemer; The God of the whole earth shall he be called." When the people of God can look upon Christ their husband as the Lord of hosts, and their Redeemer as the God of the whole earth, then they find quiet and satisfaction in their minds. Psal. lxxxix. 17, God is said to be the glory of the strength of his people: though we be weak in regard of outward aid, let us look up to Christ our strength, he has been our strength, and is "the glory of it."

Obs. 11. Repentance must be proportionable to men's sins. How do we infer that? Ver. 13, God charged them that they had forgotten him, "She went after her lovers and forgat me, saith the Lord." Now, saith God, your idols shall be forgotten: your hearts were so set upon your idols that you forgat me; now in your repentance your hearts shall be so fixed on me, that you shall forget your idols. Men who have been heretofore so wicked and ungodly that they have forgotten God, God has not been "in all their thoughts," he now expects from them that their lusts should be "no more remembered." It is not enough that you forbear the act, but you must not roll the sweets of them in your thoughts; you must not so much as remember them, except with detestation. If there be not a proportion between your repentance and your former sins, you may expect there will be a proportion between God's wrath and your former sins.

Obs. 12. "And they shall no more be remembered by their name." All superstitious vanities, though they may seem for the present very glorious, yet in time will vanish and come to nothing; God has a time to make them vanish, so that they shall not even be thought of. In Col. ii. 22, it is said of the rudiments of the world which are according to the doctrine of men, that they "all are to perish with the using;" that is, they effect nothing that they seem to be appointed for, no present good arises from them, but in the very use they come to nothing; and God in his time will cause them all to perish utterly, and the very remembrance of them shall be taken away. It is true, that for the present, while men's hearts are set upon their superstitions, they are glorious in their eyes; but these glorious things will come to nothing; whereas those ordinances of God which seem to be but mean, and in which only the simplicity of the gospel appears, shall be manifested to be full of beauty; and though at present they be obscured, yet shall they be glorious in the eyes of the saints to the end of the world. Not long since, what a stir was there about the more than decent, nay, even superstitious, embellishing of temples, and building of altars, and splendid canopies! what sumptuous and fine trappings had they, and all to adorn a pompous, superstitious mode of worship, which altogether prevailed! As for the purity and simplicity of God's ways and worship, how were they trampled under feet as unworthy and contemptible! But those things which for a while seemed so glorious, begin to vanish, and we hope ere long will come to nothing; the very memory of them shall perish. The purity of God's worship, and the simplicity of the gospel in God's ordinances, shall recover their pristine beauty and glory, when those braveries shall be no more.

Obs. 13. A true penitent cannot remember former sins without indignation, for so the phrase "they shall not remember" signifies. Some of us may remember how we have been entangled in ways of false worship, and how we have defiled our consciences therein. We said we would yield as far as we could, but we yielded farther than we could, for id possumus quod jure possumus, &c., and have cause to remember it with shame and confusion of face. Ye old men may remember the sins of your youth; but how can you remember them and speak of them with joy and merriment? That is a desperate sign, that you are in a high degree left of God, and given up to hardness, when you so remember the sins of your youth, as to tell tales of the pranks of your younger days with joy? You should remember them with shame and indignation, the sweet morsels of former sins coming up into remembrance should be bitter and sour unto you.

Obs. 14. The taking off men's hearts from idolatrous ways, is a special work of God. "I will," saith God, "take away the names of Baalim out of their mouths." The people in these times cleaved to their false ways of worship, and had many arguments to uphold them; but there shall come a day, saith the Lord, when I will take away the names out of their mouths; I will stop your mouths, I will take off your hearts from all those reasonings by which you maintain those ways, I will silence all; and then you shall see convincingly to your shame, that you have been gulled by such vain and false distinctions. What numerous means God uses to take off men's hearts from ways of false worship! What a number of distinctions and objections have men, their hearts cling to them, unwilling to be loosed from them! Now and then their consciences are wrung, yet they hold fast; and then conscience has another wring, and then they have another objection, and another distinction; and yet perhaps true grace exists notwithstanding this.

But God having love to them, by some way or other takes off their hearts, either by settling truths upon their souls by his Spirit, or by some notable works of providence. As long as men cannot enjoy their estates, liberties, and comforts, without yielding to the ways of superstition, they will not be taken off from them; they please themselves (and perhaps speak what they think) that they do nothing against the light of their consciences; for why? their engagements keep off the strength of truth, that it comes not with a full conviction to the conscience. But when God by any work of his providence takes off their hearts from engagements, and sets before them the same truths as formerly, they see now a convincing evidence in those truths, and wonder that they discerned it not before. They read books before that had the same arguments against their ways, and for the truth, but they could not see their full strength; now they see it apparently, and are ashamed of themselves every time they go into the presence of God. Now they see them with such clearness, that they think they could lay down their lives for them; whatever they suffer for time to come, they can never yield to what they have yielded before. Why? God has come with power! God has taken off their hearts! When God thus comes, the thing will easily be done.

Let us take heed we do not stand out too long, lest God take off our hearts by some dreadful judgment. It were better our mouths were stopped, our objections silenced, and all the relics and remainders of false worship taken from us through the word and Spirit of God. If that will not do, God will come in some other way, and take the name of Baalim out of our mouths. If we will keep the memory of superstitious ways, God may extirpate the memory of them by such ways as may prove fearful to us, and make our hearts ache, and our ears tingle. "In all your dwelling-places," saith God, "the cities shall be laid waste, and the high places shall be desolate that your altars may be laid waste and made desolate, and your idols may be broken and cease, and your images may be cut down, and your works may be abolished," Ezek. vi. 6. Observe, "In all your dwelling-places the cities shall be laid waste;" to what end? "that your altars may be laid waste." So that God will lay waste their cities for this very end, that he may lay waste their altars; if they will not lay waste their altars, if they will not abolish their superstitions, God will abolish their cities. God has begun to put it into the heart of our governors to abolish many superstitious pictures and crosses in divers places; there is yet one great one remaining, and we hope God, upon the same grounds, may put into their hearts to abolish that. It would be a dreadful thing if we should not obey God, now calling upon us to cast out the remainders of idolatry and superstition, to lay waste all idolatrous pictures, images, and crosses; and he should lay waste your cities, to lay waste your altars, crosses, and relics of idolatry. You see, God threatens this here, as if God did not really desire to lay waste their cities, he would preserve them; but because he could not (we speak according to the manner of men) abolish their altars, but by laying waste their cities, saith God, Rather than your altars shall stand, your cities shall fall. God has ways, and most terrible ways too, to take away the memory of superstitious vanities. Oh that we had hearts to join with God before he comes in so dreadful a manner, to abolish the memory of such things! Were our prelates in their power, such a speech as this could not be borne. When Master Udal, a godly preacher in Queen Elizabeth's days, was charged with this expression, "If it come in (that is, the true government of Christ, as he means) by that means which will make all your hearts ache, blame yourselves;" for these words especially was he then condemned to be hanged: such was the rage and potency of the prelates in those days. What I have said may be against the spirits of such as cleave to superstitious vanities; but we have no cause to fear exasperating such, for surely they cannot be more angry than they are, and it would be a foolish thing to provoke God, for fear of further exasperating those who are already exasperated so much against us. What is the exasperation of vile men, to the abiding of the wrath of God upon us!

Ver. 18. And in that day will I make a covenant for them with the beasts of the field, and with the fowls of the heaven, and with the creeping things of the ground: and I will break the bow and the sword and the battle out of the earth, and will make them to lie down safely.

In this verse God promises peace and security; peace, in regard of their deliverance from the beasts of the field, and fowls of the heaven, and creeping things of the ground; peace from the hostility of their adversaries, he "will break the bow and the sword and the battle out of the earth:" and security, "I will make them lie down safely."

I. The first part of the promise is peace with the creatures: "And in that day will I make a covenant for them with the beasts of the field, and with the fowls of heaven, and with the creeping things of the ground."

Some allegorize these words, "the beasts of the field," and say they mean cruel men; the fowls of the air, ambitious, who are lofty in their thoughts and counsels; "the creeping things of the ground," subtle adversaries: God here promises, they say, to deliver them from all these. But I desire not to allegorize, unless there is a necessity, and therefore understand the words literally. But how may God be said to "make a covenant for" his people "with the beasts of the field, and with the fowls of heaven, and with the creeping things of the ground?" for, to speak properly, none but rational creatures are capable of a covenant with God.

The meaning is, there shall be such an establishment of God's work on the beasts, and fowls, and creeping things for the good of his church, as if God had bound them to serve it by way of covenant; that dealing of God is called "making a covenant with them," here and elsewhere; as in Jer. xxxiii. 20, "If ye can break my covenant of the day, and my covenant of the night, that there should not be day and night in their season." How does God covenant with the day, and with the night? Thus, there is an establishment of God's decree on the day, and on the night, that it should be in such a way from the creation to the end of the world; and that establishment is called God's covenant: so Ecclampadius renders my text, I will order inviolably and unalterably, there shall be an establishing decree upon these creatures, that they shall do you no hurt, but good.

Ita ordinabo inviolabiliter.

Obs. 1. Sin has caused enmity between man and the creatures; this is implied here, I will, saith God, upon your reconciliation with me, and your reformation, make a covenant with the creatures, now they shall be at peace with you; denoting, that by our sin there is grown enmity between us and God's creatures. We have lost by sin a great part of the dominion which God gave us over his creatures, and which resulted from the image of God wherein man was created. Therefore when you see any creature rebel against you, call to mind your rebellion against God. It is true, God maintains, in some measure, man's dominion over the creatures still, that the world, and human society, may be preserved. Sometimes you may see a little child driving before him a hundred oxen, this way or that, as he pleases, showing that God has continued somewhat of man's dominion over them. But a great part is lost by our sin. If we, who are the servants of God, rebel against him, it is just with God that the creatures, which were subjected to us, should rebel against us. And you who are superiors, when any of your inferiors are stubborn against you, your servants or your children rebellious, raise your hearts up to this meditation, My servant is rebellious against me, how have I been rebellious against the Lord! my child stubborn against me, how has my heart been stubborn against the Lord my Father!

Obs. 2. Peace with God brings peace with the creatures. "I will make a covenant with the beasts of the field," with the fowls of the air, &c. In Job v. 23, you have a strange promise, "Thou shalt be in league with the stones of the field: and the beasts of the field shall be at peace with thee." This goes somewhat deeper than that which is here promised; There shall be a league, not only with the beasts, but with the stones of the field. How in league with the stones of the field? It is more easy to be understood to be in league with the beasts of the field, for they are many times hurtful unto us; but how with the stones of the field? It was customary (and so it is still in many places) in fixing the bounds of their fields, to set up stones for landmarks, and engrave them, to denote to whom this or the other parcel of ground belonged. Now the Lord promises that he would be so gracious to his people, that they should enjoy the bounds of their own habitations securely, they should not be wronged, nor their landmarks taken away. "Thou shalt be in league with the stones of the field;" that is, the stones of the field that stand for your landmarks shall abide, and none shall take them away; I will preserve your bounds, as if you were in league with the stones that are your landmarks, as if they had agreed with you, and covenanted that they would stand, and set out the bounds of your fields for ever.

But you will say, Sometimes the beasts of the field do injure the saints, how then does God make a covenant with them?

Many answers might be given. In ver. 17, of the chapter of Job referred to, he speaks of a time when "God correcteth," and men "despise not the chastening of the Almighty:" now the expression in ver. 23, relates to that time; that is, when any make use of God's correction, do not despise it, but reverently submit to his hand, then God will make this "league with the stones of the field," and "with the beasts of the earth." If God has corrected you with any sickness, and you do not profit by it, it is just with God that some or other of his creatures should meet you, and be more terrible to you than ever your sickness was. And the promise here in Hosea is to those who are reconciled to God, and have cast off their superstitious vanities; and because we are not perfectly reconciled, therefore this promise is not perfectly fulfilled. But I make no question but the Holy Ghost here refers to the time of the calling of the Jews; and then I verily believe that this promise, and those in Isaiah and other places, where God says he will make "the lion to eat straw with the ox, and that "no venomous creature shall do them hurt," shall be literally fulfilled. When the calling of the Jews shall take place, the creatures shall be restored to a state of excellence, resembling their condition with Adam in Paradise. The lion was not at its creation made to live upon prey, nor the creatures formed to devour one another, therefore the promise is, that the lion shall return to its state previous to the fall. And at the calling of the Jews it is very probable there will be such "a restitution of all things," Acts iii. 21, that the creature will be restored to its original excellency. And though this may be partly fulfilled to God's people, that the beasts of the field shall do them no hurt, that is, if they prevail against them it shall be for some gracious ends which God has in view; yet the literal accomplishment of the promise is reserved for that day.

Obs. 3. When God is reconciled to his people, shall the beasts of the field, and the fowls of the air, and the creeping things of the earth be at peace with the saints? what a wicked and ungodly thing is it then in men, that the more any are reconciled to God, the greater enemies are they to them! God promises, when his people are reconciled to him, the creatures shall be reconciled to them; yet, thou vile wretch, when thou seest one grow up in the ways of reconciliation with God, thy enmity increases towards him: what horrible wickedness is this! it is far more than brutish, it is desperate wickedness. As with those five kings of Canaan, spoken of Josh. x. 5, who, as soon as the Gibeonites had made peace and a league with Joshua, conspired against them. They lived quietly enough before with them, but when they heard that they had made a covenant with Joshua, they immediately made war upon them. Thus it is with many at this day, when your companions would drink, swear, and break the sabbath, and be unclean, and scorn with you, they were good fellows, then you embraced them, and delighted in them; but as soon as God wrought upon their hearts, and they were brought from enmity into a state of reconciliation, your minds rise against them, and you regard them with hatred and abhorrence. Oh horrible and desperate wickedness! the Lord rebuke you this day, the Lord strike upon such hearts. Before Saul's conversion he was in much repute, but as soon as he became a Christian, he was a "pestilent and seditious fellow:" "Away with such a man from the earth, he is not worthy to live;" and forty of them conspired together and bound themselves with an oath, that they would neither eat nor drink till they had killed him.

Obs. 4. Covenant mercy is excellent mercy indeed. "I will make a covenant," saith God, you shall have this mercy, and have it by covenant. The same mercy coming in the course of general providence is nothing so sweet, nothing so firm, as that which arises from the covenant. When the saints receive a mercy, though it be in external circumstances, they rejoice not in it, merely because they have some comfort and contentment to the outward man by it; but because they see that even this outward mercy comes to them by virtue of God's covenant, which sweetens and confirms every gift; when they go up and down the field, and the beasts come not upon them to destroy them, they can look upon their present safety as enjoying it in the covenant.

You will say, the wicked can walk up and down in the fields, and the beasts not destroy them. Though they can, yet a godly man has more enjoyment as he can see that this his safety arises from the covenant: when he goes on a journey, his beast is not made an instrument of God's wrath to dash out his brains; perhaps it is so with his wicked neighbour who accompanies him; but the preservation of the godly man is a mercy from the covenant which God has made with him, "to preserve him in all his ways," whereas to the other it is but general providence. Wicked men may have the same mercies for the matter of them that the godly have, yet there is a kernel in the mercy which only the saints enjoy.

There are two things observable in mercies coming by covenant. First, They are more sweet. "All the paths of the Lord are mercy and truth unto such as keep his covenant," Psal. xxv. 10. This is a sweet promise, a soul-satisfying promise, more worth than all the riches of your city: all the dealings of God's ordinary providence "are mercy and truth unto such as keep his covenant." Mark, perhaps they are mercies to you, there is a general bounty in your ordinary preservation, but they are not "mercy and truth" to you; there lies the emphasis; they are "mercy and truth" to the godly, that is, they are such mercies as are bound to them by covenant; therein David rejoices, and therefore saith in the beginning of the Psalm, "Unto thee, O Lord, do I lift up my soul," as amongst other reasons, so for this, that all the paths of God are not only mercy, but "mercy and truth." You have been preserved, and have had many mercies from God; well, they are God's mercies to you, but are they mercies and truth to you? that is, do they come to you in a way of promise? Look to that, the sweetness of a mercy consists in it, and it is a good sign of a gracious heart to look more to the source whence mercy comes, than to the outward advantage it conveys.

Secondly, They are more firm. Isa. liv. 10, "The mountains shall depart, and the hills be removed; but my kindness shall not depart from thee;" why? for "the covenant of my peace shall not be removed." The mercy which you have, I give in a way of covenant, and the hills and mountains shall be removed rather than that kindness of mine shall depart from thee.

Obs. 5. Is it such a blessed thing for God to make a covenant with the beasts for us? what a mercy is it then for God to make a covenant with our souls! The covenant which God makes with his people is a covenant in Christ, and abounds in mercy. In Gen. xvii. you find that, in ten verses, God repeats his covenant which he made with Abraham thirteen times, to impress this, that that was the mercy indeed which must satisfy Abraham in all his troubles, sorrows, and afflictions: as if God should say, Be satisfied with this, Abraham, that I have entered into covenant with thee and thy seed, that I am your covenant God. And 2 Sam. xxiii. 5, David saith, "Although my house be not so with God, (as I desire, as I expect,) yet he hath made with me an everlasting covenant, ordered in all things, and sure: for this is all my salvation, and all my desire, although he make it not to grow." Take this scripture, Christians, take it, I say, and make use of it in these times of trouble; though things do not go as you desire, yet say as David did, "yet the Lord hath made a covenant with us, ordered in all things and sure, and this is all our salvation and all our desire."

Obs. 6. Is it a mercy for God to make a covenant with the beasts for his people? what a mercy is it then for him to make a covenant with his Son for his people! If we are to bless God, that he will make a covenant with brute beasts for our good, how should we extol and magnify his name, in that he has made a covenant with his own Son for our eternal good, and brought the second person in Trinity, to be the head of this covenant for us. The apostle speaks, Tit. i. 2, of "eternal life, which God, that cannot lie, promised before the world began." Why, what promise was there ever made before the world began? to whom was it given? who was there before the world began for God to make any promise unto? The Son of God alone, the second person in the Trinity; and there was a most blessed transaction between God the Father and God the Son, for our everlasting good, before the world began, and upon that depends all our salvation and all our hope. When we read the promises of the gospel which the Lord has given to us as branches of the covenant of grace, we are ready to think we are poor, weak creatures; we cannot keep covenant with God, we cannot perform its conditions: but, Christian, know this, thy peace, the salvation of thy soul, does not depend so much upon a covenant God has made with thee, as upon the covenant he has made with his Son; there is the firmness, the original, the foundation of all thy good, and all thy salvation; and though thou art a poor, weak creature, not keeping covenant with the Lord, yet the Son of God has perfectly performed all the conditions the Father required of him; by him the work has been perfected, and herein is our comfort. Raise up then your drooping hearts by this meditation.

II. The second part of this peace, is a promise of deliverance from the hostility of their adversaries: "I will break the bow and the sword and the battle out of the earth."

Obs. 1. Peace is a great blessing, it is a great mercy to have the bow and the sword broken. It is a part of the covenant that God makes with his people, to take away the instruments of hostility. Isa. ii. 4, God promises the beating of swords "into ploughshares, and spears into pruning-hooks." You find, on the contrary, when God denounces judgments on a people, Joel iii. 10, that he threatens to beat their ploughshares into swords, and their pruning-hooks into spears. It is a great deal better that the swords should be beaten into ploughshares, than that the ploughshares should be beaten into swords; that the spears should be made pruning-hooks, than that the pruning-hooks should be made spears.

Obs. 2. Peace is a most amiable thing, and lovely in all our eyes, every man desires it, and God promises it to his people in many places as a most special fruit of his love. Isa. xxxiii. 20, "Jerusalem shall be a quiet habitation, a tabernacle that shall not be taken down." And Numb. vi. 25, 26, "The Lord make his face shine upon thee, and be gracious unto thee: the Lord lift up his countenance upon thee, and give thee peace." The shining of God's face appears in the giving of peace to a nation: therefore, Jer. xvi. 5, where God threatens to take away peace, mark the expression, "I have taken away my peace from this people, saith the Lord, even loving-kindness and mercies." He does not say, I have taken away peace, but I have taken away "my peace;" and then, when "my peace" is taken away, I will take away "even loving-kindness and mercies." How easy were it to discourse largely in commendations of peace! God teaches us in these days to set a high price upon it. We have had peace a long time, and the Lord knows we have not prized the mercy; now we know what a sad thing it is to have war in our gates. And if peace be a fruit of God's covenant, we have cause to bewail the breach of it with us. Surely there is great displeasure of God out against us; this cup of blood which is prepared, poured forth, and in a great measure drunk, is a most dreadful one. Our brethren have drunk deep of it, and we have long feared it, having heard of rumours of wars; and when the cup was abroad, we prayed that, if it were possible, it might pass from us, and it did pass to our brethren in Ireland; but now is it come to us; the sword has had its circuit and is now in our midst, and that which aggravates the evil is, that our wars are not with foreign enemies, but civil. I have read in the Roman chronicles, that in a battle between Sylla and Marius, a soldier by accident killed one, not knowing who it was; but after he was slain, seeing it was his brother, presently, in anguish of spirit, he ran his sword into his own bowels. This we find occurring ordinarily among us, even brother to be against brother, yea, son against father. Certainly, therefore, it is time for us to fall on our knees, and to be humbled before the Lord for the breach of our peace.

Obs. 3. Peace is a sweet mercy, therefore it is a pity that it should be abused and not improved. Oh how have we abused our former peace! God gave us peace before; to what end? That we might be edified, and so built up in the fear of God and comfort of the Holy Ghost; as, Acts ix. 31, it is said, "The churches had rest, and were edified; walking in the fear of the Lord God, and in the comfort of the Holy Ghost." We have not made this use of the rest which God has been pleased to afford us, but have grown wanton with that precious jewel peace, and just it is with God to take it from us. And now we desire peace; but to what end? to have more freedom to satisfy our lusts and make provision for the flesh, is the very ground of most men's desire of peace; whereas if we understood the true worth of peace, we would think it were a very low end to desire it only for the attainment of this. Mark the promise in Ezek. xxxvii. 26, "I will make a covenant of peace with them; it shall be an everlasting covenant with them: and I will place them and multiply them, and will set my sanctuary in the midst of them for evermore." Yea, that is a comfortable peace, desirable indeed, when God by peace shall make way to set his sanctuary in our midst. If we truly desired peace upon these terms, we might soon expect an answer from the God of all peace.

Obs. 4. Peace is sweet, therefore not to be falsified. Psal. xxviii. 3, there are some that "speak peace to their neighbours, but mischief is in their hearts." It is pity that such a precious thing as peace should be made serviceable to men's lusts, that it should be pretended only to compass mischievous designs; peace is too good to serve men's base ends.

Obs. 5. Peace is a great blessing, therefore it is a pity not to endeavour by every means to attain it. Yea, cursed be that war which has not peace for its end. Sic querimus pacem, Even thus do we seek peace, ought to be as the emblem written on the sword of every soldier. It is a great deal better to have a war that aims at and effects peace, than to have a peace which aims at and creates war. It is true, war produces very dreadful effects; but war that shall bring forth peace, is better than peace that produces war; and the more we commend peace, the more do we still commend the war that tends to bring forth true peace, rather than to seek for a false peace, which will produce afterwards most dreadful war.

Obs. 6. Peace is a great blessing from God, but we must take heed we buy it not too dear: we may say of this as we are wont to say of gold, We may buy gold too dear.

You will say, How is it possible to buy peace at too dear a rate? If you give these three things for it.

First, If you sell truth for it; selling any truth for peace, is buying peace too dear, for the least truth of God is better than all the kingdoms of the earth. It first cost the blood of Christ, and since has been watered by the blood of thousands of martyrs.

Secondly, If you betray those who have been most active for the public good, only that, by way of compliance, you may provide for your own particular peace.

Thirdly, If, through desire of peace, you subject yourselves to tyranny or slavery. This is peace at too dear a rate, and the posterity that comes after, may curse that baseness of spirit and cowardice of their forefathers, who purchased peace at so dear a rate as to bring not only themselves, but their posterity, under the bondage of miserable tyranny and woful slavery. It is true, it is a great deal easier for a man who is striving and fighting with his enemy, to lie down, than to spend his strength in the combat: why will he weary himself? is it not better to lie down upon the soft grass, than to tire oneself in the conflict? but if by lying down he has his throat cut by his enemy, has he, think you, done wisely for himself? to spare exertion he has lost his life. If we should be so weary of present troubles as to lie down and be destroyed by our adversaries, shall the generation to come commend either our wisdom or valour? When a stream runs strong you cannot expect to stop it without some trouble; and the war now on foot amongst us, though it has much trouble in it, and many of our brethren suffer grievously, yet, let us consider it is a means to stop a stream of misery which was coming upon us, and that it is better to undergo some difficulties in damming it up, than tamely suffer it to flow in till all be past recovery: Our adversaries exclaim that we are enemies to peace, and they are all for peace, that is, they would have us to be so quiet as to let them do their pleasure; they would fain have us to love peace as to give up our strength to them, and to be irrecoverably under their power. Therefore let this generation be wise, for great things depend upon the present affairs of the kingdom, which concern not only their own outward comfort, but the glory of God, and the good of their posterity, to many succeeding generations.

Obs. 7. Peace is God's peculiar work. We may treat about peace, but until God is pleased to permit it, it will not ensue. If God comes in with exceptions, our treaties and our plots will never succeed. "I will break the bow," saith God. Jer. xlvii. 6, 7, "O thou sword of the Lord, how long will it be ere thou be quiet? put up thyself into thy scabbard, rest, and be still." The answer is, "How can it be quiet, seeing the Lord hath given it a charge against Ashkelon?" Till God give a commission to the sword, it cannot "rest, and be still." Job xxxiv. 29, "When he giveth quietness, who then can make trouble? and when he hideth his face, who then can behold him? whether it be done against a nation, or against a man only." If he cause trouble, who can make quietness? O no, none can! It is God that is to be regarded in the breaking of treaties, it is he who hardens the hearts of men that they shall not make peace till his time come. In Josh. xi. 19, 20, it is said, "There was not a city that made peace with the children of Israel, save the Hivites the inhabitants of Gibeon: all other they took in battle. For it was of the Lord to harden their hearts, that they should come against Israel in battle, that he might destroy them utterly." Of all the cities in Canaan which God's people "came against," though his hand was very remarkable in going along with them, working many miracles for them, yet the text observes that there was none that would make peace with them, save Gibeon only. Why? "For it was of the Lord to harden their hearts, to come against Israel in battle, that he might destroy them utterly." God intended to destroy them, and therefore hardened them that they should not make peace with his people. God is the Prince of peace, and therefore disposes of it as he will: many devices may be in the hearts of men, many plots and contrivances, but the counsel of the Lord shall stand. "The Lord sitteth upon the flood; yea, the Lord sitteth King for ever. The Lord will give strength unto his people; the Lord will bless his people with peace." Psal. xxix. 10, 11. That is not the peace for God to bless his people with, for which they must expose themselves to every danger, and betray his cause, God need give no strength for that; but his way is to "give strength unto his people," and then "to bless them with peace." We love peace, but let us take care to gain it through the strength of God: join these promises together, and plead them; and though we seem weak, yet "the Lord will give strength unto his people," and so "bless his people with peace." We must procure our peace by working in God's strength, and not think to obtain it by a sluggish compliance, and base, unworthy yielding to our adversaries. Jer. xiv. 19, "We looked for peace," it seems they were forming some treaties, "and there is no good; and for the time of healing, and behold trouble!" all their treaties came to nothing: but mark what follows, ver. 20, "We acknowledge, O Lord, our wickedness, and the iniquity of our fathers." O Lord, we dwell amongst people that are set on fire, and when we speak of peace, yea, when they speak of peace, they have mischief in their hearts: "O Lord, our wickedness, and the iniquity of our fathers," is great. O Lord, pardon our iniquity. To make our peace with God is the way to obtain peace.

Obs. 8. Thorough reformation is the way to procure peace. Mark the gradation, "They shall call me no more Baal;" then "will I break the bow;" when they shall break off thoroughly from their idolatry, then will I break the bow and the sword: so long as they worship false gods, war shall be in their gates; but when they shall thoroughly reform, and set up my worship in the way that I choose, then will I break the bow. So should we act if we had sufficient reliance on God. Our baseness is, that we will not trust God in this way of peace; but are ready to think that reformation will introduce disturbance, whereas reformation is the way to a thorough peace. Let our wisdom be pure, and then certainly it will be peaceable. In Isa. xxxiii. 20, Jerusalem is promised to be "a quiet habitation." What follows? ver. 22, "For the Lord is our judge, the Lord is our law-giver;" the more we regard him as our judge and law-giver, the more peace we shall have. Isa. ix. 7, "Of the increase of his government and peace there shall be no end." When the government of Christ is felt, then comes peace. Zech. vi. 13, "He shall sit and rule upon his throne; and be a priest upon his throne: and the counsel of peace shall be between them both;" that is, when Christ shall be advanced in his kingly as well as in his priestly office, then there shall be a counsel of peace. What is the reason that the counsel of peace has not prevailed to this day? We have cause to fear it has not been set between the kingly and priestly office of Christ to advance them. Isa. xxxii. 17, 18, "The work of righteousness shall be peace; and the effect of righteousness quietness and assurance for ever. And my people shall dwell in a peaceable habitation, and in sure dwellings, and in quiet resting-places." See how the Holy Ghost adds one word to another to show that true peace is in the ways of righteousness. When men strive for peace by unfair means, and seek to serve their own ends, disregarding the honour of God, it is just with him to dash all their counsels. "The way of peace they know not," saith God, "and there is no judgment in their goings: they have made them crooked paths: whosoever goeth therein shall not know peace," Isa. lix. 8. We know the path of the serpent is crooked, it winds up and down: so many of our counsellors of peace have gone, like the serpent, winding up and down in their carnal policies; have not studied reformation, but pursued crooked paths, and therefore have not effected true peace. But further, in Jer. xxxi. 22, 23, when the Lord was about to deliver his people from captivity, he asks, "How long wilt thou go about?" that is, you do not go steadily on, but compass about, and hope, by time-serving compliances, to escape the difficulties in your path, and by various means to avoid troubles. What follows? "The Lord bless thee, O habitation of justice, and mountain of holiness." Endeavour to make your way to be the "habitation of justice, and the mountain of holiness," and the work is done; execute justice upon delinquents, and set up the ordinances of God in the right way of worship, and this will lead to assured peace. Oh that the Lord would deliver our great counsellors from unworthy compliances.

III. The effects of this peace. "I will make them to lie down safely."

Obs. 1. God's peace alone brings safety. If we patch up a false peace on base and unworthy terms, we must not think "to lie down safely;" but when God promises peace as a fruit of the covenant, then follows, "I will make them to lie down safely." And I suppose none of you would like any other peace, but such as would enable you to lie down safely; and how is it possible, do you think, to do so, except the Lord destroy the evil beasts out of the land? "I will give peace in the land, and you shall lie down, and none shall make you afraid; and I will rid evil beasts out of the land," Lev. xxvi. 6. What is the end of our present war, but to "rid the evil beasts out of the land," that so we may "lie down safely?" Can you think to dwell safely among them, exasperated, as their fury is, to the highest degree? Certainly, if a false and patched-up peace were made, we should be in a condition full of hazard. Could those amongst us who have openly espoused the cause of God, and showed themselves most faithful, lie down safely, confiding in such a peace? If you have the hearts of true Englishmen, you would never desire any peace, but such as would enable you and your brethren, your ministers, and those worthies in parliament, and all that have stood forth in your behalf, "to lie down safely." Acts xxvii. 13, 14, we read of a "south wind that blew softly;" but the text adds, that not long after there arose "a tempestuous wind called Euroclydon." So if we have a false peace, it may blow as that south wind, "softly;" but certainly Euroclydon, that most terrible east wind, will succeed.

2 Chron. xx. 30. "The realm of Jehoshaphat was quiet: for his God gave him rest round about." Suppose we should be quiet, and our own base counsels and compliances should procure us rest, our peace would never be certain, but dismal things would follow; for a people dwell safely only when they have the peace of God together with the God of peace. "The peace of God which passeth all understanding, shall keep your hearts," Phil. iv. 7. Then follows, ver. 9, "The God of peace shall be with you." We would be loth to be without the God of peace, let us then refuse to have any but the peace of God. You all desire peace, and so the adversary pretends: take heed you be not deluded with vain words; that which your thoughts regard as the end, is with them a means to further their designs; and what good will such a peace do you? you will be no more secure than you are now, nay, your danger will be far greater.

Obs. 2. "To lie down safely," is God's own gift to his people. It is an additional blessing to having the sword and bow broken. We may be delivered from our enemies, but the Lord may affright our consciences with visions in the night, he may terrify us a thousand ways and take away our security; therefore, when he saith, "I will break the bow and the sword," he adds, "I will make thee to lie down safely." This is a precious mercy, it is recumbere faciam, in fiducia dormire faciam fiducialiter, I will make them to lie down in trust and confidence, that is, without any fear of evil befalling them before morning. We little think what a mercy it is, to have many nights lain down safely, and slept quietly, and risen up comfortably; and little do we think of praising God on this account. Many of our brethren in various countries would prize such a mercy now, they are afraid of every stir, and can scarce obtain a night's sleep unbroken by alarms. What would some of them give for one night's calm repose, that when they go to bed they might say, Well, I hope this night I shall enjoy quiet rest, tranquil and uninterrupted sleep! In many places they sleep in the day, and watch during the night. Here in the city, indeed, you can go to bed and sleep quietly, and rise quietly; but oh, think of those who are deprived of this mercy, and while you enjoy it, give God the glory. It is a great blessing for the Lord to calm our minds in these dangerous times, in these days of trembling, when every man's hands are upon his loins. Many who are free from their adversaries, yet, through the timorousness of their spirits, cannot enjoy one night's quiet, but agitate themselves with their own thoughts, Oh, what will become of us hereafter! It may be the enemies will come, and we shall lose our lives, and all will be torn from us; and this makes them that they cannot lie down safely, though danger be not yet near them: but when God is pleased so to stay the heart on him, that in the most troublesome times you can lie down securely, this is a choice mercy, a fruit of the covenant.

This mercy the Lord promises, Prov. iii. 23, "Then shalt thou walk in thy way safely, and thy foot shall not stumble." And mark the 24th verse, "When thou liest down thou shalt not be afraid: yea, thou shalt lie down, and thy sleep shall be sweet. Be not afraid of sudden fear: for the Lord shall be thy confidence, and shall keep thy foot from being taken." This made good to one in these days were a text worth gold indeed. So Psal. cvii. 3, "He giveth his beloved sleep;" others labour and toil, and "eat the bread of sorrow," and are mightily perplexed, but "He giveth his beloved sleep;" that is, takes away care and thought from his beloved, and gives them rest, so that they can repose quietly as in his bosom.

There is a false rest and security of the wicked when they make a covenant with death and with hell, as Isa. xxviii. 15, "Ye have said, We have made a covenant with death, and with hell are we at agreement; when the overflowing scourge shall pass through, it shall not come unto us: for we have made lies our refuge, and under falsehood have we hid ourselves." This text is as applicable to our adversaries as any one I know of in the Scriptures; they all promise to themselves security and safety, they make a covenant with hell and death; but how? they make lies their refuge, and under falsehood have they hidden themselves. Here is a security, and that by a covenant with hell and death; but this text points to "a lying down safely" by virtue of another covenant, even the covenant of God; therefore there follows, ver. 16, "Behold, I lay in Zion for a foundation a stone, a tried stone, a precious corner-stone, a sure foundation: he that believeth shall not make haste." This text wonderfully suits our times; we have a security on that ground, that though the overflowing scourge break down all, yet, saith God, "I lay in Zion for a foundation a stone," &c.; you may rest secure, though your enemies vaunt themselves, and boast in their own ways, that they "have made a covenant with death, and with hell are at agreement;" but, for you "I lay in Zion a corner-stone, a sure foundation: he that believeth shall not make haste." Although God come not with present deliverance, yet, believers, quiet yourselves, and "lie down safely," and do "not make haste." "A horse," saith the Scripture, Psal. xxxiii. 17, "is a vain thing for safety," vain is all creature-dependence; but, "behold, the eye of the Lord is upon them that fear him," ver. 18; they are more secure than if troops of horses lay round about to defend them. So ver. 20, "Our soul waiteth for the Lord; he is our help and our shield:" and Prov. xxi. 31, "The horse is prepared against the day of battle: but safety is of the Lord." Let us therefore cry with the psalmist, "Lord, lift thou up the light of thy countenance upon us; then will we lie down in peace, and sleep, for thou only makest us dwell in safety." Would you have quiet sleep in these troublesome times? make your peace with God. If there be peace within, then you may lie down safely notwithstanding all the rumours and tumults of war abroad; but if your heart be unreconciled, though you should live to see outward peace, your sins would pursue you, the terrors of the Almighty would be upon you.

But, Lord, what is all this except we may have communion with thyself, except we may have communion with Jesus Christ? is the voice of a gracious heart: therefore follows that blessed promise, as a further fruit of the covenant which God would make with his people, I will betroth thee unto myself; I will be yours, and there shall be a most blessed union and conjugal communion between us; you shall enjoy me in all the sweetness and love in which the wife enjoys the husband, though you have most wretchedly departed from me.

Ver. 19, 20. And I will betroth thee unto me for ever; yea, I will betroth thee unto me in righteousness, and in judgment, and in lovingkindness, and in mercies. I will even betroth thee unto me in faithfulness: and thou shalt know the Lord.

But how betroth? This phrase seems to be very strange; she had been the wife of God before, and departed from him; though God were reconciled to her, one would have thought it should rather have been, I will receive you again; no, but "I will betroth thee;" to note, that God would receive her with the same love as if she had been a pure virgin, and never upbraid her with her former departure from him: You have been an adulteress, bear your shame; but for my own name's sake I will be content to receive you again: nay, "I will betroth thee unto me," you shall be as a bride, and your sins shall be no more remembered, but passed over as if they had never been committed.

Obs. When God pardons sin he will remember it no more, the Lord will never charge upon sinners their former transgression. And if God will not remember the sins of his repenting people, to charge them upon them, we should not remember them, to upbraid them for them; whatever they have been before, if now converted, it is too much boldness in any of us to upbraid them for any of their former sins. I remember that Beza relates, that the papists reproached him much with the sins of his youth, the lascivious poems he made before his conversion; but he answered them thus, Hi homines invident mihi gratiam divinam, These men envy me the grace of God.

The repenting church might say, 1. How is it possible that so vile an adulteress, one who has so shamelessly forsaken the blessed God, her glorious Husband, and continued so long in filthy whoredoms, should yet expect to receive mercy? What! such a mercy as to be betrothed to God, to be taken by him as if she were a chaste spouse? Yes, saith God, I will do it; and therefore, to assure the humbled, repenting church that he will fulfil his promise, there is repeated three times emphatically, "I will betroth," "yea, I will betroth," "even I will betroth;" to show how much the heart of God is set upon it. As if God should have said, Though you may think such a thing can never be, and see nothing but cause for doubt and discouragement in yourselves, yet I will do it, yea, I will do it. This repetition marks also the excellency of the mercy; an excellent one indeed, that the Lord should take a people into so near a communion with himself; and from it flow other most glorious mercies.

But will this mercy hold? is it sure? I have already apostatized from the Lord, and have still an apostatizing heart, and am like to fall off from God again, and so my condition to be worse than ever. No, saith God, "I will betroth you unto myself for ever," my heart shall be for ever towards you, and your heart shall be for ever towards me, there shall never more be any breach of conjugal love and communion between us.

2. But the Lord is a righteous God, a God of infinite justice, and I have most fearfully transgressed against him: oh the hideous sins that I stand guilty of before him! how shall that infinite justice of God be satisfied? This is the care of a repenting heart, not only to obtain mercy for pardon, but satisfaction for the justice of God. Yes, saith God, I will have a way for that too; though you have been very sinful, yet when I receive you to mercy, I will do it so that I shall be righteous, as well as gracious, I will do it "in righteousness;" my taking you again to myself shall cast no stain on my righteousness. And I will put such a righteous frame into your hearts, that the nations shall not blaspheme my name, that I have betrothed such a one as you to myself.

3. But what reason can there possibly be that God should act thus? God has ten thousand ways to honour himself, though we perish for ever, and no people have ever provoked him as we have done, saith this repenting Israel. Well, saith God, though you know no reason why it should be done, yea, indeed, though there exist none at all in yourselves, yet what I shall do I will do in judgment. What I now promise you, I have exercised my wisdom about from all eternity; it is not only a work of my grace and mercy toward you, but of my wisdom also, which shall one day appear and be justified gloriously in this my work of taking you unto myself again. I know what I do in it, yea, and on your part, though hitherto you have seen no such excellency in my ways to cleave to them, but have departed from them and followed other lovers; yet when I come with mercy to you, I shall so convince you of the vanity of all other objects of desire, and of the fulness of good which there is in me to satisfy your souls for ever, that you shall see infinite reason to join yourselves unto me in an everlasting covenant. You thought the ways of false worship wore a more specious appearance, but when you shall be reconciled, you shall see there is infinite reason in the service your souls have heretofore rejected; you shall not only have your affections a little roused and warmed for the present, but the change which shall take place in you shall be in judgment, "I will betroth thee unto me in judgment;" in judgment on my part, I will have reason for what I do; and in judgment on your part, you shall see reason for what you do; so much reason for coming to me, that you shall wonder at the former folly of your hearts, when you departed from me, and sought your comforts elsewhere. The workings of my heart shall be in judgment toward you, and the workings of your hearts shall be in judgment toward me.

4. But suppose that my heart does indeed come in to God, yet I shall remain a poor, sinful, weak creature, there will hang upon me many infirmities that will be grievous to the Spirit of the holy and just God. Well, saith God, "I will betroth thee unto me in loving-kindness;" I will deal gently and favourably with you; I will not take advantage of your failings and infirmities; I will remember you are but flesh, and have a tender regard to you.

5. But, perhaps, there will not only be some ordinary infirmities which may grieve, but I may even fall into offences that will provoke the Spirit of God bitterly against me, and so my condition become worse than before. No, saith God, "I will betroth thee unto me in mercies" as well as "in loving-kindness;" my bowels of mercy shall yearn towards you, not only to pass over the lesser infirmities, but to swallow up the greater transgressions. And accordingly, I will work in you gracious dispositions of loving-kindness toward me, and create a most sweet and ingenuous spirit, and cause your services to flow from principles of love; that perverse, distrustful spirit of yours toward me shall be changed into a sweet, gentle, dependent frame. And when I am once reconciled to you, you shall be reconciled one to another; and the hearts that were so rugged, so harsh, and unkind towards one another before, shall be joined together in the bonds of love. And as my bowels yearn towards you, so your bowels shall yearn towards me; as it shall pity my soul to see you in misery, so it shall pity your souls to see me dishonoured; and you shall likewise be compassionate one toward another, pitying, helping, and relieving one another in the greatest straits.

6. But there are many glorious promises which we find God made to his people, and great things to be done for them; shall ever those promises be made good to us? If we may have mercy, though in never so low a condition; if God's loving-kindness be manifested to us in a way of reconciliation, though we be but as hired servants; if we may be spouses, though kept hardly, it will be well with us. But, saith God, there are glorious promises made to the church, and I will fulfil them all to you; though you have departed from me and provoked me against you, yet, upon your returning, you shall become interested in them. I will fulfil them all to you, for "I will betroth you unto me in faithfulness," as well as "in mercy." Look, whatever I have said concerning my church, is yours to be made good to the uttermost; and there is nothing that concerns me as a loving husband to do, but you shall assuredly receive; and as for you, however your hearts have been hitherto unfaithful toward me in departing from me, yet now you shall have put into you a faithful spirit; your hearts shall confide in me, that I will deal faithfully with you, and my heart shall confide in you, that you will deal faithfully with me; so that whatever befalls you, you shall still be faithful to me, and to each other. "I will betroth you unto me in faithfulness."

7. And whereas it is but little that you yet have known of me, and this ignorance has been the cause of all your unworthy wanderings; therefore "you shall know the Lord" know him in a manner far different to your former experience; I will show my glory to you, I will open my very heart to you, the secret of the Lord shall be with you, though your conceptions be but weak and mean, yet you shall all be taught of God; perhaps you may be ignorant of other things, but "you shall know the Lord."

8. And as for outward blessings, you shall receive them also in abundance; all the creatures shall be moved towards you to comfort and to succour you: "And it shall come to pass in that day, I will hear, saith the Lord, I will hear the heavens, and they shall hear the earth; and the earth shall hear the corn, and the wine, and the oil; and they shall hear Jezreel." There shall be in them a readiness to help, an eagerness to relieve you; yea a combination of them all, established by me for the good of Jezreel.

9. But yet we are a people scattered about the world, and most of us consumed: But, "I will sow her unto me in the earth;" you were scattered in judgment, but now it is turned to a mercy; your scattering is as seed, whereby you shall fructify and increase abundantly, and so be a blessing to the whole earth.

10. But we have been under the curse of God a great while, and have seemed to be rejected: But, saith God, "I will have mercy upon her that had not obtained mercy."

11. Lastly, we are a proverb in all the world, a by-word, a scorn, and a reproach amongst all people; God, say they, has rejected us, and so they trample upon us. No, saith God, I will not only betroth you to myself, but make it manifest to all the world that you are my people; "I will say to them which were not my people, Thou art my people;" though you be a people scorned and vilified in the world, yet I will acknowledge you openly; your low and miserable condition shall not hinder me from saying, "Thou art my people;" and as for you, whatever you shall meet with in my ways, whatever you suffer for my worship, though it be scorned and despised of men, yet you shall confess it before the world, and say, "Thou art my God."

Thus you have a short paraphrase upon this and the succeeding gracious expressions of God to his reconciled people, a slight view of the mercy of the Lord to his saints.

But when was all this fulfilled? you will say; or to what times does this prophecy refer?

This prophecy is partly fulfilled when a soul is brought to embrace the gospel; but the full accomplishment shall be at the calling in of the Jews; thou not only the spiritual estate of particular converted souls shall be thus happy, but the whole visible church shall be betrothed unto the Lord for ever. We cannot say so of any visible church at present, none of them but may fall off; but when God shall bring in the Jews, they shall never lose the visibility of their church communion. Rev. xxi. 2, 3, seems to have reference to this prophecy: "And I John saw the holy city, new Jerusalem, coming down from God out of heaven, prepared as a bride adorned for her husband. And I heard a great voice out of heaven, saying, Behold, the tabernacle of God is with men, and he will dwell with them, and they shall be his people, and God himself shall be with them, and be their God." This contains almost the same words which we have here in this prophecy to be fulfilled in that glorious church estate, when God calls home to himself his own people. Mark there, "God himself shall be with them;" God is always with his people; but "God himself," that is, a more especial, and immediate, and full presence of God, shall be with them.

But the words must yet be more fully examined.

"I will betroth thee." The Scripture often mentions espousals and marriage, to express the great mystery of the grace of God to his people. The Holy Ghost seems to delight much in this allegory: there is none more frequent in Scripture, and it sheds very great honour on the marriage state; and the lives of those united in marriage ought to resemble the blessedness, as far as possible, of the condition of a people reconciled to God, for in all comparisons a similitude should exist. Married people should so live, that all who behold the sweetness, the happiness of their lives, may be reminded thereby of the sweetness and happiness which is in the church's communion with Jesus Christ. I appeal to you, are your lives thus?

Now in a married condition there are these four things most remarkable.

First, There is the nearest possible union. "They two shall be one flesh." Consider this power of God in an ordinance; two that perhaps not a month before were mutually strangers, never saw each other's faces, and knew not that there were such in the world, when they enter into this, though but a civil ordinance, these two shall be nearer one to another than the child that came out of the mother's womb. Whence arises this, but merely from the power of an ordinance? One would think that the affection of a mother to the fruit of her own body should be more than it were possible for her to have to a stranger she had never seen before in her life; but it is not so; when a woman comes under the obligation of this ordinance, she should entertain more affection to one who was ere while a stranger, than to her own child. Such is the power of God's ordinance, though but a civil one. Now then, what efficacy must Divine ordinances have! Certainly, most powerful on the soul, when they are administered in the way of God's appointment. So here, "I will betroth thee:" as if God should say, Thou wast not long since as a stranger to me, as one cast off, yea, as an enemy; but now all the creatures in heaven and in earth, the very angels themselves, shall not be more dear to me, nor in closer communion, than you. This is true of a wretched, sinful creature, who has not only been as a stranger, but as an enemy to God; on conversion and union with Christ he is admitted into a nearer connexion and more intimate communion with God, in some respects, than the very angels in heaven, for they are never said to be the spouse of the Son of God, as the saints are. Such is the mighty power and love of God in uniting his saints to his Son.

Secondly, In nothing in the world is there so full a communication of one creature to another as in marriage: so in our spiritual marriage with Christ there is a most intimate communion. God has two ways of communicating himself: one is infinite, that is, to his Son in that inconceivable mystery of Divine generation; the other modes are of a finite kind, and of these, the greatest is his communication of himself to his saints in Christ. God does not so communicate himself to the creatures generally indeed: in comparison he communicates little or nothing of himself to the whole frame of heaven and earth. As far as communion is wanting in marriage, so far is the blessing of it from being complete. The communion of God to his church is a full communion; his wisdom, power, riches, are made over to the saints; the merits, the righteousness of Christ, are all theirs.

This communication is mutual: one converted to God, lets out his heart into God in a fuller manner than any creature can do to another. Suppose all the beauty and excellency in the world were combined together and presented to thee, to be an object of thy delight, yet it were not possible that thou shouldst communicate thyself so fully to it, as thy soul will to God upon thy conversion. The soul yields itself to God, as into an infinite ocean of goodness, so that it would retain nothing of its own; but, as a drop of water in a vessel of wine, assume the flavour and colour of that with which it is united. And hereby you may know whether your conversion be real or not, if as that which is Christ's comes to be thine, so that which is thine comes again to be Christ's. "My Beloved is mine, and I am his," saith the church. Hence it is that the honour which Christ the husband has, is reflected on the saints; they shine with the brightness of his beams. "Since thou wast precious in my sight, thou hast been honourable," Isa. xliii. 4. Among the Romans, when the newly married wife was brought home, she was wont to say, Where you are Caius, I am Caia. How mean soever the woman may be before, yet, when married, she partakes of the honour of her husband. So the saints, whatever they were before, are now looked upon as honourable in the eyes of the triune God; and in those of the angels and of the rest of the saints, who are able to discern their excellency. And on the other side, (for it is ever mutual,) as the church derives honour from the lustre of the beams of Christ's glory, so also is the church a glory unto Christ. As the Scripture saith, "The wife is the glory of the man;" so, in truth, the church is the glory of Christ.

How is that? you will say. True, Christ is the glory of the church; but that the church, which is a company of poor creatures, should be the glory of Christ, how can that be?

Yes, it is so, Christ accounts himself glorified before the Father in having such a spouse. Thus, 2 Cor. viii. 23, "Whether any do inquire of Titus, he is my partner and fellow helper: or our brethren be inquired of, they are the messengers of the churches, and the glory of Christ." Titus and the brethren are there called "the glory of Christ." And Eph. i. 23, the church is said to be "the fulness of him that filleth all in all." However low we should be in our own eyes, yet this is certain, that it is the glory of Christ before the Father and the blessed angels that he has such a spouse. Hence, Rev. xxi. 9, one of them saith, "Come hither, and I will show thee the bride, the Lamb's wife:" the very angels rejoice in this; Come, behold the bride, the Lamb's wife! Certainly they would not, in such triumph, have called all to behold the bride, had it not been for the glory of Christ in her. Psal. xlv. 14, the church is described as brought in to the King all glorious and beautiful, "in raiment of needlework." Christ rejoices, and his very heart even springs forth, to present his church to his Father; Father, he saith, here behold my spouse that I have married unto myself. It is true, a child may sometimes marry against his father's consent, one whom he may be ashamed to bring to his father's house, because she will disgrace it; but how mean and sinful soever we are in ourselves, when once we are betrothed to Christ, he will not think it any dishonour to acknowledge us even before his Father, but account it his glory, before him and the blessed angels, that he has such a spouse.

But further, this communion makes the afflictions between Christ and his church mutual. There is a communion in things evil as well as good. The very sins of the church are to be charged on Christ. As a woman who had contracted debts before marriage, and so was liable to arrest, when married is no more troubled with the officers of justice, but all claims are to be made on the husband: so, though we be in debt, owing a debt of punishment because we have not paid the debt of obedience, and whilst out of Christ may fear every moment to have some sergeant of the Lord to arrest us, and to hale us to prison, there to lie until we have paid the uttermost farthing; but when the soul is married to Christ, all debts, all sins, are all transferred upon and charged to him; and if the law now require satisfaction, if justice pleads against you, you may send it to your husband Christ, and he will joyfully answer all demands. An earthly husband perhaps may take it ill, and think he has brought himself to misery, when arrested for his wife's debts, and his heart may be alienated from her; but Christ will never love you the worse for all the debts charged against him on your account, but will willingly discharge them, and rejoice in it before his Father. And if any affliction befall you, Christ sympathizes with you: "In all their affliction he was afflicted," Isa. lxiii. 9. So, on the other side, all the afflictions of Christ are the afflictions of the church. Doth Christ suffer? you are affected as if you suffered yourselves. Christ feels for your sufferings as if they were his own, and you sympathize in those of Christ in return.

Thirdly, In a married condition there is a mutual, entire love. That is,

1. Loving the person more than the benefits received from him. True conjugal love is fixed on the persons, rather than on the estates, or any thing they enjoy by them. So, on Christ's part, his love is fixed on the persons of the saints, more than on their actions. It is true, all the gracious actions you do are lovely before Christ, for they are the fruits of his Spirit; but Christ's greatest love is toward your persons. So your chiefest love, if it be a true conjugal affection, settles on the person of Christ rather than on any thing derived from him. Notwithstanding those riches of pardon of sin and precious promises which thou enjoyest through him, his person is that which ravishes thy soul.

2. True love can be satisfied with nothing else but love. Love vilifies every thing tendered, except it comes as a fruit of love; and where love exists, even a little cup of cold water is more highly prized than a kingdom without it: the giving the body to be burned, without love, is nothing. I will give you two scriptures, one wherein the saints prize God's love, the other wherein God prizes the love of the saints. Psal. xxxvi. 7, "How excellent is thy loving-kindness, O God!" Psal. xci. 14, "Because he hath set his love upon me, therefore I will deliver him: I will set him on high, because he hath known my name."

3. This entire love is a love in all conditions. Christ loves his church in their afflictions as entirely as after their deliverances. "He found him in a desert land, and in the waste howling wilderness; he led him about, he instructed him, he kept him as the apple of his eye," Deut. xxxii. 10. Mark, they were in the wilderness, "in the waste howling wilderness," yet even there they were dear to Christ, and were "kept as the apple of his eye." The church in return regards Christ in his afflictions as lovely still as ever: "A bundle of myrrh is my well-beloved unto me, he shall lie all night betwixt my breasts," Cant. i. 13. Myrrh is a bitter thing, yet the church professes that Christ, though bitter in his afflictions, should still be most dear to her. Herodotus and Pliny report of Artemesia, queen of Halicarnassus, that after her husband's death, she took his ashes and drank them in wine, from excess of love to him though dead. The church loves a crucified Christ, as well as a glorified Christ. A most remarkable example of the love of a spouse to her husband we have in our English History. King Edward the First, having been wounded by a poisoned dagger, his wife Eleanor, to show the entire love she bore him, and because she thought if the venom was suffered to remain there would be no possibility of a cure, herself sucked the poisoned wound, and so ventured the loss of her own life to preserve her husband's. Here was love in a spouse to her husband. The church bears a like love to Christ. If he be wounded with the poisonous tongues of ungodly men in reproaches and blasphemies, and persecuted in the world, the truly gracious are willing to suck in that very poison to themselves, so they may take it from him. Let the reproaches of Christ fall upon me; oh let me suffer rather than Christ. It was Ambrose's wish, Oh that God would turn all the adversaries of the church upon me, that they might direct against me all their weapons, and satisfy their thirst with my blood: and such is the disposition of a true spouse of Christ.

4. In it there is unspeakable delight. Communion has delight; the greatest communion, the greatest delight: the greatest delight that God has is to communicate himself, first to his Son, and then to his saints. If God delights in communicating out of his fulness to the saints, one would think the saints must needs delight in flowing out into God. God delights in imparting mercy to his saints, because he was well pleased with the death of his own Son as a means conducting thereto. One would think that the death of Christ should be most abhorrent to the heart of God, yet the Scripture saith God was well pleased with it, Isa. liii. 10. Why so? Because he saw this opened the way for him to communicate himself in the fulness of his grace to his church, and, therefore, though it cost him so dear as the death of his own Son, yet was he well pleased. And as for Christ, he takes delight in communicating himself to his people; after his suffering, he was satisfied, saith the prophet, when he saw of the travail of his soul. As if Christ had said, Oh let me have a church to communicate myself to, and though I see it has cost me my blood, and all these fearful sufferings, yet am I satisfied, and think all well bestowed, so I may have a people to partake of my love and mercy for ever. "Thou hast ravished my heart, my sister, my spouse, thou hast ravished my heart with one of thine eyes," Cant. iv. 9. Then for the saints, the delight they have in intimate communion with Christ is unutterable. "Stay me with flagons, comfort me with apples, for I am sick of love," saith the church, Cant. ii. 5. "My soul shall be satisfied as with marrow and fatness; and my mouth shall praise thee with joyful lips: when I remember thee upon my bed, and meditate on thee in the night watches," Psal. lxxiii. 5, 6.

Observe, The more fully you lay out yourselves for Christ, the more comfort you shall have in your lives. Here is the great difference between the hypocrites and the sincere. It is impossible that a hypocrite can have the same comfort in his life as a gracious heart has, and for this reason, because a hypocrite makes reservations, and gives not himself wholly to Christ, but always keeps somewhat back, and thereby loses his comfort; but a gracious heart, fully giving itself up to Christ, derives comfort and sweetness in the service of its Master, far above all the joy of the hypocrite. Perhaps you think that the only comfort you can have is by receiving some benefit, some mercy from God: you are much mistaken; the letting your hearts out to God is a greater comfort than any you can derive from his gifts.

And now, how happy are they to whom Christ is thus espoused! How comfortably may you live, being affianced to Christ! and how comfortably may you die! It is our work to seek to draw souls to Christ, to allure them to be in love with him. In Gen. xxiv. 35, you see the course which Abraham's servant took to excite the love of Rebekah and her friends to his master's son; he begins with telling them, that he is the servant of Abraham, and that the Lord had blessed his master greatly, so that he was become great; and that the Lord had given him flocks, and herds, and silver, and gold; and that he had an only son who was to inherit all. This is the work of ministers, to tell people what riches of mercy there are in God, and that all the treasures of those infinite riches of the infinite God are in Jesus Christ, and to be communicated through him. Yea, it is not only the work of ministers, but it should be the work of every gracious heart, thus to seek to draw souls to Christ; as Rev. xxii. 17, not only the angels say, Come, but "the bride saith, Come. And let him that heareth say, Come. And let him that is athirst come. And whosoever will, let him take the water of life freely."

Were I not thus expounding, we surely could not leave such a point as this; but for the present I shall only add, Know that it is not want of any worth in you than can hinder communion with Jesus Christ; and do not reason thus, I am a poor, wretched, sinful creature, will ever Christ be married to me? It is not thy sinfulness, nor thy base condition, that can hinder it: Christ never joins himself to any because they are worthy, but that they may be worthy; and he makes them so by the very act of union. The woman is not married to the king because she is a queen, but the king marries her to make her a queen.

And further, remember, if your hearts be not taken with Christ, to join with him in this holy marriage, if he be not your husband to enjoy conjugal communion with you, he will be your judge to condemn you.

But besides this betrothing between Christ and a soul, there is a betrothing between Christ and a visible church, especially the church of the Jews when called in.

God shall appear in his glory when this marriage shall take place between Christ and the Jewish church. If a wealthy man has a son to marry, and intend to solemnize the nuptials according to his means, he arrays himself in his best attire: so, at the calling of the Jews, the King of heaven will put on the robes of his majesty, and appear in a more glorious manner to the world than he ever did since the creation. Yea, and as the bridegroom on the marriage day decks himself sumptuously, tuously, so Jesus Christ will then appear; whether personally or otherwise, we say not, but certainly he will then appear resplendent with glory. So Tit. ii. 13, We look "for the glorious appearance of the great God, and our Saviour Jesus Christ." And 2 Thess. i. 10, Christ shall come so as "to be admired in all them that believe;" the church likewise shall then be clothed with beauty, "arrayed in fine linen, clean and white: for the fine linen is the righteousness of saints," Rev. xix. 8; and in that day the great doctrine of justification by Christ shall be made out full and clear. Yea, and as in a great marriage the servants in the house receive new clothes; so at that day the creatures, her servants, shall put on new raiment, and the face of the world shall be changed. Then will follow the marriage supper, and happy shall those be that shall then be found worthy to enter the bridal chamber. Let us now love Christ, cleave to him, and suffer for him; we may, perhaps, be of those, who, beside their eternal enjoyment of Christ in heaven, may enjoy him in this marriage upon the earth. But we must pass on, as we spake something of this in the end of the first chapter.

"And I will betroth thee unto me for ever." "For ever;" this addition to the merey makes it glorious, this "for ever" renders a misery, though never so slight, an infinite misery; and a merey, an infinite merey. This betrothing for ever shall be fulfilled in a visible church communion to the Jews, and in the spiritual communion of Christ with the soul at present. Of the visible form first.

"I will make thee an eternal excellency, a joy of many generations," Isa. lx. 15. I think this not only regards the spiritual happiness of the saints, but that God has a time to make his visible church to be "an eternal excellency, and a joy of many generations;" an excellency that shall never have an end. And this their perpetual condition, their enduring happiness, shall arise from these three grounds.

First, from the precious foundation that shall be laid of that church when it shall appear: Isa. liv. 8, "With everlasting kindness will I have merey on thee. saith the Lord;" but mark the ground, ver. 11, "Behold, I will lay thy stones with fair colours, and lay thy foundations with sapphires;" all the rubbish shall be removed, it shall not be raised on such a foundation. God will lay "the foundations of that church with sapphires;" and then with everlasting merey he will embrace it.

Secondly, That church shall be in a peaceable condition, no rent, no division there, therefore in a perpetual condition: "A tabernacle that shall not be taken down; not one of the stakes thereof shall ever be removed," Isa. xxxiii. 20. Why? The very words before show the reason; "Jerusalem shall be a quiet habitation."

Thirdly, This church shall look wholly at Christ as their Judge, their Lawgiver, and their King: "The Lord is our Judge, the Lord is our Lawgiver, the Lord is our King" Isa. xxxiii. 22. Churches are ready to change while they mix other things with the worship of Christ, and the laws of men with his laws; but when they can look to him, I mean in that which is spiritual, as their Lawgiver, as their Judge, and as their King; then their happiness shall be perpetual even in this world, the Lord Christ will betroth them unto him for ever.

Though I verily think the Holy Ghost refers chiefly to this, yet we are further to understand this "betrothing for ever," of the spiritual communion the soul has with Christ. When Christ betroths himself to a soul, it is "for ever:" the conjugal love of Christ with a gracious soul shall never be broken. At first, man's condition was such, that man laid hold upon God, and let go his hold; but now God lays hold upon man, and he will never let go his. The bond of union in a believer runs through Jesus Christ, is fastened upon God, and his Spirit holds the other end of it, so that it can never be broken. This union is in the Father, who has laid "a sure foundation," 2 Tim. ii. 19; Rom. ix. 11. In the Son, who loves his to the end, John xiii. 1. In the Spirit, who abides in the elect for ever, John xiv. 16, 17. "The mountains shall depart, and the hills be removed; but my kindness shall not depart from thee, neither shall the covenant of my peace be removed, saith the Lord that hath merey on thee," Isa. liv. 10. My loving-kindness shall be more stable with thee, and endure longer, than the mountains themselves. It is as sure as the ordinances of heaven. "Thus saith the Lord, which giveth the sun for a light by day, and the ordinances of the moon and of the stars for a light by night: If those ordinances depart from before me, saith the Lord, then the seed of Israel also shall cease from being a nation before me for ever," Jer. xxxi. 35, 36. And chap. xxxiii. 20, 21, "Thus saith the Lord; If ye can break my covenant of the day, and my covenant of the night, and that there should not be day and night in their season; then may also my covenant be broken with David my servant." You have these three expressions of the abiding of God's love with his people: 1. The continuance of the mountains. 2. The continuance of the ordinances of heaven and earth. 3. God's covenant with night and day. Here is the ground of consolation to the saints, they shall be "kept by the power of God," 1 Pet. i. 5. As if God should say, The special power I mean to exert in this world, shall be to uphold the spirits of my saints, and to bring them to salvation; and certainly, the special work in which God has in this world to exercise his power, is to keep Christ and the saints together. Though it be through God's power that the heavens and the earth are sustained, yet if God must withdraw his power from one, he would rather withdraw it from upholding heaven and earth, than from sustaining one gracious soul that has union with his Son.

The union between Christ and his people is too near a union ever to be broken. Luther has a remarkable expression about this: "As it is impossible for the leaven in the dough to be separated from it, after it is once mixed, for it turns the nature of the dough into its own: so it is impossible, saith he, for the saints ever to be separated from Christ, for Christ is in the saints as the leaven in the dough, so incorporated, that Christ and they are, as it were, one lump. Christ, who came to save that which was lost, will never lose that which he has saved. Heb. vii. 16, it is said that Christ was made a priest "not after the law of a carnal commandment;" that is, he was not made a priest as the priests in the law, after a ceremonial way, "but after the power of an indissoluble life:" <sup>κατὰ θείου</sup> <sup>(κατὰ ἀσφαλίαν τῆς</sup> caelesti virtute, by a celestial power, as <sup>θεοῦ)</sup> Calvin on the place saith. The argument why Christ's life is indissoluble, rather than the priests in the law, is because they were made "after the law of a carnal commandment," not by a celestial power. So those who profess godliness, in a ceremonial way, "according to a carnal commandment," may fail, vanish, and come to nothing in their way of worship, as many have done; but such as are professors of religion by the virtue of God's Spirit in them, have the power of a life indissoluble.

There are two soul-staying and soul-satisfying grounds to assure of Christ's betrothing himself for ever.

First, when a soul is taken in to Christ, it receives not only pardon for all the sins previously committed, but there is forgiveness in store for all future transgressions against Christ, quia est in eis Christus fermentum, ita incorporatus: ut unum sit corpus, una massa. Luth.

* Sicut impossibile est fermentum mixtum a pasta separari, quia immutaverit pastae naturam, ita impossibile Christianum sions. "There is forgiveness with thee," Psal. cxxx. 4. There lie pardons with God beforehand for all that is to come, as well as for that which is past. "There is therefore now no condemnation to them which are in Christ Jesus," Rom. viii. 1; that is, there is no instant of time after they are once in Christ Jesus, wherein it can be said that they are under the sentence of condemnation. Now, were it not that there was a pardon laid in beforehand for all future sins, they might upon commission of some new transgression be brought under condemnation; for if the least sin remain unpardoned, there is condemnation; but this cannot be. I do not say the sin is pardoned before it is committed, for it were harsh and improper to say so; for when we speak of pardoning sin, we speak of a work applied to the creature, not of that which is in God: a pardon is laid up to be applied by God whenever the sin is committed, so that there shall no time elapse wherein the sinner is unpardoned, and so under condemnation. Then surely he can never fall from Christ; for what endangers his safety, but the commission of sin? Christ has as well merited at the hand of God pardon for any future sin, as he has pardon for sin past. Do not say that this opens a gap to licentiousness, and that then we need not care; no, the grace of Christ has no such malignity in it; in saying thus, thou speakest against thine own life.

The second soul-staying argument for perseverance is, that it is a spiritual mercy purchased by Christ, as well as any other grace. "Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who hath blessed us with all spiritual blessings in heavenly places in Christ," Eph. i. 3. Now you will say, faith, and humility, and joy, are all blessings, and we have them in Christ; is not perseverance then a blessing, a spiritual blessing also? Christ has as truly and as really laid down his life to purchase thy perseverance, as to purchase thy pardon, or any other thing he has procured for thee. That which Christ has shed his blood to purchase, surely must be obtained, he cannot have died in vain. Have you any thing by virtue of that purchase? Thou mayest be as sure of perseverance, for Christ has laid down his life to purchase that also.

Christian, then, satisfy thy soul, God gives thee comforts in this world, but he gives them not for ever; but when he betroths thee unto his Son, he betroths thee for ever. Perhaps the Lord, in mercy, has made thy life here in this thy pilgrimage very comfortable, by giving thee a meet yoke-fellow; in this thy betrothing thou art happy, but this happiness continues not; thou canst look on thy companion as a mercy of God, making thy pilgrimage sweet, yet there must be a dissolution between thee and her; but thy union with thy husband Christ is for ever, it shall never be dissolved. Perhaps some of you have lost comfortable yoke-fellows, death has come and snapped asunder the union between you, and you complain, Never woman lost such a husband, never husband such a wife; if you be godly, you have a Husband that you shall never lose, one who will fill up all relations, who saith, "Thy Maker is thine husband," Isa. liv. 5.

And further, this is mutual; "I will betroth thee unto me for ever;" and give thee a heart that thou shalt cleave unto me for ever. This will afford us another useful meditation, viz. When the Lord chooses any soul to himself, as he sets his own heart for ever on that soul, so he imparts to it a principle of grace to cleave unto him; and to yield itself to him in an everlasting covenant. Psal. cxix. 112, "I have inclined mine heart to perform thy statutes alway;" is not that enough? no, he must have another word to express the "alway," "even unto the end." David's heart was much taken with the statutes of God; O Lord, through thy mercy my heart is inclined to keep thy statutes, yea, and it is so always, and it shall be "even unto the end." This is a kind of pleonasm, or rather the expression of the fulness of his heart, in his resolutions never to depart from God.

But what are those riches which Christ bestows on his people whom he betroths to himself? The bracelets and ornaments he puts on their necks and on their hands are these:

"I will betroth thee unto me in righteousness, and in judgment, and in loving-kindness, and in mercies. I will even betroth thee unto me in faithfulness: and thou shalt know the Lord."

There is much of the gospel in this.

"In righteousness." This, according to some, is understood as opposed to dissimulation, and that by this he assures his people that they shall find his dealings with them altogether just and equal; and so I expect from you, and will effect it in you, that in your dealings towards me, you shall be the same, there shall be nothing feigned betwixt us, all shall be plain, right, and just. There is often much dissimulation in marriages, great promises, and overtures of what one should enjoy in the other, and when they meet not with what they expect, it causes great dissension between the parties, and makes their lives very uncomfortable. But now, saith God, there shall be no dissimulation between us, I will deal with you in the plainness of my heart, and you shall do so likewise. So the word "righteousness" is taken in Scripture. Isa. xlvi. 1, "They make mention of the God of Israel, but not in truth, nor in righteousness;" the one explains the other: Though you have departed from me, I will receive you again in the very integrity of my soul; do not fear, do not suspect me, do not think though I make a show of love and of great favour to you, yet that I intend to cast you off at last: these are the jealous thoughts of many troubled consciences. Indeed, I hear of mercy, and God is working as if he intended mercy to me; but I am afraid he will finally reject me. No, saith God, do not fear; this mercy I offer in the very sincerity of my heart, therefore let not such suspicious thoughts arise between us; you may be sure that what is fit and right for you to have from such a husband as I am, you shall certainly receive. This I conceive a part, though not all, of the meaning of the Holy Ghost here, "I will betroth thee unto me in righteousness;" that love I profess to you, I do it not to mock you, saith God, but I do it in truth. From whence very useful observations may be drawn.

Obs. 1. Guilty hearts are full of suspicions of God's real meaning in all his expressions of love and mercy. They judge God by themselves. As they first slight sin, and see not such a dreadful evil in it, they think God sees it not: so after they have sinned, they measure God's mercy by their own, and think thus, If any had offended us as we have offended God, though we might say we would be reconciled to him, yet we could not bring our hearts wholly to it, some grudge would remain: they therefore think the like of God, and suspect that he is not really sincere in his expressions of love and mercy to them. But beware of this, do not judge of God by yourselves; though you have a base and cruel heart, and cannot be reconciled to those who provoke you, it is not therefore so with God. There are these two evils in sin: first, in the nature of it, there is a departing from God; secondly, it causes jealousies and suspicions of God, and so hinders the soul from returning to him again.

Obs. 2. God is very careful to prevent all these suspicions in the hearts of his people. He desires you to entertain good thoughts of him, and we plead with you, and so often open the riches of God's grace, for this very end, and to remove your jealousies and suspicions of him, as if there were no real intention in all the proffers of mercy he makes you; do not think that all those riches of God's grace are mere words, they are certain intentions of God's heart towards you. "I will betroth thee unto me in righteousness."

And for your part I will give you a heart, and you shall return to me in sincerity and truth. There was a time, indeed, when God complained of his people, that they sought him and returned unto him, "nevertheless they did flatter him with their mouth, and they lied unto him with their tongues." Psal. lxxviii. 34—36; there was no reality in their returning to him, nor in their professions of obedience: But, saith God, there shall come a time that you shall have righteous hearts, and that which you promise to me you shall truly perform; you shall no longer make a show of love, but shall return to me with all your hearts "in righteousness."

God has much difficulty at first to make us believe that he is sincere in his proffers of mercy; and long is it before our hearts can be prevailed on to turn to him in good earnest.

Obs. 3. One reason why God betroths "for ever," is, because he does it in the sincerity of his heart; and this is also a good reason why the saints continue for ever, because what they do to God is in the sincerity of their hearts. Those who return to God hypocritically will fall off, but they that return in uprightness will continue constant. Prov. viii. 18, it is said of wisdom, that with her "are durable riches and righteousness;" they are conjoined: where there is true righteousness in the heart, there are durable riches.

But there is yet another thing in this betrothing in righteousness, and that I think of even more importance than the former. God will be reconciled to his church so as yet to manifest himself to be a righteous God. In the works of the riches of his grace he will manifest the glory of his justice too: I will do it "in righteousness:" though indeed the Lord intends to glorify rich grace, yet so as to declare his righteousness to men and angels, that in this very work of his he may be acknowledged by them, to all eternity, to be a righteous God. That place, Rom. iii. 25, 26, confirms this; "Whom God hath set forth to be a propitiation through faith in his blood." How? "To declare his righteousness for the remission of sins." Mark it! it is not that he had set forth Christ to be a propitiation, to declare his mercy in the forgiveness of sins; you will say, What is there in the forgiveness of sins, but only the mercy of God? Yes, there is somewhat else, there is righteousness too; and the Lord declares his righteousness in the forgiveness of sins, and therefore it is that he has set forth Christ to be a propitiation. If the Lord had said but thus, Well, you are great and grievous sinners, I will be content freely to forgive you all your transgressions; this would have declared God's mercy, but not his righteousness: but now, when the Lord has set forth Christ as a propitiation, and forgives sins through the blood of his Son, in this God declares as much righteousness as grace. This text Luther had great difficulty in understanding, and prayed much before he could discern the right meaning of it. Yea, it is repeated again, "To declare, I say, at this time his righteousness: that he might be just, and the justifier of him which believeth in Jesus;" not that he might be merciful in justifying him that believeth in Jesus, but that he might be just.

And this is the great mystery of the gospel, this it is which the angels desire to look into; and the saints and angels shall admire and bless God to all eternity, for reconciling the riches of mercy and infinite justice; this it was that engaged the infinite wisdom of God from all eternity how to find a way to save sinners, and to be infinitely righteous notwithstanding. If all the angels in heaven, and all the men in the world, had been asked this question, How shall sin be pardoned, the sinner reconciled unto God, and yet God glorify his justice? they could never have answered it; but God in his infinite wisdom has found out a way. This cost God dear, even the life of his own Son, and that was a sign that God's heart was much in it; and indeed we are not Christians until in some measure we see, and have our souls taken with, the glory of God in this mystery. We must look at righteousness in our reconciliation, as well as at loving-kindness and mercy.

When God is reconciled to a sinner, not only his mercy is glorified, but, in the plan for a sinner's salvation, the glory of his justice is magnified as much, yea, more than if the sinner were eternally damned in hell.

How is that? you will say.

I prove this three ways.

First, When God appointed his Son as a surety, and charged the debt of his justice upon him, in that God would not spare this Son of his the least degree of punishment, would not remit any thing, he hereby showed a stronger and more intense love to justice, than if he had damned ten thousand thousand creatures. Suppose a malefactor comes before a judge, and the judge refuses to spare him without satisfaction to the law, this shows that the judge loves justice; but if the judge's own son be a delinquent, and it is made manifest before all that the judge will not spare him, unless the penalty of the law is paid to the uttermost, you will say the judge honours justice more in this than in condemning many other malefactors. So when the Lord shall cast many thousands into hell, there to be tormented for ever, this will show that God loves justice; but when his own Son takes our sins upon him, but by imputation, and God will not spare him, (for such are the very words of Scripture, "He that spared not his own Son," Rom. viii. 32.) this declares God's love to righteousness more than if all the world had been damned.

Secondly, Suppose the reconciled sinner had been damned, then the justice of God had been but in satisfying, and never had been fully satisfied; but in the way that God has found out to save a sinner, his justice is not only satisfying, but it is fully satisfied at once and for ever. Now it is a greater honour to justice to be fully satisfied than to be in satisfying. As for instance, suppose a creditor has one who owes him five thousand pounds, and the man is poor, and the utmost he can pay is but sixpence or twelvecpence a week; suppose the creditor should put him in jail until he had paid all, this man would be receiving something, but would never be paid as long as the debtor lived; but if another rich man should come and lay down five thousand pounds at once, the man is satisfied forthwith. Such is the difference between God's satisfying his justice on sinners and upon Jesus Christ: God comes on the sinner and requires the debt of punishment, because he did not pay the debt of obedience; casts him into prison; the uttermost he can pay is but little, and therefore he must be still paying and paying eternally, which is the very ground of their eternal punishment in hell, because they cannot pay enough in any finite time: now Christ interposes and fully pays the debt, so that justice saith it has enough, it is satisfied, and the greater glory accrues to the justice of God.

Thirdly, If the sinner had been sent down to hell, God had had the glory of his justice passively upon him, he should be for ever under its power and stroke; but in the mean time the sinner would have hated God for his justice, and abhorred justice itself: but when justice is honoured actively, the sinner falls down and acknowledges himself guilty, puts himself under the stroke, and accepts of the punishment of his iniquity: now God is delighted more abundantly in this active way of glorifying his justice than if the sinner had been satisfying it eternally in hell.

And now devils and all wicked men must needs have their mouths stopped for ever, they cannot cry out against God because he will marry himself to such sinners; This is mercy, but where is his righteousness? where is the glory of his justice? Here is an answer to them all, Though the Lord sets his love upon vile sinners, yet he does it in righteousness. And this is a great encouragement to come in and believe, for if the sinner be terrified with the apprehension of his sins, and sees that by them the wrath of God is incensed, and that infinite justice demands satisfaction; this bids the sinner know likewise that God has a way to satisfy infinite justice, and yet to save his soul; he will marry him unto himself, and yet he will do it in righteousness.

And this is a great help to a sinner against all failings afterwards, a mighty establishment against a thousand objections the sinner may make against himself. Thus we must seek to God when we seek to be received again when we have departed from him; whatever God does for us, he must do it in the way of righteousness as well as in the way of mercy. Take this with you, sinners, if ever you have a pardon sealed to you, it must be sealed in the court of justice as well as in the court of mercy; therefore, ye need not appeal from the court of justice to the mercy-seat, for in the mystery of God's reconciling himself to a sinner, there may be as much comfort in standing before the bar of justice as at the mercy-seat; that is, by standing there, in and through Christ, for he has made justice propitious to us, and now it pleads to mercy for us.

And indeed this is the very work of faith, thus to go to God, when by faith the sinner shall present to God the Father the righteousness of Jesus Christ for an atonement and satisfaction for sins: this brings the comfort of justification. When you come to God in any other way than this, it is but in a natural, and not in a true evangelical way; a man by nature may know thus much, that when he has sinned he must seek unto God for mercy, to pardon his sin, or else become miserable; but to seek to God for pardon with a price in our hand, to tender the merits of Christ as a satisfaction to Divine justice, here is the mystery of faith; faith is not only to rely upon God's mercy for pardon, but speaks thus, I see riches of grace in Christ, that he, as my surety, has made an atonement, has laid down a price, and now I tender up this to God the Father, and I thus believe my soul shall be accepted through him.

What a mighty engagement is this for us to be righteous before God! the Lord betroths us unto himself in righteousness, and we should give up ourselves to him in righteousness also. O my brethren, take this away with you, whatever you forget: if the Lord has thus engaged himself to us in a way of righteousness, and if it has cost him so dear to show himself righteous unto us; what an infinite engagement lies upon us to be righteous before him, to glorify God's righteousness in our conversation! I will do it in righteousness, and you shall have such a righteous heart, as you shall never be a dishonour to me before the people; neither devils nor wicked men shall ever be able to upbraid me, that I set my love upon such creatures as you, because, whatever you were, you shall be now righteous. When we profess ourselves to be the spouse of Christ, and be unrighteous in our conversation, we upbraid Jesus Christ, and are a dishonour to him before men and angels; What you, the spouse of Christ! where is this ornament, this bracelet of righteousness, then? Whomsoever Christ marries, he puts on them this jewel of righteousness. He blasphemes religion which he seems to honour, says Cyprian, who makes not good in his life what he professes.

Blasphemiam ingenit religioni quam cedit, qui quod con-fitebitur, non ante
omnes impleverit,
Cyprianus de sing. Cler.

"And in judgment." Some interpreters understand this and righteousness to be the same, according to Psal. xxxiii. 6, "He loveth righteousness and judgment," and so pass it over; but we must not do so, for we shall find much of God's mind in this.

Others take judgment, as frequently it is understood in Scripture, for sanctification; so they would make this promise correspond with that of Christ, John xvi. 7, 8, I will send the Comforter, and he shall "convince the world of sin, of righteousness, and of judgment." Righteousness there is of the same sense as here: judgment there, by many interpreters, is understood of sanctification; because the prince of this world is judged, the power of Satan is already broken, he is already cast out of your hearts. And they think to strengthen that by Matt. xii. 20, He will not quench the smoking flax, nor break the bruised reed, "till he send forth judgment unto victory;" that is, until he perfect the work of sanctification, that it shall overcome corruption. The text in Matthew is quoted from Isa. xlii. 3, but there we have the words somewhat different, "He shall bring forth judgment unto truth." Now, if that should be the meaning, that by judgment is meant sanctification, then we may learn an excellent note from the comparing these two texts together; that it is all one to bring judgment, sanctification, unto truth, and to bring it unto victory, when it is in truth it will certainly be in victory. But we shall a little more examine this interpretation of judgment presently; for my part, I do not think that that is meant either in this text, or in any of the texts named.

I find others understand "in judgment," to be God's judgment against the adversaries of the church. "I will betroth thee unto me in righteousness;" I will deal with you in a way of righteousness; and I will deal with your adversaries in a way of judgment, you shall have judgment against them. So Luther interprets it, and he says, that judgment here is the second pearl of the husband's ring* which he gives to his spouse, God promises to exercise judgment and vengeance against the adversaries of the church, and so applies it to his times in Germany: "For these many years, wicked magistrates have oppressed the church, and profane doctors have corrupted its doctrine, but Germany has seen God judging his adversaries."† If we understand it in this sense, Isa. liv. 5 confirms it, where God tells his church, that he that is her Maker is her husband, even the Lord of hosts, and her Redeemer, the God of the whole earth; the word there is Vindex, the Avenger; he that will avenge thee of thine enemies, is the God of the whole earth, is thy husband. This might afford a sweet meditation, that the Lord will defend his church from the rage of adversaries, as the husband will defend his spouse because he is betrothed to her. The Lord certainly will take a valuable consideration at the hands of the adversaries who wrong his church. But this I think not to be the scope of the phrase.

"In judgment;" that is, say others, though things be now out of order, and seem to be in confusion, yet the time is coming when all things shall be ordered in the church according to equity and right.

The two preceding interpretations are applicable to the former texts: "He will convince the world of judgment," that is, the world shall be convinced that Christ has all judgment committed to him, and he shows it in this, that the prince of this world is judged: so that passage, "I will cause judgment to return unto victory;" that is, though the adversaries of the church be many, yet he will cause them all to be vanquished, judgment shall conquer them all; though there be much opposition and confusion in the church, yet I will order tus ecclesia opprimatur et doctrina per prophanos doctores depravetur, sed videt Germania Deum judicantem. Luther in loc.

* Secunda gemma maritalis annuli. Luther.

† Jam multos annos hoc agit Sathan ut per impios magistraand compose all things in the church according to equity.

In Isa. iv. 4, the Lord saith, he will purge his church "by the spirit of judgment, and by the spirit of burning." I know some interpret it as if it were meant of the spirit of sanctification, that is as fire to consume lusts; but rather as there were those who oppressed the church by false judgment, the Lord would cleanse her from wrong and oppression, by giving a spirit of judgment to its officers, and by consuming its adversaries.

But I think we have not yet the full scope of this place, and would rather settle on this, as principally intended, though the other may be in some degree included: viz. "I will betroth thee unto me in judgment;" that is, there shall be good reason for what I do; that which I will now do in betrothing thee to myself, shall not be done rashly, nor unadvisedly, but with understanding and good deliberation: I know what I do in it, and I know what glory I shall have by it; I will do it "in judgment." So I find the word judgment taken in Scripture, Jer. iv. 2, "Thou shalt swear, The Lord liveth, in truth, in judgment, and in righteousness." "In judgment," that is, when you swear, know it is worshipping God, and you must do it in judgment: you must not only swear "in truth," that is, swear to that which is true; and "in righteousness," that is, not to the wrong or prejudice of your neighbour, for you may sin in swearing, (though you swear in truth,) if you have an intent to wrong any; but, thirdly, you must swear "in judgment" too; you must understand what you do, that is, when you take an oath, you must know that it is not as the oath ex officio was, to swear to answer to every thing that shall be asked you; but you must understand before-hand what you are to swear to, and so swear "in judgment." So saith God, "I will betroth thee unto me in judgment," that is, I have considered what I am to do in this thing, and I do it from judgment. And for your parts, when you shall close with me, in this blessed conjugal union and communion, you shall do it from judgment also. "I will betroth you in judgment," so as to make it appear before the world that I had good reason so to do; and you shall likewise so close with me, that you shall be able to justify it before men and angels, that you had good reason for what you did, that it was done "in judgment."

In nothing is there more need of judgment than in marriages and contracts; therefore the heathens were wont to set Mercury, their god of wisdom, by Venus, their goddess of marriage, to note that there was need of judgment there; yet there is nothing, usually, in the world undertaken with more rashness and inconsiderateness, which is the reason of so much subsequent unhappiness. But though there be many contracts between men and women that are not out of judgment, yet, saith God, "I will betroth you in judgment." Christ's union with his church is an union out of judgment. Christ considers of our meanness before he marries us; knows fully what we are, our sinfulness, our wretchedness; knows we are in debt, and whatever else we can think might be a hinderance, he knows as perfectly as ever he shall know it, and yet he goes on. Yea, the marriage between Christ and his church is that which has been planning in heaven from all eternity; it is not a sudden, rash engagement, but arranged in the "counsel of peace," between the Father and the Son, from everlasting. God the Father gives consent to this union; the Holy Ghost is sent to draw the hearts of his people to come in and consent to it likewise, as a union out of the deepest judgment.

Though it be true that God can see no reason in us why we should be thus united to his Son, yet he can see abundance of reason in himself; therefore the conversion and salvation of a soul is not only out of God's mercy, but it is also from God's wisdom. Hence the Scripture attributes our predestination and our calling to his wisdom, as well as to the freeness of his grace; as Eph. i. 11, "Being predestinated according to the purpose of him who worketh all things after the counsel of his will." Mark, it is not only because God will, "I will have mercy because I will have mercy;" I will choose such, and I will refuse such; I will do it: no, but it is "after the counsel of his will." Our wills are often bent on doing a thing when there is no reason for it, there is no counsel of our will; but God, even in this thing that we can see no reason for at all, works according to "the counsel of his will:" and, Eph. iii. 10, the apostle, having said before, ver. 8, that he was "to preach the unsearchable riches of Christ;" adds, he was to preach to the intent that now might be "known by the church the manifold wisdom of God." In all things in the gospel there is much wisdom. Vocation is one of the mysteries of the gospel; and, 1 Cor. i. 24, the gospel is said to be "the power of God, and the wisdom of God;" the apostle there instances what one would think has as little reason in it as any thing in the gospel, that is, the leaving of the rich, wise, and noble, the great ones of the world, and calling the poor; but herein is not only the power, but the wisdom of God; God does even this in judgment. And although we can now understand little or nothing of any reason that there can be of God's choosing us to himself; yet this will be made known at the great day of judgment. It will be a great part of the glory of that day for the Lord to make known "the counsel of his will;" we now know his will, but we shall then know "the counsel" of it, and praise him to all eternity for it: this shall be the glory of the saints, that they shall see into the counsel of God's will in choosing and calling them, and suffering others to perish.

God's betrothing himself thus to his people in judgment, is an especial reason of the perpetuity of this betrothing. "I will betroth thee unto me for ever." Why? First, It is "in righteousness," therefore it will continue. Secondly, It is "in judgment," therefore also it will continue. Things done rashly seldom hold, and though eager for them at present, we quickly undo them afterwards; but that which is done in judgment abides: the calling of a sinner, and uniting him to Christ, is done in judgment, therefore it will hold; that is the ground of his perseverance. If a man, before marriage, understands thoroughly all the faults his wife has, or ever shall have, and knows perfectly her estate, and all the encumbrances he shall have with her, yet loves her out of judgment, surely this love will continue. It is so between Christ and his church; Christ, before he betroths his church, perfectly knows all the faults the church has, or shall have, all the sins that she shall ever commit, and all the encumbrances and dishonour he shall have; yet out of judgment he betroths her to himself, and therefore surely this will remain stedfast. Comfort yourselves with this, Christians, though there may be many failings after your coming to Christ, Christ knew them all before you were united to him, yet out of judgment he betrothed you to himself.

There must also be judgment on our parts: I will put into you a judicious heart, to choose me out of judgment. The saints who choose Christ know what they do. "They shall be all taught of God; every one therefore that hath heard, and learned of the Father, cometh unto me." None cometh unto me, but such as are taught of God; they who hear and learn of the Father, come to me out of judgment. "I know whom I have believed," saith Paul; and so may every Christian say. They do not embrace Christ and his ways because they are new things, as many do, and so vanish to nothing; though it is true there is always some new excellency in Christ, Christus est novitas semper renovanda. something revealed more than we knew before, and delightful he is in that respect, if we love novelty. It is not a sufficient plea against any truth, that it is only now revealed, and was not known before. 2 Pet. i. 12, "Be established in the present truth." Though truths be from the beginning, yet they are present truths in regard of manifestation; but the saints must not therefore receive them, merely because they are new to them, neither must any reject them, because they are now revealed, whereas before they lay hid; but all must proceed with judgment, and when any truth is presented, reject it not because you have not heard of it before, neither adopt it for that reason; but try it, and when you are convinced, then from judgment embrace it. Neither must the saints follow God, or any way of truth, merely from the example of others, but from their own judgments. Perhaps you see some of whom you have a reverent esteem, and that justly, doing thus and thus; I confess, that is enough to put you on examining, to make you bethink yourselves, Surely there is something in it, or else it is not probable they would do it; but that must not be the only reason; but if on examination you find it to be good, then embrace it out of judgment; never rest till you come to that which the men of Samaria said to the woman, "Now we believe" that this is the Messiah, "not because of thy saying," not because you told us so, "for we have heard him ourselves, and know that this is indeed the Christ, the Saviour of the world." At first, they came to Christ upon her relation, but they did not believe in Christ until they had seen and heard him for themselves. You may come to examine the ways, the truths of God upon the relation and example of others, but you must not engage your hearts in them till you see the reality of them yourselves.

You must embrace Christ and his ways out of judgment, not out of sudden flashes of affection, which pass away as quickly as they come. You have a remarkable example of this, Luke xiv. 15: "Blessed is he that shall eat bread in the kingdom of God," they exclaim; this is blessed doctrine indeed. But by that which follows, we may infer that they were such as presently went to their farms and to their oxen, and prized them before Christ, and refused to come to the supper. Sudden flashes there were in those that shouted Hosanna, Hosanna, but presently their cry was, "Crucify him, crucify him." In Josh. xxiv. 19, the people seemed to be moved with sudden affections, they would "serve the Lord," yea, that they would; but they considered not what they said; "Ye cannot serve the Lord," said Joshua to them. So Deut. v. 27, "All that the Lord our God shall speak unto thee, we will hear it, and do it;" but presently saith God, Oh that there were such a heart in this people to do it! The truth is, they know not what they say, they have sudden affections, but they will quickly vanish. We must choose Christ out of judgment.

You must not choose him from mistake; we must understand who he is, we must sit down and count with ourselves beforehand what we are like to suffer in his ways. Compare Cant. v. 9, with the beginning of chap. vi.: "What is thy beloved," say they, "more than another beloved?" Let us know what thy beloved is. Then the church begins commending her beloved; and in the beginning of chap. vi., "Whither is thy beloved gone? whither is thy beloved turned aside? that we may seek him with thee;" that he may be our beloved too.

Nor out of by-ends, but from a right knowledge of the excellences of Christ, having our judgments overcome by them. We must not choose any truth or ways of God, because the times favour them: we have now a number of parliament converts, who were formerly prelatial and ceremonial, they see how the times sway; but this is not from judgment. Every Christian should be a judicious Christian: such adorn religion, and are an honour to Christ. As the more deliberation and judgment there are in sin, the worse it is; so the more deliberation and judgment there are in godliness, the better it is. When a soul chooses Christ and his ways on this ground, I see a beauty in the Lord Jesus that I never saw before, I see him to be the character and the engraved form of the image of the Father; in him dwell all treasures, the very Godhead dwells in him bodily; he is the most precious among ten thousand, and the ways of God are holy and righteous! here is the rule of eternal life, here lies the happiness of the rational creature, these are the ways that my soul closes with, and shall cleave to for ever, whatever I suffer in them, for I see the excellency, the beauty, the equity, and the glory of them, and that the Lord is worthy of all honour from all his creatures: this is a choice which will hold. The world thinks the saints are fools; why? because they cannot see any reason for what they do; they cannot see ground enough in reason for such activity, strictness, and zeal; they think they do incallescere in re frigida, that they are very hot about a very poor, sorry, cold business, and therefore they count their ways folly; so any man, when he sees another do a thing that he understands not the reason of, will either suspect his own judgment, or think the man foolish; now wicked men are too proud to suspect their own judgments, to think their own reason folly, therefore they count the ways of God foolishness. They look on his ways from a distance, and therefore think there is no reason for them.

It is reported of the famous Marcus Galeasius, that he was converted by a sermon of Peter Martyr's, in which he expressed the excellencies of God's ways, and the mistakes of the world, by this similitude; The men of the world (said he) mistake God's ways: as, if a man were to see a company of musicians playing and dancing according to the exactest rules of art; regarding them from a distance, he sees them skipping and leaping up and down as a company of mad men, and wonders what they mean; but when he comes nearer, and hears the melodious sound, and observes how all their motions are directed agreeably to rules of art, then he begins to change his thoughts: so the men of the world look on the ways of God and on the saints from a distance, and think their motions and ways are madness; but when they come nearer, and observe the exactness of the rule they walk by, and the wisdom of God that appears in them, they change their judgments, and begin to think, surely there is something in them more than they conceived. This similitude God blessed, so that it was the means of converting that nobleman, and made him leave all his possessions in Italy, and come to Geneva, where he became a pattern of self-denial, such as scarce any age has ever produced. When you come near God's ways, and see them indeed, you will discern infinite reason in them, and charge yourselves with infinite folly that you should have had such low thoughts of them heretofore.

This is the reason why the saints hold on in their ways. This judgment is as the ballast of the ship. Many hurry on in a profession of religion, and the truth is, they know not what they do nor what they profess; if there be any new opinion, I mean, not only in regard of new manifestation, but in regard of the thing itself, presently they follow it, that they may be counted something, and seem to go beyond other men: they are as a ship that moves at a mighty rate, all the sails are up, and winds blow fairly, but there is no ballast; so it is tossed up and down, but never comes to the end of the voyage. When the seed was sown in the stony ground, it sprung up presently; but because there wanted moisture at the root, it "withered away," Luke viii. 6. This judgment is as moisture at the root. We read, that notwithstanding the stony ground "received the word with joy," yet when "persecution arose because of the word, by and by they were offended;" they were mightily taken with the ways of God, with the great things of the gospel, at first; but not having judgment, as soon as suffering came, "by and by they were offended." If times should change again, and the adversary should prevail, (which God forbid,) we shall soon have experience enough of abundance of professors, who, having chosen the ways of God not out of judgment, will by and by be offended.

"I will betroth thee unto me in loving-kindness." Though Christ takes us to himself, and will not cast us off, yet he may see such failings and frailties in us as may render us so grievous and burdensome to his spirit, that we shall enjoy but little sweetness in our communion together, through the wretchedness of our hearts. No, saith Christ, "I will betroth you unto me in loving-kindness;" my heart and ways toward you shall be full of gentleness and sweetness, and I will put such a frame likewise into your hearts, both toward me and toward one another, that you shall have hearts full of sweetness and gentleness.

The Scripture speaks much of the loving-kindness of God to his people in Christ. Eph. ii. 7, "The exceeding riches of his grace in his kindness toward us through Christ Jesus." Tit. iii. 4, "After that the kindness and love of God our Saviour toward man appeared." You have these epithets given unto God's kindness: "Great kindness," Neh. ix. 17. "Marvellous kindness," Psal. xxxi. 21. "Merciful kindness," Psal. cxix. 76. "Everlasting kindness," Isa. liv. 8. "Excellent loving-kindness," Psal. xxxvi. 7. "Multitude of loving-kindnesses," Isa. lxiii. 7. Thus full is the Scripture of the loving-kindness of God toward us in Christ.

To open it a little. The kindness of God to us in Christ consists,

First, In the freeness of God's goodness. Kindness in a friend is seen much in this, when he does a thing freely, with good nature; when he does a kindness so as not to burden it, nor upbraid his friend with what he has done; nor in a mercenary spirit, as if he expected great matters in lieu and recompence, but leaves it to his friend to answer him in a way of kindness again as he thinks fit. Thus, in all God's dealings with us, he looks not for much at our hands before, but what he does is out of his free grace, and not burdened with conditions; he "giveth liberally and upbraideth not," James i. 5. But does not God burden his kindness, requiring that we should give up ourselves to him, and serve him, and suffer for him in return? I answer, God requires nothing in lieu of all his kindness to us; but it is an additional kindness in God to enable us to do, and a further kindness in him to accept at our hands when we have done it, and therefore is his kindness free. The heathens were wont to paint their goddesses of kindness, naked; for this reason, because all actions of kindness should be free, unlogged and unburdened. "The blessing of the Lord, it maketh rich, and he addeth no sorrow with it," Prov. x. 22. The kindnesses of this world are ordinarily clogged, scarce worth the having; the kindness of God not so, it is free.

Secondly, Kindness consists much in our tenderness over those to whom we show kindness. The kindness of God in Christ is much in compassionating our weakness, and dealing with us in all his ways accordingly. Isa. lvii. 16, "I will not contend for ever, neither will I be always wroth;" why? "for the spirit should fail before me, and the souls which I have made." He considers our weakness: Psal. ciii. 14, "For he knoweth our frame; he remembereth that we are dust." Isa. xl. 11, Christ "shall gather the lambs with his arm, and carry them in his bosom, and gently lead those that are with young." Isa. lxiii. 9, "In his clemency" (so the word is) "he redeemed them; and he bare them, and carried them all the days of old." Kindness makes one long-suffering, he bare them always and continually. It is kindness for the man to consider all the weaknesses of the wife, and to deal with her in a loving way accordingly, intending her good: this is the kindness of Christ to his church.

Thirdly, Kindness in passing by all infirmities, not taking advantages of his people because of them. Christ notices all the good that is in his people, though it be never so little; but that which is a weakness he will pass by. The Lord is not "strict to mark iniquity," but the Lord is strict to mark what we do well; if there be never so little good in an action that has a hundred weaknesses in it, Christ will mark the good and pass by all the weaknesses. Sarah is commended by Peter for calling her husband lord: in that speech of hers there was nothing but sin, saying that expression, and yet the Holy Ghost takes notice of that one word and passes over all the rest. If thou aimest at serving Christ, and canst appeal to him that thy heart is toward him to honour him as he requires, I say, though there be a hundred weaknesses in an action, if there be but one thing good, all thy weaknesses are passed by, and that one good thing is taken notice of.

Fourthly, Kindness is in a loving, sweet, amiable carriage toward one another in our converse one with another. Oh the sweet, amiable carriage that Christ exhibits toward his people! and that Christ expects likewise from them to him again. In the Canticles you find what sweet, amiable expressions there are between Christ and his church; what rebounding, as it were, there is of love and kindness one to another; "Thy love is better than wine," saith the church to Christ; and, "Thy love is better than wine," saith Christ to his church. In I Cor. xiii. 4, love is said to be "kind," ἡσυχίαται. no moroseness, but all sweetness in it, and such should exist between husband and wife.

Fifthly, Kindness consists in easiness to be entreated; "peaceable, gentle, and easy to be entreated," Jam. iii. 17. Thus, in Christ, he is easy to be entreated by his church, and the church should easily be entreated, and indeed is: when the hearts of the saints are right, there is an ingenuousness in them, and they are soon moved to any service Christ requires.

Lastly, Kindness is compassionate, sensible of all sufferings; so Christ and his saints mutually are.

Such loving-kindness as this should be in all marriage communion; where this does exist there is a sweet conjugal communion indeed, and so far as this is wanting, so far the blessing of a marriage estate is from being complete. One reason, amongst others, why God makes so much use of this allegory of marriage, to express so great a mystery of godliness as the union between Christ and his church, is, to teach those who are married, to live so together as to show forth all that excellency of communion which exists between Christ and his saints. Now I put it to you who are married, is there such loving-kindness in you as may shadow forth the loving-kindness which exists between Christ and his spouse? So far as you come short of this, so far there is an evil. When you go home take this lesson with you, labour to show such mutual loving-kindness as may express the loving-kindness of Christ to your souls. There are many frailties in each, but not so many as there are in you in reference to Christ; he bears with more infirmities in you than you can bear with in your wife, and yet is not morose, nor a bitter husband to you. I have read of Monicha, Austin's mother, that she had a husband of a very cross and perverse disposition; and that a heathen, who lived near her, came to her once, and asked, How is it that you and your husband live so well together? We know your husband is of a very cross and perverse disposition, yet we see nothing but a great deal of sweetness and love between you; it is not so with us, we cannot do so for our lives. Monicha gave her this answer, It may be, when your husband is untoward and perverse, you are perverse and answer unkindly in return; but the Christian religion teaches me, when my husband comes home and is in a passion, to be as loving, and dutiful, and amiable to him as I can, and so I have won his heart. It were a happy thing if all women would take this home with them, and learn of Monicha, Austin's mother. And likewise, on the other hand, the man should so act in reference to his wife: this loving-kindness exists between Christ and his spouse, let it then appear between husband and wife, who profess an interest in Christ.

And this loving-kindness of Christ, oh how should it draw our hearts to him! What more powerful means to attract than loving-kindness? Mark that passage in proof of its power, 2 Chron. x. 7, "If thou be kind to this people, they will be thy servants for ever," say those ancient counsellors of Rehoboam, who counselled him wisely. If this be the way to draw the heart, surely Christ must needs have ours; he is not "a bloody husband," but a kind one to us; let us then be his "servants for ever." It were a good thing for all governors to consider that it is kindness that wins the hearts of people; and as they rule not over beasts, but men, if they would rule with comfort and safety to themselves, they should temper their authority with kindness. Hence, Cant. iii. 10, it is said that the chariot of Solomon was "paved with love for the daughters of Jerusalem;" thus expressing Solomon's gentleness toward his people. When the mother and wife of Alexander Severus would incite him to severity, and objected to him his mildness and readiness to yield to his subjects, saying, You have made your power more contemptible by your kindness and compliant spirit; his answer was, At securiorem, But more secure and lasting. Certainly, if magistrates would follow the advice of the ancient counsellors, to be kind to the people, they would be their servants for ever, and their own peace and safety be better secured.

Christ expects loving-kindness from you to himself, and loving-kindness likewise one to another.

First, Christ expects you should be full of loving-kindness to him. O blessed Redeemer, what is it that we should do, that we should be kind to thee? The very phrase seems to be too low for Christ, that he should look for our kindness. Yes, Christ looks for it, and prizes it dearly, nothing in the world is valued by him more than it; as a fond husband prizes nothing more than kindness in his wife. But how kind to Christ?

1. When you cleave to him when he stands most in need of you. 2 Sam. xvi. 17, Absalom saith to Hushai, "Is this thy kindness to thy friend?" that is, Is thy friend in danger, and requiring thy present aid, and dost thou now forsake him? thou shouldst now be with him in the time of his need, and thus prove thy kindness. So, I say, there are times in which Christ stands in more need of us than at other, in suffering times, in times wherein his cause has many enemies, and our help is called for; if we should forsake him then, may not Christ, nay, may not the holy angels and saints say, "Is this your kindness to your friend?" To come to Christ when you have need of him is not so much kindness, but to come to him when he has need of you, this is kindness.

2. It is kindness when we serve Christ in the midst of difficulties. You have this strongly marked in Jer. ii. 2, "I remember the kindness of thy youth, the love of thine espousals, when thou wentest after me in the wilderness." To be willing to follow Christ in the wilderness, that is kindness. Christ does not account it kindness for us to serve him when we may prosper in his service; when it may suit our own ends, when we may keep our shops, our lands and possessions, when no difficulty at all presents itself, what great kindness is this? But when, from love to the ordinances and the truths of Christ, you are willing to follow him even in the wilderness, this is kindness, and Christ will account it such: however, some have thought that they have shown great kindness to Christ, because they have staid and borne the brunt; but how have they borne it? by yielding to superstitious vanities, and being ceremonial and prelatical. It will be found that those who have been willing to follow Christ in the wilderness, from love to him, his truth and ordinances, that Christ will remember such service as kindness.

3. It is a kindness for young people to dedicate their prime to Christ. By way of allusion, at least, we may make use of that Scripture, "I remember the kindness of thy youth:" when thy bones are full of marrow, and the world seeks to draw thy heart after its vanities, when thou mayst have thy delights and pleasures in the flesh to the full; if then thou art willing to deny all, and to give up thyself to Christ, this is loving-kindness. One that is old may possibly reach heaven on repentance; but what kindness is it for him, who has nigh worn out all his days and strength in the ways of sin, and the delights of the flesh, when he is leaving the world, and can have no more pleasure in his sins, to come to Christ for mercy; what kindness is here? here is self-love indeed, but little kindness.

Secondly, Loving-kindness one to another. "I will betroth you unto me in loving-kindness:" I will put such a spirit into you of loving-kindness unto your brethren, as I have towards you. The word חַסְדִּים here rendered loving-kindness, often in Scripture is used for saints. Those who are called godly, and saints, in the English Bible, in the Hebrew are called kind ones: thus, Psal. iv. 3, "Know ye that the Lord hath set apart לִי הַסְדִּים him that is godly," or, the kind one, "for himself;" the Lord hath set apart for himself those that are kind, those who are of sweet, gentle dispositions. And Psal. xvi. 10, Not "suffer thine Holy One to see corruption," the Hebrew is, לֹא יִסְדִּיךָ thy kind one. So Psal. cxlix. 1, "Sing his praise in the congregation of the saints," הַסְדִּים of the kind ones; and the same word again, ver. 5, "Let the saints be joyful in glory;" that is, the kind ones. All come from the same root with that which here is translated "loving-kindness," denoting what an ingredient loving-kindness is to saintship and to godliness; therefore it is not enough for Christians to be godly, but they must be kind one to another also. 2 Pet. i. 3, "And to godliness add brotherly kindness." You think you are godly; but are you of a rugged, rough-hewn disposition, surly, severe, and perverse? here is the exhortation to you this day from God, if you will approve yourselves to be godly, "Add to your godliness brotherly kindness;" except you add that, you can have little comfort in your godliness. It is impossible indeed for one who has the power of godliness, and its true comfort and sweetness, to be of a harsh and unkindly disposition; such a heart has in God such infinite satisfaction, that there is nothing that can come from without that can make it bitter; there is so much sweetness in the satisfaction it enjoys in God, that not all the bitterness from without can sour such a heart; as the scripture saith, "A good man is satisfied from himself."

If you have a vessel of honey, a little gall will make it all bitter, yet a little honey will not make sweet a vessel of gall. But in grace, though there be much bitterness in men or women, though they be naturally harsh, yet a drop of true saving grace will sweeten all that gall; and if they be once gracious, a great deal of gall and bitterness from without will not bitter that sweetness. I beseech you to

Obs. 1. When God has left men they grow more passionate and froward than they were before. And I verily believe one ground of the frowardness and passionateness in professors is, that they have made breaches between God and their souls, and their peace being broken, nothing then can give them content. As when a man has been abroad and others have angered him, and his inward comfort and joy are gone, then every thing annoys him, he is pleased with nothing, his countenance is louring, and he is unkind to all; and why? because he has lost the sweetness of his own spirit, and now all seems bitter, nothing from without can content him: but let this man go abroad and things succeed with him, let him make a good bargain, hear excellent news, that his goods are come home safely, he can now bear a hundred times more than before, and you can scarce anger him; more? because his heart is filled with sweetness. So, let a Christian walk close with God, maintain his peace with him, and he will have so much sweetness in his heart that it will not be easy to incense him. Why? He has enough within. Perhaps his friend, his wife, his neighbour is unkind, but his Christ is loving: Though there be little comfort in my marriage with one who is so peevish and perverse, yet in my marriage with Christ there is satisfaction enough. But when the heart has made breaches between Christ and itself, when it has lost the sweetness of that marriage communion, no marvel if there be no sweetness in the other.

A remarkable example of this is Saul, who, before his breach with God, was of a sweet, mild, and loving disposition, but afterwards perverse, cruel, and froward. When first chosen king, how humble was he! he acknowledges himself to be of "the least of the tribes of Israel," and "the least in his father's house;" and when some contemptuously exclaimed, "Shall this man reign over us?" the text saith, "he held his peace;" and when others would have had them killed, No, by no means, they must not be slain, because God had shown him mercy in a late victory. But after Saul had fallen from God, how rugged, perverse, and cruel his disposition then! even to Jonathan his son, a gracious, loving youth, he saith, "Thou son of the perverse, rebellious woman," and casts a javelin at him to kill him; then the fourscore and five priests in the city of Nob must be all slain in his anger. What was the reason of all this? The breach between God and his own soul. Oh take heed of those breaches, for what does a man get by the want of this kindness and loving disposition! he troubles himself; Prov. xi. 17, "He that is cruel," of a harsh disposition, "troubleth his own flesh." I appeal to you who are married, do you not lose much of the sweetness of your lives? what comfort have you in them when there is nothing but snarling at and crossing one another? you trouble your own house, and your own flesh; whereas, if there were loving-kindness between you, it would sweeten all your comforts, yea, all your crosses.

Obs. 2. The loving-kindness of a man or a woman is their beauty. "The desire of a man is his kindness," Prov. xix. 22; and of a "virtuous woman" who had "done excellently," among other high commendations, this is one, "In her tongue is the law of kindness," Prov. xxxi. 26; kindness gives a law to her mouth: many women are under no restraint, and their tongues are lawless when they are provoked; but of a woman commended by God, the text saith, "The law of kindness is in her tongue," the kindness of her heart guides her lips, and that is the honour of a woman.

To be of a sweet, kind disposition, is an exceeding beauty, adding a glorious lustre to any man. Isa. xl.

6, "All flesh is as grass, and all the goodness thereof is as the flower of the field;" the word for goodness is חַסְדִּים the same word that is used here, and translated "kindness;" denoting that kindness is "the goodness" of the spirit of a man or woman; as the flower imparts beauty to the field. Justin Martyr, in his Apology for the Christians, saith, That their adversaries hated only the name of a Christian, τὸ ἄχριστόν but had nothing against the Christians; μὴ ἐστὶν αἰθερίας. Just. Mar. and what is there, saith he, in the name? Nothing but that which is good and lovely enough: now, it is not just to hate what is profitable and gentle, yet so the word may signify, if you call them Christiani, from χρηστικός, mild, profitable; and so they are indeed, profitable, gentle, and kind people, and why should you hate such? 2 Cor. vi. 6, "By kindness, by the Holy Ghost" are put together, and there is much of the Holy Ghost where there is much kindness. The spirit of Christ is a spirit of kindness and gentleness, and though you may think that your harshness and severity argue courage of mind, (for it is usual for froward and passionate people to think they have more courageous spirits than others,) know that they only prove you more base and degraded. I will cite, in proof only, Psal. xlv. 4, where it is said of Christ, "In thy majesty ride prosperously because of truth and meekness;" now the word for meekness is, in 2 Sam. xxii. 26, translated "gentleness;" "thy gentleness hath made me great:" mark, gentleness and majesty may consist together, yea, Christ is magnificent and full of majesty in the gentleness and quietness of his spirit; Ride on in thy majesty prosperously, because of thy meekness, because of thy gentleness. Would you have a brave spirit, like to the spirit of Christ in his glory? let your spirits be gentle, sweet, and loving.

"I will betroth thee unto me in mercies."

Loving-kindness and mercies may seem, at first view, synonymous, but there is much difference in them.

"And in mercies;" viscera, so the word is; "I will betroth thee unto myself in bowels." Not the fruit only, but the root; not the water only, but the fountain; thou shalt have the fountain of all good, my very bowels, from whence flow all mercies. Wherefore, Christians, you need not fear the want of the supply of mercies; why? because you have the Fountain from whence mercies spring. God may grant to wicked men many fruits of his bounty and goodness; but they have not his bowels, they have not the fountain, the root from whence all mercies issue.

Here is the happiness of a Christian, not only to have much good from God, but to have those very bowels from whence that good comes. Herein lies the dignity, the glory of a Christian, the vastness of his riches.

Christians, you need not therefore fear to resign any mercy God requires at your hands, for the bowels of mercy are yours; the spring-head of all mercy, whence you may fetch all seasonable and all suitable supplies at pleasure, is yours. Here is the reason why many carnal persons, when they have received a mercy from God, cling to it, so closely, and are so unwilling to part with it, though God requires it again: why? because they are not acquainted with the true privilege of a Christian, know not what it is to possess the bowels of God, nor where to go for more, and therefore are loth to part with what they have. Now the saints can part with any thing for God; Let him take what he will, let him strip me as naked as he pleases, I have the bowels of God, the spring-head, to resort to for new mercies. If there were a scarcity of water, and you had only some in a cistern, and your neighbour came to borrow of you, you would be unwilling to lend any: but if you have a well-spring, a fountain, that never was and never will be drawn dry, is it a great matter for you to lend water then? So, the men of the world are needy creatures, they have something indeed, but it is as water in a cistern, when that is gone they think that all is gone; therefore they will not lend it, no, not unto God himself when he requires it of them. But the saints have the bowels of mercy, the spring-head of all grace, therefore whatever God calls for, they presently say, Lord, here take all, I know where to have it again, and much more than that. This makes godly men so ingenuous for God, and so free-hearted to him, and to his servants.

But let us search a little into these mercies: it is an argument that has much depth in it.

1. They are a depth swallowing up the greatest evils of sin or affliction. If you pour a pail of water on the boards of your chamber, it seems like a little sea; but take the same and pour it into the deep ocean, it is there swallowed up, and appears nothing. Our afflictions and our sins in themselves seem great, but when they are swallowed up in these bowels, in these depths of God's mercies in which he betroths himself to us, they are as nothing in comparison. Therefore the Scripture uses such strong expressions for the wonderfulness of God's mercies to his people in Christ.

There are three chiefly remarkable words to express the fulness of God's mercies in Christ. The first in Eph. ii. 7, "The exceeding riches of his grace," the riches that are cast in over and above.

The second in Rom. v. 20, "The grace of God did much more abound;" there is a second ὑπερ.

And the third in 1 Tim. i. 14, "The grace of our Lord was exceeding abundant." There was a pleonasm before, but here is a super-pleonasm. Here ὑπερ is three times repeated, to mark the riches of the glory, and the depth of the mercy, of God in Christ.

2. Consider these mercies in the effects. They set on work all the fulness of God for the good of his people. If there be any thing that God's wisdom, or power, or all that blessedness which is in God, can effect, they will engage all to work for thy good, for the bowels of mercy yearn towards thee, if thou art in Christ.

3. It is the great design, yea, the greatest design, that ever God had from all eternity, to honour his mercy, and to set out the infinite glory and riches of it in Christ. Certainly God had great designs in doing such mighty things as he has done, but, above all the designs that ever God had in all his works, to glorify the riches of his mercy in Christ is the chiefest. They are indeed bowels of mercy when they are such, as that in the glory of them God attains his great design in making the world, for he would never have created it had it not been for that.

4. They are the heart-blood mercies of Jesus Christ, such mercies as cost the blood of Christ; and his was certainly most precious blood. When Christ sees any converted and brought home to him, to be made a subject of God's mercy, he thinks his blood well bestowed. The Scripture saith, "He shall see of the travail of his soul, and shall be satisfied." I have enough for all the blood I shed. I came indeed from my Father, and was made a servant, a curse; yea, I suffered the wrath of my Father, and my blood was shed; but if this be the fruit of it, that such a soul shall obtain this mercy, I have recompence sufficient.

5. Yea, God the Father is well pleased with it, he thinks the blood of Christ but a valuable price to purchase such mercies as these. As for all the glory of the world, God can give it to men whom he hates, to reprobates: as Luther saith of the whole Turkish empire, It is but a crumb of bread that the master of the house throws to his dogs: but when his mercies in Christ are concerned, they are such as are worth the blood of his Son, which alone could purchase them.

6. They are such mercies as God designedly bestows, that he may declare to all eternity, before angels and all his saints, to what a height of excellency and glory these infinite mercies are able to raise a poor creature. These must needs be great.

7. Yea, they must be an object for angels and saints to wonder at, and adore and magnify the name of God everlastingly.

What shall I say more in naming the fruits of these mercies? Such mercies as, whereas before sin made thee the object of God's hatred, it now makes thee an object of his pity; God takes occasion from thy sin to display his mercy. Take heed of abusing it, it is children's bread; let us not sin that grace may abound, but rather, seeing thy sin cannot overcome God's goodness, let God's goodness overcome thy sin. Let us learn also to wonder at these riches of mercy in Christ, and to exercise much faith about them. Certainly we would thrive in godliness much more if we exercised faith in the bowels of God in Christ. Those fruits, like your apricots and May cherries, that grow up by a wall and enjoy the warm beams of the sun, are sooner ripe, and have more sweetness, than those which grow in shady places; your grass that is shaded by the trees in orchards, is sour: so the fruit which Christians bring forth under discouragements and despairing thoughts, is very sour; some things they do, for conscience compels them to duties, but, alas, it is sour fruit; though it be better to do what conscience requires than not, yet to do it merely because conscience compels, is but as sour grass. But when a Christian can by faith set himself before the sunshine of these mercies of God in Christ, and continually live in the midst of the beams of that grace, he grows ripe sooner, and his fruit is sweeter.

You may easily know whether the Sun of righteousness shines on you. Does your fruit grow ripe? and is it sweet? Those who talk of mercy, and of Christ, and have his name in their mouths, but bring forth sour and crabbed fruit, are not in the Sun; they are blind, and cannot discern it; and are but in a light of their own fancy, and in a heat of their own making.

In Eph. iii. 18, 19, the apostle prays that the Ephesians "may be able to comprehend with all saints, what is the breadth, and length, and depth, and height" of the riches of God in Christ. Mark, the philosophers tell us of only three dimensions, but here are four; and what is the fruit of this? "To know the love of Christ, which passeth knowledge, that ye might be filled with all the fulness of God." Here is the effect of it; when we know the breadth, and length, and depth, and height of God's love, and have that knowledge by the Spirit of God, that passeth all natural knowledge, then we are filled with all the fulness of God. Here now is a glorious Christian; a Christian filled with all the fulness of God. Would you be so? Learn then to exercise faith much about the infinite riches of the mercy of God in Christ, this will fill you with all the fulness of God. You complain of barrenness and emptiness in your hearts and lives, it is because you give such little heed to this.

God betroths his church to himself in mercies, in bowels. Let us learn, when we are in any strait, to plead with God for bowels of mercy. Isa. lxiii. 15, "Look down from heaven, and behold from the habitation of thy holiness and of thy glory: where is thy zeal and thy strength, the sounding of thy bowels, and of thy mercies toward me? are they restrained?" Lord, hast thou not said that thou wilt betroth thy church unto thyself in bowels? Where is "the sounding of thy bowels?" Lord, let us have these bowels of thine in which thou hast betrothed us through Christ.

Oh what confusion will there be one day to those who Τὸν ὑπερβάλλοντα πλοῦτον τῆς χάριτος.

Ἵπερπερίσσευσεν ἡ χάρις.

Ἵπερπερίλεονσεν ἡ χάρις.

Turcicum imperium, quantum quantum est, minus est quam patrifamilias capibus project. Luth.

shall miss these mercies of God, in which the Lord has betrothed himself unto his church! What! will you content yourselves now with crumbs which God casts to dogs, with the fruits of his general bounty and patience, when you hear of such glorious mercies in Jesus Christ? These things should raise our hearts, so that we should protest as Luther did: I protest, saith he, God shall not put me off with these things of the world, with my portion here. O no, the Lord has showed me greater riches, and though I be unworthy of any, yet, as I know his mercy is free, why then should not I have my portion in these glorious things?

Come in, then, come in, O sinful soul, be in love with Jesus Christ and the ways of godliness; know that all these mercies are tendered to thy soul this day, to break thy heart, even that hard heart of thine; and they are as free for thee as for any. There is nothing more pleasing to God, than for thee to be taken with the glory of the riches of his mercy. Thou canst perform no duty so acceptable to God as this, to have thy heart broken on the consideration of his bowels, to have thy bowels yearn again, and to come in and close with this infinitely rich and glorious grace. Which if thou dost, know that, the first moment thou art united to Christ, thou dost launch into the infinite ocean of mercy, dost breathe in the element of mercy, and live on nothing but mercy.

Is it so? Then know God expects a merciful disposition from thee too. God betroths thee in righteousness, and puts righteousness into thee; in judgment, and gives thee judgment too; in loving-kindness, and makes thee loving and kind likewise; and in mercies, and puts mercies into thee.

First, toward himself. Can we be merciful to God? What good can we do to God? God expects you should have bowels toward him. How? Thus. Dost thou see the name of this blessed God thy husband dishonoured in the world? Oh, thy bowels should yearn. What! does God look upon thee in thy blood, in thy misery, and do his bowels yearn toward thee? Canst thou look on God in his dishonour, and his cause trampled under foot, and do not thy bowels yearn toward him? It should move thy soul to see this blessed God so much dishonoured in the world as he is, to see that there are so few that love and fear him, who is thy God and has done thee so much good. Is there any good cause in which the name of God may be honoured? Thy bowels should forthwith work toward it. "My beloved put his hand by the hole of the door, and my bowels were moved for him," Cant. v. 4. When Christ but began to open the door, but put in his hand, my bowels were moved, saith the church, and I could never be at rest till I had inquired after, yea, and found my beloved. Is there any beginning amongst us to let Christ in his government into the kingdom? Do we feel him putting his hand in at the door? certainly, if skilled in his way, we may feel him. Oh that our bowels then would yearn, and cause our hearts to flow out to the bountifulness of the Lord, and join with Christ in this blessed work which he is commencing.

Our bowels must be toward the saints also. It is extremely against the Spirit of Christ, for a Christian to be hard-hearted toward his brethren. Christ expects bowels; and as you would account it a grievous misery to have your bowels diseased, know it is a greater evil to have your hearts unmerciful, than to have a disease in your bowels: as the Scripture phrase is, Amos i. 11, "He cast off all pity, and his anger did tear perpetually;" so it is in your English Bibles; but the words in the original are, "and corrupted his bowels;" their bowels were corrupted when they were not pitiful toward their brethren in misery. The condition of Je-horam was grievous, when his bowels came forth by reason of his disease, 2 Chron. xxi. 15. An unmerciful heart is a worse disease.

What are we, and who are we, that God's mercies should be shown to us? and why not our mercies toward our brethren? The Scripture expressly requires mercy in the saints towards one another. "Put on, as the elect of God, bowels of mercy, and kindness," Col. iii. 12. Would you have an argument to yourselves that you are God's elect? put on bowels then. Never was there a period in your own life, or that of your forefathers, in which God called for bowels of mercy, more than now. Do you hear of the miseries of your brethren, their goods spoiled, houses burnt, wives and children ravished, themselves imprisoned, their bodies wounded, and yet have no bowels all this while? what! do you remain hard-hearted? Are you the elect of God? Why, I pray you, what is your flesh more than the flesh of others? What are your comforts more than the comforts of others? Why should you lie soft and safe more than others? Is there any such difference between you and your brethren, that they should be in misery, and you pampered, and scarce feel the very wind blow on you? You will say, It is God that has made the difference. I grant it, and it would not grieve God to make such a difference between you and them, if he saw your bowels yearn towards them. But if God lay such afflictions on your brethren who are better than you, and have done more for him than ever you have, and yet you continue hard-hearted, this will grieve God at the heart. "Whoso hath this world's good, and seeth his brother have need, and shutteth up his bowels of compassion from him, how dwelleth the love of God in him?" 1 John iii. 17. If thou hast bowels and shutteth them up from thy brother, surely thou never knewest what the love of God meant.

Mark what encouraging expressions we have to bounty and liberality towards our brethren, in 2 Cor. ix. 8, "God is able to make all grace abound toward you; that ye, always having all sufficiency in all things, may abound to every good work." There is no such text in all the book of God to encourage the opening our bowels to the administering to the necessities of the saints, for that scripture expressly bears on the point; and if you believe any thing in the word of God, if you have any experience of God's bowels towards you, read over this, and see if it will not open your bowels. "God is able to make all grace abound;" "grace abound," that is something; "all grace," something more; but all kind of grace, that is still more, and that from God's almighty power too; but even that is not enough, mark, "that ye, always having all sufficiency in all things." It were enough, one would think, for God to say, You shall have things needful, nay, you shall have sufficiency in that you have; but no, he saith, You shall have "all things," and "sufficiency in all things," and "all sufficiency in all things." Yea, but I may want before I die? No, you shall have "always all sufficiency in all things." Well, this may make us do something, and you may think, if I do this or that good work, it were enough: no, but you must abound, you must do every good work, and abound in every good work. But I shall exhaust myself if I be so abundant in every good work: no, God is able to make all grace in you to abound towards you, "that you, always having all sufficiency in all things, may abound." You shall never be drawn dry, for you have the bowels of God's mercy. Some asked Alexander, when giving large gifts, What will you keep for yourself? Spes, replied he; I will keep hope for myself; I believe that there are still greater things in store for me: what he had he gave away, because he had a spirit that looked after and hoped for great things to come. Certainly, Christians have hope left always; why? because they can have recourse to the bowels of God's mercies.

One thing more, to knit all together; all righteousness, all judgment, all loving-kindness, all mercies, come from God through our union with Christ.

Though God be an infinite ocean of goodness, yet we can expect nothing from God, but through our union with Christ. Man has forfeited the title he had to all the goodness of God, and now the title upon which he is to hold all his good, is the union he has with this husband, with Jesus Christ, by virtue of this marriage. Whenever faith goes to heaven for any good from God, it goes by virtue of this right, and obtains all the blessings it gets from God, by virtue of that conjugal union which the soul has with Jesus Christ.

How blessed then was the time when Christ was first revealed to the church! "Behold king Solomon with the crown wherewith his mother crowned him in the day of his espousals, and in the day of the gladness of his heart," Cant. iii. 11. The things explained regarding our espousals with Christ, must needs make that day the day of the gladness of our hearts: oh how dear should this Christ thy husband be to thee! how happy, when thou shalt have full communion with him! When Isaac met Rebekah, he carried her into his mother's tent: when the Lord Christ shall meet his spouse, he will carry her into his Father's palace. Behold the riches, the glory of my Father whom I told you of, these are all yours in my right eternally.

"I will even betroth thee unto me in faithfulness."

Here is a third betrothing, "I will betroth, I will betroth, I will betroth." Jerome remarks that it is thrice repeated, to note the three several times of God's betrothing himself to his people: 1. When he called Abraham. 2. After they went out of Egypt and were in the wilderness at Mount Sinai. 3. In the time of the gospel. And of this exposition, Calvin saith, it may be accounted witty, but frivolous; and gives himself a better reason for the repetition, which I think agreeable to the mind of the Holy Ghost; Because apostatizing Israel could hardly believe that God would do such a thing as this. What! after the Lord had cast her away, yea, cast her to the beasts, (for so he threatens in the former part of the chapter,) yet now betroth her to himself? this was unlikely.

"I will even betroth thee;" so it is in your Bibles: the particle here rendered "even" is the same that is before translated "and;" but because it is repeated the third time the translators thought there was an emphasis in it, and therefore, to express that, employed the word "even."

"In faithfulness," or steadiness; I will betroth thee unto me in a steady way; my goodness toward thee shall be stable and firm: so the word is often used in Scripture: "His hands were steady," Exod. xvii. 12; and Deut. xxviii. 59, I "will make thy plagues of long continuance;" thy plagues stable and constant: in both which places the same word is used that is here translated "faithfulness." Thus 1 Sam. ii. 35, "I will raise me up a faithful priest; and I will build him a sure house;" there the word is of the same root; "a sure house," a firm, steady house. Faithfulness here imports God's stability and steadiness in his covenant with his people. It denotes not so much the perpetuity, for that was before, "I will betroth thee unto me for ever;" but firmness and constancy, as opposed to fickleness and uncertainty.

There is much inconstancy and fickleness in our love one to another; but the love of God to his people is a stable, settled, firm, and constant love. That is the meaning in the first place, though not all. "As the bridegroom rejoiceth over the bride, so shall thy God rejoice over thee," Isa. lxii. 5; that is, the love of Christ, after thousands of years, is still but as the love of a bridegroom on the wedding day; then, ordinarily, love is ardent, and shows itself much. There is no moment of time in which Christ does not rejoice, not only as a husband, but as a bridegroom, over every faithful soul.

Christ's love is steady, because it is pure, without mixture; it is a holy love. Compare Isa. lv. 3, where "the sure mercies of David" are promised, with Acts xiii. 34, where that scripture is quoted, and Τὰ ὅσια Δαβίδ. There it is, the holy things of David. Thus noting, because the love of God is holy, therefore it is sure and steadfast.

Christ's love to his people is from the sweetness of his nature, and therefore it is steady and firm: "with him there is no shadow of change." It is grounded on a sure covenant, and therefore firm. Though indeed the love of Christ may be to us as the sun, not always in the fruits of it, shining out with equal glory; yet still like the sun, steadily pursuing its course, though sometimes obscured by clouds.

The saints should fasten on the love of Christ in the covenant; and though other things be very uncertain, yet they should quiet their hearts in this, that their happiness in the covenant of grace is sure. Perhaps the love of our friends is very fickle and inconstant; they may speak smooth things, and seem as if their hearts were with us; but what sullen moods and fits, at times, come over them! and when you have most need of them, you know not where they are to be found: but the love of Christ is certain and stable. Mark how David comforted himself in the stability of God's covenant love: Though he causes not my house to grow, "yet he hath made with me an everlasting covenant, ordered in all things, and sure: for this is all my salvation, and all my desire," 2 Sam. xxiii. 5; that is, that the covenant is sure and steadfast.

And this faithfulness must be mutual. "I will betroth thee in faithfulness," and make thee faithful too; that is, thou shalt have a firm and stable spirit in thy love to me; though not to be compared with Christ's love to them, yet there is a reciprocal stability in the hearts of the saints, they are not carried up and down, as other men, with every wind of doctrine, with every breath of temptation. "The righteous is an everlasting foundation," Prov. x. 25. "The righteous shall hold on his way," Job xvii. 9. It must needs be so, because the affections of the saints to Christ are holy affections also; and though they have some mixture, and therefore some instability; yet they are holy, and therefore stable.

And they choose Christ in righteousness and in judgment. They have the Divine nature in them; and as that has no shadow of change, they attain to some shadow of its immutability. Isa. xxvi. 3, a godly man is described as one "whose mind is stayed upon God:" he has a stable, not a wandering, fickle spirit, and has fixed himself on God, and can say, "My heart is fixed." The men of the world, because they have not that which can satisfy, run up and down, first after one contentment, then after another, and can settle no where; but the saints find an all-sufficiency in God; there their hearts are satisfied, and there they fix: as a bee, lighting on a flower, and finding but little honey, tries many in succession; but when it comes to one laden with sweets, it settles there. The hearts of the saints find a fulness of good in God, and there stay themselves.

A fickle, wavering, unstable spirit, is exceedingly unbecoming a Christian. As in the body, some, who have flushings of heat, have a very good colour for a while; but when we know that this is but a flush, it is rather a proof of disease, than of a good complexion. A candle burning down in the socket gives some flashes of light now and then; but a candle set up upon a table yields a steady and constant light. Mad people, you know, have their lucid intervals; but you may perceive they are insane, because there is not constancy and evenness in their actions. This stableness, this evenness in a Christian, way, is its beauty and glory. Though you be forward sometimes in that which is good; yet, if at other times your hearts be off, there is no beauty in your conversation. Give me a Christian whose ways are even, in whom you find a constancy.

Those who have such fickle, uncertain, inconstant hearts, are never likely to excel; if they have any truth in them, yet they will never be eminent Christians. Gen. xlix. 4, it is said of Reuben, "Unstable as water, thou shalt not excel:" so it may be said of an unstable Christian, He is one of good affections; at some times very zealous, but being unstable as water he shall not excel.

Constancy in love is exceedingly comely and beautiful between married persons, it adds much to the lustre and comfort of their lives; and to this allusion is here made. For men to seem sometimes very fond, and at other times to be bitter and unkind, like Nabals; or the wife to show much love occasionally, and to be grievous at other times; this takes away the beauty, the comfort of their lives.

But there is more in this faithfulness than stability and firmness: "I will betroth thee in faithfulness;" I will certainly perform all the good which is befitting a husband, yea, such a husband as I am, to do to my spouse; you may confide in me, I will be faithful to you; not only my love, but my faithfulness, shall bind me to you. My loving-kindness, my merciful disposition, is a great bond, but my faithfulness shall bind me also; I will be content to engage myself to you, to engage all that I am and all that I have to you, that you may certainly confide in me; so as not only to expect it from my love, but to challenge it from my faithfulness. We deny not God's providence to other creatures; but the spouse has a claim on God's care, saith Bernard, which is beyond his providence, grounded on his faithfulness as well as his love. Christ here condescends to his spouse, as a man is willing to give satisfaction to his wife, and her friends; and though indeed he would do any thing in the world from love to his wife, yet in regard of her weakness, and to satisfy some friends, he is content to enter into bond, to do whatsoever is fitting. It is good to make all things sure beforehand, say her friends: he presently yields, in order to satisfy their minds, for it is only what he is willing to do without bonds. Thus it is between Christ and his spouse: the love of Christ is enough, sufficient to insure a supply for all wants; but we are weak, and would fain have things made sure; therefore, saith Christ, in condescension to our infirmity, I will even enter into bond, and you may then rest assured I will be faithful: I will bind my faithfulness to you for all the good you desire.

Providentiam creaturae non negamus, curam agnoscere sibi vindicat. Bern.

And this faithfulness of Christ respects either the great marriage covenant, there he will be sure to be faithful to his spouse, or all particular promises contained in it. There is the great marriage covenant, about reconciling God, and paying all debts, and satisfying God's justice, and bringing to eternal life; but there are many under-promises, and Christ will be faithful in them all. In Psal. xxv. 10, you have a promise worth a kingdom, "All the paths of the Lord are mercy and truth;" not only mercy, but mercy and truth, mercy engaged. Wicked men may have mercy from God, from the general bounty and goodness and merciful disposition of God; but what the saints have is from truth, as well as from mercy, it is theirs by covenant.

God urges much that the hearts of his saints should confide in him. He accounts not himself honoured without it: therefore mark how Christ suits himself to our weakness, that we may confide in his faithfulness.

What is it (saith he) that you poor creatures do one to another, when you would make things sure between you? We answer thus, Lord, we engage ourselves by promise. I will do so, saith Christ, you shall have my faithful promise. Acts ii. 39, Peter invites to baptism on this ground, because "the promise is unto you, and to your children, and to all that are afar off, even as many as the Lord our God shall call." In the first clause he addresses the Jews, in the other the Gentiles. As if he should say, Come in and receive baptism, for to you and to your children the promise is made; to you that are Jews and to your children, and to the Gentiles and their children likewise, they have the same promise as you, and come under the same covenant for the main. And this promise in which Christ has engaged himself, is no other than a draught of that which was from all eternity, and therefore is so much the more sure. Tit. i. 2, the gospel is called a promise before the world began. All promises in Scripture are but a draught of that grand promise which God the Father made before time to his Son. As if Christ should say, Will you have an engagement by promise? This is past long ago, my Father has engaged himself to me from all eternity, and if you have any promise now, it is but a draught of the first copy of that great promise which my Father has made me from all eternity.

What do you more when you would make things sure one to another? We answer, We not only make a verbal, but a written promise. God has therefore given us his Scripture, and the chief thing in it is the promise, God has set to it his hand. Hence, Luther saith, The whole Scripture especially aims at this, that we should not doubt, but believe, confide, and hope that God is merciful, kind, and patient.

Here you have my promise and my hand, is there any thing else you are wont to do, to make things sure? We answer, Lord, we take witnesses. I will do so too, saith God. When we would make things sure indeed, we sometimes take not only two, but three, or four, or more witnesses. You shall have witnesses, saith God, as many as you will, witnesses of all kinds, witnesses in heaven, and witnesses in earth. In heaven, "the Father, the Word, and the Holy Ghost," witnesses authentic, of credit sufficient, the three persons in the Trinity. On earth, "the spirit, the water, and the blood," 1 John v. 7, 8.

What do you more? Lord, we set to our seals likewise. You shall have that too, saith God, you shall have seals of all kinds; you shall have the broad seal of heaven, the sacraments, the seals of the covenant; and you shall have my privy seal, I will take my ring off my finger, I will give you even the seal the Spirit; show by this seal, it will carry with it sufficient authority.

Is there any thing remaining? Yes, we answer, there is one thing more, we take an oath. I will do that too, saith God, that you may confide in my faithfulness. "God, willing more abundantly to show unto the heirs of promise the immutability of his counsel, confirmed it by an oath," Heb. vi. 17. As if he should say, There is no need of an oath, but I will abound toward you, because I would have you trust me, and confide in me thoroughly. And mark, this is for the sake of the heirs of promise. God would never have done this for other men; it is for your sakes only, because of your weakness he confirms all with an oath. And if we would have things sure, we will not have the oath of such as are of no great credit. Mark, therefore it is God that swears, and that by the greatest oath; "because he could swear by no greater, he sware by himself," Heb. vi. 13.

Is there any thing more, saith God, that you are wont to do amongst yourselves, to make things sure? Yes, Lord, we are accustomed to take a pledge. You shall have that too, saith he, I will give you a pledge, and such a one that if you never had any thing more you would be happy. What is that? 2 Cor. i. 22, "Who hath also sealed us, and given the earnest of the Spirit in our hearts." I will send my Spirit to be an earnest in your hearts of all the good that I intend to do for you everlastingly.

Is there any thing else you would require of me to confide in me? Yes, if God would do some great and notable work, as a beginning and engagement of that which is to come after, this is yet more than an earnest. When some special thing is done as an opening to our expectations, then we have not merely a promise under hand and seal, an oath and a pledge; but the matter is actually begun, and so begun, that the difficulty is over. Those who live under the gospel see the greatest part of our salvation already accomplished. God made a promise of sending his Son into the world; now the performing of that promise, that God-man should come into the world to be made a curse for sin, is the greatest work of all eternity, and if God could have failed in any thing, it would have been in that. It is not so much for God to deliver us in this world, nor to bring us to heaven, as it is to send his Son into the world to be made a curse for us. Now when God has done so great a work, and been faithful in that great promise, he has taught us for ever to trust in him, to believe his faithfulness in accomplishing the rest. If a man who owes five thousand pounds, pays you four thousand nine hundred of it, you think surely he will never break for one hundred, I may trust him for the rest, seeing he has dealt so faithfully with me in the great sum. God has paid the four thousand nine hundred, and much more; in comparison of what God has done for us, take all the glory of heaven, and we have not one hundred of the five thousand left behind, therefore surely we may well confide in him for the payment of the rest.

It is true, God is faithful; but is God able? This is seldom an objection, at least an explicit objection in the mouths of people, but surely an implicit one in the hearts of many; that appears by the cautions God gives to remove it. "Commit the keeping of your souls to him in well-doing, as unto a faithful Creator," 1 Pet. iv. 19: as if he had not said enough in declaring he is faithful, he adds, "faithful Creator," as if he should say, If there be no means to help you, I will create means, I will put forth my almighty power to aid you, and you shall have help. "He shall confirm the covenant," Dan.

ix. 27; the word translated "confirm," הבית is of the same root with that for "mighty one," in Gen. x. 8. God will come forth as a giant, as a mighty man, to perform the covenant he has made with his people; if there be any thing in the world wherein God will stir up his infinite power, the excellency of his might, and the glory of his right hand, it will be in confirming his covenant to his saints. "Trust ye in the Lord for ever: for in the Lord Jehovah is everlasting strength." "Thy Maker is thine husband; the Lord of hosts is his name; The God of the whole earth shall he be called," Isa. xxvi. 4; liv. 5.

Seeing God is so faithful, let not us be faithless. But things go very cross, and how shall we believe, our faith wavers? The true, genuine love of the saints is such as will love God for himself alone, without gifts; so genuine faith is to believe in God without experiences, yea, though things seem against us. That is but a poor love that loves God only for that which we receive from him for the present; and that but a weak faith which trusts God only for things that are seen. Do things go cross? they are corrections, and may come from faithfulness, as well as any thing the church enjoys: Psal. cxix. 75, "I know, O Lord, that thy judgments are right, and that thou in faithfulness hast afflicted me." As God comes down and suits himself to you as his poor creatures; so you should labour to raise your hearts to him, and to believe in him as a great God. God deals with you as with weak creatures, you should deal with him as with an infinite God. You must give God leave to do his work in his own way. The object of our confidence in God is, that the thing will be done; not how, or when, but that God will eventually complete his work. Shall our weakness be so much regarded as that things must not work so as to evince God's power? Certainly, it is too much for us to expect such consideration for our weakness. One would think it enough for God to express himself so to you that you may believe; would you have God condescend to reveal himself, so that he should not have the glory of his work, nor you the glory of your faith? this were too much. Though we be bound to deny ourselves much because of the weakness of our brethren, must God deny his glory because of our weakness? We burden God too much with our infirmities. It is for God's glory things happen as they do: Lazarus was dead, and dead so long, that the work of God might appear.

But I find not things turn out as I had hoped; I think I have believed, and sometimes in prayer I have thought my heart closed with the promises of God, but yet things have not answered my expectations.

It may be God calls for new acts of thy believing, and a renewing of thy faith in his faithfulness. You must know, the continual actings of faith draw out the continual actings of the power of God. I will give you, in proof, one remarkable text; perhaps you may have read and heard it often, but not perceived its force; "Oh how great is thy goodness, which thou hast laid up for them that fear thee!" but mark what follows, "which thou hast wrought for them that trust in thee," Psal. xxxi. 19. "Great is thy goodness, which thou hast laid up." God's goodness is wonderfully great for them that fear him; but how? it is "laid up" for them; but now mark, "for them that trust in thee."

All the goodness that is in God, is for them that fear him; but it is not fearing God that will bring it to work. Do you fear God? God has laid up abundance of goodness in a treasury for you, but you must not expect this will work for you, unless you trust in him; your faith must bring it forth into action, and that "before the sons of men. Thou shalt hide them in the secret of thy presence from the pride of man." Would you be hid in the secret of God's presence from the pride of men? you must not only fear God, but trust in his faithfulness. Matt. xiii. 58, Christ "did not many mighty works there because of their unbelief." And Mark vi. 5, "He could there do no mighty work." One says he did not, and the other says he could not. When we have a promise, let us put forth faith, to get the goodness of God to work. A remarkable example of a believing heart laying hold on a promise for God's faithfulness to work out, occurs in 1 Chron. xvii. In the former part of the chapter God promised David to establish his house, to build him a sure house. Well, as soon as David had received this, mark how he works on God's word; as if he had said, Seeing I have got his word, I will hold him to it, he shall not go from it. "Therefore now, Lord, let the thing thou hast spoken concerning thy servant and concerning his house be established for ever, and do as thou hast said," ver. 23: thou hast spoken it, do as thou hast said. And ver. 24, "Let it be even established;" I expect and rely on it, seeing thou hast been pleased in such a gracious way to promise it to me; "let it even be established, that thy name may be magnified for ever." I will plead thy name in it, if there be one thing more than another to be pleaded, I will plead it before thee. But is not this enough? Ver. 25, "For thou, O my God, hast told thy servant that thou wilt build him an house: therefore thy servant hath found in his heart to pray before thee."

He had said before that God had spoken it; here he goes over it again, as magnifying God's word; Thou hast told me, and I pray for nothing but what thou hast told me. Nay, David encroaches yet still more upon God: ver. 26, "Now, Lord, thou art God, and hast promised this goodness unto thy servant." I have not to deal with a man that will be fickle and inconstant, wavering and unfaithful; but thou art God, and I will trust in thee as God; thou art God, and thou hast promised this goodness; it is thine own goodness, now therefore do it. See how he urges God's promise; and mark what admirable effects followed, chap. xviii. After this he prospered: when Hadarezer came against him, he took "a thousand chariots, and seven thousand horsemen, and twenty thousand footmen. And when the Syrians came to help Hadarezer, he slew of them two and twenty thousand men." "After this," mark the connexion of the chapters; "Now after this," after David had improved the promise, he might have what he would; thus the loving-kindness of God was laid up in a promise, but wrought out by David's faith. It is our misfortune that we do not plead this faithfulness of God; we lose abundance by it, and prove that we have base spirits. It is a great evil between husband and wife, when they cannot confide one in another, but are jealous; how can such live comfortably together? So we are jealous of God, and lose our comfort in him. Jealousy comes often from meanness of spirit and self-guiltiness; because we are of such base hearts ourselves, we are jealous of God. Where much love exists between husband and wife, there cannot be much jealousy; and if there were entire love in the spouse of Christ, there would not be jealousy. You have a suitable passage in John v. 40, "Ye will not come to me that ye might have life;" you will not believe in me, that is the meaning: then ver. 42, "I know you, that ye have not the love of God in you." Is there any thing in the world more grievous to a husband than that the wife should be jealous of him? think of it; the same grief it is to the Spirit of Jesus Christ, that thou shouldst be jealous of him, and not confide in his faithfulness.

Surely, if we did trust in God's faithfulness we should not compound with him as we do, but improve his promise to the uttermost. As long as you merchants confide in your debtors, you will not compound with them for less than your debt; if you should go to one that owes you money, and say, I pray, sir, pay your debt to me, and I shall be content to take ten or fifteen in the hundred, the party would think himself disgraced: What! do you distrust me? do you think I will break? No, I will pay you every penny. The truth is, we, poor wretches, because we have not God's promises immediately fulfilled, would fain compound with God; that is, if he would give us any little present comfort we would be satisfied, rather than wait for that which is to come, though it be infinitely more: this is a great dishonour to God, and an argument of our unfaithfulness. It were an argument of little faith if thou couldst be satisfied, should God give thee ten thousand worlds for the present. Were he to say, What will you have? Would you have your enemics destroyed? Would you have your peace, and your trading in the world, your ease and quietness, assured? Is this all? This is to compound with God for twelvecence in the pound, as it were. No, saith a gracious heart; Lord, thou hast promised me mercy, and I expect it to the full, I will not abate the least farthing. God loves we should stand with him for his promise to the uttermost. No, but I hope God will give me heaven at last, yet I doubt he will forsake me here. This is to compound with God in another way. There are some who, perhaps, will pay eighteen or fifteen shillings in the pound; but it is dishonouring God to abate one shilling: therefore we must not only believe in God for heaven, but for earth, and for safety and comfort, and that in times of greatest trouble. God is well pleased with such kind of holy impudence, as we may say; that is, with our following him for the uttermost, and urging him on his word again and again, to pay what he is engaged for.

Again, had we faith in God we should attempt great things, though we see but little means. Many of you who have but small stocks, yet, if you have rich friends that have given you encouragement, and that you know will be faithful to you, you will trade for great things with your little, because you know you have friends who will stand by you: so, though we have but little strength, if God call us, we should be willing to undertake great things, because God has stock enough, and has engaged himself to stand by us.

"I will betroth thee unto me in faithfulness." As I will be faithful to you, and you shall confide in my faithfulness, so you shall be faithful to me, that I may confide in your faithfulness; as I fulfil all my promises and covenant with you, so you shall make good all your promises and covenant with me. The spouse of Christ is one that the Spirit of Christ can confide in. It is said of the virtuous woman, Prov. xxxi. 11, "The heart of her husband doth safely trust in her." Let him be abroad or at home, in what company soever, yet his heart trusts in her, he can leave all his business, his writing, or any thing that concerns him with such a wife. Where this trust is wanted in the heart of the husband toward the wife, there is want of comfort in their lives: thus God saith of his people, Isa. lxviii. 8, "They are children that will not lie;" I can confide in them, I can employ them on any business that I will, for "they are children that will not lie."

They are faithful to God first in the great covenant, in surrendering themselves to God, as they do at their first closing with Christ. Then every gracious soul enters into solemn covenant with God, and it will be faithful in that covenant. And they will be faithful likewise in all their inferior promises and vows which they make to God, in days of fasting, and thanksgiving, and at other times. As God's promises are God's gifts to us, so should our promises be as gifts to God. "According to his own purpose and grace, which was given us in Christ Jesus, before the world began," 2 Tim. i. 9; not only promised, but given unto us in Christ Jesus.

So in thy conversation thou must be faithful to Christ, not prostitute thyself unto another, but keep thyself for Christ. Indeed, the spouse of Christ may be ravished by open violence, but she will not prostitute herself to any other, she keeps herself only for Christ. Thus the saints are described, Eph. i. 1, "Faithful in Christ Jesus." There is a kind of natural faithfulness, as I may so speak; as in Isa. viii. 2, "I took unto me faithful witnesses;" Calvin saith it is meant of Urijah, that base, temporizing man, who made the altar according to the pattern that Ahaz sent from Damascus; he is said to be faithful, that is, he was a fair, honest dealing man, his word was as good as his bond: so, many civil men will be faithful to their word. But mark here, it is "faithful in Christ Jesus;" not only faithfulness between man and man, for many heathens were so, they would rather die than cheat one another; but this is a higher degree of faithfulness. The saints must be faithful, faithful to Christ Jesus, and faithful in Christ Jesus. They who are thus faithful, are fit for the service of Christ; Christ has much work to do, they only are fit for it. Rev. xvii. 14, "The Lamb shall overcome;" why? "for he is Lord of lords, and King of kings: and they that are with him, are called, and chosen, and faithful;" not called faithful, but called and faithful; and therefore the Lamb shall overcome. If all who are in the public service of the kingdom, and profess to be with Christ in his cause, were called and faithful, the work would soon be at an end. It is for faithfulness we shall be hereafter rewarded: "Well done, good and faithful servant;" not, Well done, good and rich servant, or servant who had great employment in public works, but, "Well done, good and faithful servant." Every one of us cannot be eminent, every one cannot be employed in public services, but you may every one be faithful: you that are poor servants may be faithful, as well as a magistrate or as a minister: you that are poor labouring men, porters and watermen, the meanest of you may be faithful, as well as the nobles of a kingdom. God regards faithfulness rather than service; he has no need of the services of men, great or small, but he looks upon the faithfulness of their hearts.

And as you must be faithful to God and his cause, so you must be faithful one to another. You who are godly servants, be sure you be faithful to your masters, that there may be no occasion of such scandal as is often used concerning professors; Such a servant must go to sermons, and he is set against ceremonies, &c.; I never had any so faithful, that, if mine eye were off him, he did not cease to work presently. God forbid there should be such scandals given of you. Wives who profess godliness, be sure you be faithful to your husbands; and tradesmen who profess more than ordinary strictness in religion, be you faithful in your dealings. Has Christ married himself unto thee in faithfulness? he expects that his faithfulness to thee should have that reflection upon thy heart as to make thee faithful to others.

I add one note, taken from all together. As if God should say, O Israel, you have dealt unrighteously with me, you have broken your covenant, but I will betroth you to me in righteousness. You have done foolishly in departing from me, but I will betroth you unto me in judgment. You have been unkind to me, but I will betroth you unto me in loving-kindness. It has not pitied your souls to see me dishonoured, but I will betroth myself in bowels of mercy to you. You have been unfaithful to me, but I will even betroth you unto me in faithfulness. The note from thence is this,

Obs. God deals not with those in covenant with him as they deal with him. This remark is of admirable use and comfort. Mark the difference between God's dealing with others and those that are in covenant with him. Let others deal with God in a perverse way, God will deal with them so too. Psal. xviii. 26, "With the froward thou wilt show thyself froward." Will you be froward with God? God will show himself froward with you. Will you be proud with God? In the thing you are proud God will be above you. Will you be subtle, and contriving mischief against God and his truth? God will meet with the wicked, and insnare them in the work of their own hands. Are you resolute in wickedness? God will be as resolute as you, Jer. xlv. 25, 26. But when God deals with his saints in covenant, though they deal frowardly with him, he will deal gently with them: though they deal proudly with him, he deals in a way of condescension with them; though they be unfaithful to him, yet he will be faithful to them. O my brethren, this point has abundance of sweetness in it, take heed of abusing it. Thy sins cannot overcome God's goodness, let God's goodness then overcome thy wickedness.

"And thou shalt know the Lord."

But why does this follow, "In faithfulness; and thou shalt know the Lord."

Thus, upon these two reasons:

First, The church shall know Christ to be the Lord, and this shall be the means to keep his spouse in faithfulness for ever. As if Christ should say, The reason of all your vile departings from me is, you do not know me, you do not see my bounty and glory, or discern the excellency of my worship. Hence you are gone from me, and have been unfaithful to me; but when I be-troth you to myself again, you shall know me, you shall see so much beauty and excellency in me and my ordinances that you shall never depart from me.

Obs. Low thoughts of God are the cause of superstitious vanities. Had men high and honourable thoughts of God, they would never think to put him off with such poor bauble-worship as they do. Acts vii. 2, it is said, "The God of glory appeared to Abraham;" that is given as a ground why Abraham forsook his country, his father's house, and his kindred. If we once knew the Lord, and that the God of glory had appeared to us, we should be ready to forsake all for him, and give up ourselves unto him in an everlasting covenant.

Secondly, This is as a fruit of my betrothing myself unto thee, a fruit of the covenant. "They shall teach no more every man his neighbour, and every man his brother, saying, Know the Lord: for they shall know me, from the least of them unto the greatest of them, saith the Lord: for I will forgive their iniquity," &c., Jer. xxxi. 34. It is a fruit of the conjugal union betwixt Christ and the soul. When a man and his wife are but suitors, or well-willers, they do not communicate their secrets one to another; but when they are married, they open all their hearts, there is no secret but they will disclose one to another. So saith God, When I am once married to you, I will even open my whole heart to you: "The secret of the Lord is with them that fear him." Those who have but natural knowledge, understand something of the ways of religion. A man in the dark may know where he is; by feeling, he may discover the length and thickness of many things in the house; but when the light of the day comes, he knows what there is in the room after another manner than he did in the dark: this is the difference between knowledge of God in a natural man, and the knowledge of one espoused to Christ. By his natural knowledge he may understand the history of the gospel, and have some general notions of God and of Christ; but when the Sun of righteousness arises, he sees the excellency and glory of God shining in all his attributes, he sees that in Christ which draws his heart unto him in an everlasting covenant. As we read, Cant. vii. 5, Christ "is held in the galleries;" that is, Christ, as soon as he is married to the soul, takes her, as it were, by the hand, and walks in the galleries, and there opens his heart unto her. There is many a sweet turn that a gracious heart has with Christ in his ordinances, wherein Christ opens his whole soul unto it. "All things," saith Christ, "that I have heard of my Father, I have made known unto you," John xv. 15. An admirable text; surely you cannot but know the Lord then. Here is the fruit of our union with Christ. Oh that our hearts were inflamed with desire after further conjugal communion with him! According to the capacity of the soul, so Christ makes known to it what he has heard of the Father. Certainly Christ has heard great things of the Father; he is the wisdom of the Father; he has been with the Father from all eternity; and the Father loves him, he will tell him all the glorious things he has in his heart, and Christ will hide none of those things from his saints! This is the privilege of a saint. Who would not be godly, by which he shall come to know the mind of the Father, according to what Christ knows of it?

Yea, and Christ makes God known to the saints in another way than others know him. גִּיתָה אֱלֹהִים 2 Sam. vii. 27, "Thou, O Lord of hosts, God of Israel, hast revealed to thy servant:" the Hebrew reads, Lord, thou hast revealed this to the ear of thy servant. I wonder how the words "to the ear" come to be left out in your books, in which the emphasis lies. When God makes known himself to his people he reveals things to their ear, as we to a friend who is intimate with us. Many a secret Jesus Christ speaks in the ears of his saints, with which others are never made acquainted. 2 Cor. iv. 6, "God, who commanded the light to shine out of darkness, hath shined in our hearts, to give the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ." It would require time for fully opening the gradations of this scripture; here is "knowledge," and "the knowledge of the glory of God," and "the light of the knowledge of the glory of God; and "shining," and "shining into our hearts," and "into our hearts in the face of Jesus Christ." Surely, then, they shall know the Lord, and they shall know him in a very spiritual way. The light of the saints is a light three stories high. First, They have the light of reason, which other men have. Secondly, They have the light of common gifts, which other men have too, and that is a story higher than the other. Thirdly, They have the light of a sanctifying Spirit, that is a third loft; and they shall come to a fourth story, and that is the light of glory. The light that other men have, is but as the light which you have in a lower room, in warehouses, which in some is so little that you use a candle at noon-day; others have somewhat more light, they have common gifts, which is like the light in the next story, somewhat more clear; but the light of the saints is higher than all these, they know God as their God. Great is the excellency of this knowledge; the soul has blessed satisfaction in it: "Show us the Father, and it sufficeth us." The sanctification of the heart by the presence of the beams of the glory of God, transforming it into the same image, is the very beginning of eternal life. What superior means have we to know God than the heathens had! The Roman histories describe the poor and mean ways those wise men took to know God; as thus, they would look into the entrails of beasts, thereby to find out the minds of their gods; they would observe how the beasts came to the slaughter, whether willingly or unwillingly; they would observe the fire of their sacrifices, whether the flame ascended right or not: thus they attempted to ascertain the mind of their gods. What poor ways are these! We have Jesus Christ, God blessed for ever, the eternal Son of the Father, who is come from the bosom of the Father, to make known to us the mind of God, his and our Father. We know the truth as it is in Jesus, Eph. iv. 21, not only as it is in the works of nature. Some know much of God in the works of creation and providence, and we may learn much of God in those great things which the Lord has lately done amongst us; but to know the truth as it is in Jesus, to know God in Christ, is another kind of knowledge than to know God in the way of his works. Here we see the truth really, when we see it in Christ Jesus. Certainly, then, no one united to Christ in a conjugal union can be an ignorant sot, for Christ engages himself in his faithfulness, upon this marriage of a soul with himself, to reveal himself and the Father unto it. John viii. 54, "Of whom ye say he is your God?" but mark the next words, "yet ye have not known him." A likely matter, that he should be your God, and you not know him! a likely matter, that Christ should be your Saviour, and you not know him, seeing he has engaged himself in his faithfulness, that if you be married to him you shall know him and his Father!

Ver. 21—23. And it shall come to pass in that day, I will hear, saith the Lord, I will hear the heavens, and they shall hear the earth; and the earth shall hear the corn, and the wine, and the oil; and they shall hear Jezreel. And I will sow her unto me in the earth; and I will have mercy upon her that had not obtained mercy; and I will say to them which were not my people, Thou art my people; and they shall say, Thou art my God.

Now, after the assurance of mercy in the covenant, come temporal promises, promises of corn, and wine, and oil: God would hereby teach us this lesson, that all our outward things (at least the sweetness and comfort of them) depend on the covenant in Christ.

"I will hear:" the word may be rendered, I will answer; God will so hear 728 that he will answer. Many times a poor man cries to the rich, and he hears him, but he will not answer; but, saith God, I will hear so that I will answer. This is a most elegant expression: "I will hear the heavens, and they shall hear the earth; and the earth shall hear the corn, and the wine, and the oil; and they shall hear Jezreel." Mira orationis sublimitas, A wonderful sublimity of speech, saith one expositor; Hyperbolica metaphora, A hyperbolical metaphor, saith another; Pulcherrima prosopoeia, A most beautiful and delightful prosopoeia, saith another; these creatures being addressed as if they understood what they did. As if the Lord should say thus, My people, you have indeed, through your sins, been brought into great straits, you have wanted corn, and wine, and oil, and have been scattered in your banishment; but when I shall betroth myself to you, and enter into a covenant with you, then, when you cry, Oh that we might have these outward comforts! immediately the corn, and the wine, and the oil, as if they heard your complaints, shall say, O Lord, we would help Jezreel, and satisfy these thy servants: the corn shall cry to the earth, O earth, let me come into your bowels, I will rot there that so I may bring forth fruit for this people: the vines and the olive shall desire the earth to receive them, to impart juice and nourishment to them, that they may refresh these reconciled ones to God: the earth shall say, Oh that I might receive the corn, and wine, and oil, that I may be fruitful in my kind; but, ye heavens, I can do nothing except I have your influences and the warm beams of the sun to make me fructify; come, therefore, and assist me, that I may bear fruit for Jezreel: and the heavens shall cry, Lord, we would fain help the earth, that the earth may help the corn, and wine, and oil, that they may supply Jezreel; but we can do nothing without thy hand; therefore, hear us, and suffer us to rain upon the earth, that it may become fruitful. Thus the creatures are introduced, pleading that they might help Jezreel. Hence

Obs. 1. Our condition in this world is such, that although reconciled to God, yet, while here, we must be beholden to the corn and wine, to the earth and heavens, and cannot do without them.

Obs. 2. When we are reconciled to God, then the creatures will be serviceable to us, yea, they will be desirous to do us good, they will cry for it. Let us take heed of provoking God, the creatures then will be against us. Gordius, a martyr, gave this answer to those who urged him to deny the truth. If I deny it, the sun, and moon, and stars will deny me light. If we serve God, the creatures will account it their happiness to serve us.

Obs. 3. God is wont to work good for his people by second causes. He sends not things immediately from heaven, but the heavens hear the earth, and the earth hears the corn and the wine. We must look to second causes, but take heed of resting on them. It has been God's work amongst us of late, by detecting plots and giving successes, to manifest himself very strangely, when the means have been very weak; nay, indeed, God has made as much use of men's weakness, as of their strength; but let not us therefore be slack in the use of means, but do the best we can. Though God sometimes works beyond means, and even contrary to them, yet, ordinarily, he uses second causes, not only to work ad presentiam, as Biel the schoolman, and others say, that is, conjointly with the creature; for they assert that there is no efficacy at all in them to produce results; but the truth is, God does make use of second causes, so that they are efficient to accomplish that which he purposes.

Obs. 4. There is a concatenation in second causes, and not merely a use; every one in their order ministers to the other; the heavens hear the earth, and the earth hears the corn. If we could discern the comely order of the creatures, we should see them all linked together by a golden chain: as in the joints of the body, one bone supplies another, one part is hollow to receive another; so in nature, one thing supplies and aids another. As in our salvation there is a golden chain, Rom. viii., so in the creatures there is a golden chain of beauteous order and mutual suppliancy.

Obs. 5. Nothing can be done by any link of the chain of second causes, but by God's being at the uppermost link. Jezreel must cry to the corn, and wine, and oil, and they must cry to the earth, and the earth must cry to the heavens, he must be the highest cause.

Obs. 6. It is most comely, and a great blessing, when the right order and chain of second causes hold; as in nature, so in any society, when all preserve their due subordination; as when the tradesman works in his way, the magistrate in his, the minister in his, every one in his place. But when they are out of order, it is a great misery to a city or kingdom. As once among the Athenians, Themistocles said of his son, a bold youth, This boy can do more than any man in all Greece. Why? Because, the Athenians command the Grecians, I command the Athenians, my wife commands me, and my son commands my wife: here was the concatenation of that government. God deliver all societies from such a concatenation, that the beginning of any public work, I mean the lower link of the chain, should be in an ungodly man, and he should command one, and that one another, and so on in succession. Wheresoever this occurs, it is a fearful judgment.

Obs. 7. God, the giver of all plenty, accounts it his glory to give rain. In Jer. v. 24, God wonders that men will not fear him because of that; "Neither say they in their heart, Let us now fear the Lord our God, that they reign." As if he should say, It is strange in men; what! will not they say in their hearts, Let us fear God, seeing he gives us rain? Thus God glories in this great work of hearing the heavens, and the heavens the earth. The heavens will be as brass over us, and the earth as iron, unless God hear them, and send rain. Therefore let God be acknowledged in that rain which we have had of late: the creatures wanted grass, and the grass cried to the heavens, and the heavens cried unto God, and God has heard the heavens, and sent down rain; and so we see the earth has been refreshed, and abundance of good has come to us by these showers. Give God the glory of this.

Obs. 8. All plenty is given for the sake of the saints. How? God hears the heavens, and the heavens hear the earth, and the earth hears the corn, and the wine, and the oil, and they hear Jezreel. It is all for Jezreel's sake. Were it not for the saints, the earth would soon come to confusion; they are "a blessing in the midst of the land," Isa. xix. 24.

Obs. 9. If the creatures work so graciously for us, how should we then work for God, and for one another! What! shall the creatures cry one to another, and hear one another for our good, and shall God cry to us, and we not hear God? The senseless corn cries to the earth, O earth, help me, that I may help Jezreel; and the earth cries to the heavens, O heavens, send down your influences; and the heavens say, We will hear, and the earth saith, I will hear: shall the earth hear, and the heavens hear for our good, and shall not we hear when God cries for help? God often cries to you to help in his cause, and wilt not thou hear, to work for him? O vile creature, how unreasonable are thy ways before the Lord!

Obs. 10. How should we hear the cries of the poor! When we are in want, the corn cries to the earth, and the earth cries to the heavens, and the heavens cry to God for us. When the poor, I mean God's poor, whom God's hand has made poor, cry, will you not hear? Will you be more hard-hearted than the earth and the heavens are? seeing they hear you, do you hear the cry of your poor brethren.

Obs. 11. If God will hear the creatures when they cry for us, how much more will he hear Jesus Christ when he cries for us! It is a part of our happiness, that we have all the creatures crying to God for our good; but the summit of our bliss is this, that we have Jesus Christ, the Mediator of the new covenant, making intercession at the right hand of God continually for us.

Obs. 12. God's mercies go on to perfection, when they work for the saints; the corn begins to cry to the earth, that stays not there, but the earth goes on and cries to the heavens, and the heavens to God. God's mercies to his saints never cease till the thing is perfected.

"And I will sow her unto me in the earth."

What great mercy is this for God to grant plenty, if he destroy his people? Our country is plentiful, but if God should consume us out of the land, what good would our plenty do us? Therefore saith God, "I will sow her unto me in the earth." Indeed, she is now a poor, contemptible people, and there are but few of them remaining on the earth; but I will make them a seed, and a seed that the Lord has blessed.

"I will sow her." Here the Lord alludes to the name Jezreel, which signifies the seed of the Lord. It was used in the first chapter as a reproach; and in the latter end of the same in a way of mercy. I spoke of it there, therefore I shall now say only this, God uses the word here, to remind her of what she deserved; as if he should say, Though thou art a Jezreel, and deservest to be scattered, yet, out of free grace, I will be merciful to thee, I will sow thee; there shall come a blessing upon thee, and though scattered in the earth, yet in all places thou shalt be as seed from whence my church shall spring. Hence we may

Obs. 1. God's people are the seed of the earth. But of that I have spoken before, in the latter end of the first chapter, and shall now only add an observation of Ribera. The seed, saith he, lies under the clods, and at length fructifies: so should the saints be content to lie under the clods, and though, because of their afflicted condition, they may seem as dead, yea, rotten, yet shall they afterwards fructify and be glorious. Before the time of the church's glory, times of great calamity and distress came, which this rotting of the seed before fructification shadows forth.

Obs. 2. Every godly man should so live, as, either in life or death, to be as a seed from whence many may spring; he should be a means that many should be begotten to God. In the history of the church, it is recorded of Cecilia, a poor virgin, that by her gracious behaviour in her martyrdom, she was the means of converting four hundred to Christ. As in the Indies, one grain yields many hundreds; so we should labour to convert as many as we can, that some that live after may continue to bear up the name of Christ, and the profession of his truth. Especially be careful of your children, leave them as seed to hold up the name of God in your family when you are dead and gone.

Obs. 3. The saints are sown unto Christ, they are seed for Christ, therefore all their fruit must be consecrated to Christ. "I will sow her unto me." Christ must have all the fruit we bear: who should have the fruit, but he that sows it? Therefore it is said, Cant.

vii. 13, "At our gates are all manner of pleasant fruits, new and old, which I have laid up for thee, O my beloved." Are we able to bear any fruit? We must not sow to ourselves, not to the flesh, for then we shall reap corruption; but lay it all up for Christ Jesus, for it is he that soweth us unto himself.

"And I will show mercy upon her that had not obtained mercy."

Many things about God's showing mercy after rejection have been spoken of in the first chapter; and I shall at present only

Obs. 1. There are none so rejected that they can conclude that they shall never have mercy, those that have committed the sin against the Holy Ghost excepted. Though Israel "had not obtained mercy," though they were cast out, yea, cast out to the beasts to be devoured, yet, saith God, I will show mercy upon her.

Obs. 2. Children of wicked parents may at length obtain mercy from God. Though Israel be cast off, yet her children shall have mercy: a comfort to us in regard of the idolatry of our forefathers, yea, a comfort in regard of the children to come. Our forefathers have broken the covenant, why may not we obtain mercy? But suppose we should be the generation of God's wrath, and not obtain mercy, yet we may hope that our posterity shall.

Obs. 3. Mercy after it is thought to be past, if then it come, oh it is sweet mercy indeed! when she seemed to be utterly rejected, then to have mercy shown, this was sweetly.

Obs. 4. Mercy is the cause of all the good the saints receive. Psal. lvii. 3, "He shall send from heaven," saith David. David was in the cave, in a poor condition, hunted for his life, persecuted by Saul; I see little help from earth, therefore, saith he, "He shall send from heaven." What! shall God send angels from heaven to deliver thee, David? No, but mark what follows, "God shall send forth his mercy and his truth:" as if he should say, Lord, though I have no help in earth, though I see no angels from heaven to aid me, yet let me have thy mercy and truth, and that suffices. It satisfies a gracious heart if he may have God's mercy and his truth, that is, God's mercy revealed in a promise.

Obs. 5. God has a special day of mercy for his people, for his churches. "I will have mercy upon her that had not obtained mercy." Let us cry to God to hasten this day; let us open before him the miseries of our own kingdom, and of Ireland: Oh when shall this day come, that thou wilt show to thy people the mercy of which thou hast told us! Oh that that day may hasten! Come, Lord Jesus, come quickly.

"And I will say to them which were not my people, Thou art my people."

This is what we had in the first chapter, with only some slight difference; there it is, "In the place where it was said, Ye are not my people." And when I explained that place, I showed you, both out of the Romans and out of Peter, how the apostles make use, both of the expression in the first chapter and this in the second, and shall here only

Obs. 1. God takes a special interest in his people; they are his people, they are called his "peculiar people," Tit. ii. 14. The word has this emphasis in it, God looks upon all other things as accidents in comparison, and his substance is his people; they are his very portion, as Deut. xxxiii. 29; Exod. xix. 5; they are his peculiar treasure above all people in the world; and Isa. xix. 25, "Assyria the work of my hands, and Israel mine inheritance:" I have made all people, but Israel is mine inheritance. This is the happiness of the saints, therefore they are not as other people are; Numb. xxiii. 9, "This people shall dwell alone, and shall not be reckoned among the nations." This is a great ground of prayer, Lord, leave us not, we are thy people, called by thy name, we have an interest in thee.

Obs. 2. Our being God's people is an argument so to walk that he may not be dishonoured by us. If those in a man's family walk disorderly, it is a dishonour to the master. It is no dishonour to him for a stranger, or one who has but little connexion with him, to do so; and it is not so much dishonour to God for the wicked to walk disorderly, as for the saints, because of their nearness to him: and, besides, their light is (as I told you) three stories high, and if they sin, they sin against a greater light than others, their sin is greater than the sin of the wicked in that respect.

Obs. 3. It is a great mercy for God to make it known to the world, that his people are his people. "I will say to them which were not my people, Thou art my people." The world will not believe it, they think they are a poor, contemptible people; but there shall come a day in which I will make it known that they are mine: and amongst other things by which God will make all the world to know that his people are his, this is one, by setting up the beauty of his ordinances amongst them. Ezek. xxxvii. 27, "My tabernacle also shall be with them: yea, I will be their God, and they shall be my people; and the heathen shall know that I the Lord do sanctify Israel, when my sanctuary shall be in the midst of them for evermore." Thus they shall know, saith God, that they are my people, and that I am their God, when I have set my sanctuary in the midst of them for ever. Were the ordinances of God set up in their purity amongst us in England, were reformation perfected, and did the saints walk humbly and peaceably as they should, the whole world would be convinced that these are indeed the people of the Lord, and that God is amongst them.

"And they shall say, Thou art my God."

Obs. 1. God must begin with us; we cannot begin and say, "Lord, thou art my God;" but God must first say, "You are my people." There are a great many who say God is their God; but God never said they were his people. John i. 12, it is said of those who believed in Christ, that God "gave them" ἐξουσίαν, "power to become the sons of God;" the word signifies authority, that they might with authority acknowledge themselves to be the sons of God, and call God Father; they had the broad seal for it. Will you call God, Father? where is your ἐξουσία, your authority? If God call you children, if he say, You are my people; you may give the echo to God's mercy, and say, Thou art our Father, thou art our God.

Obs. 2. When God speaks mercy to us, we must answer accordingly. Does God say, You are my people? we must answer, Lord, thou art our God. This is a great fault amongst Christians; God manifests himself to many a gracious heart in abundance of love and mercy, and they return an answer to God of despondency and discouragement. God's ways toward thee speak thus, "Thou art one of my people;" but thy heart works as if God were none of thy God. Has not God done much for thee? thou thinkest all that thou dost is hypocritical, whereas the truth is, it is the fruit of his love and kindness to thee. He speaks aloud in what he has done for thee, that thou art one of his people; and yet thy heart thinks that he is thine enemy, that he hates thee, and will cast thee off at last. The ways of God are full of mercy to thee, and he has set his stamp on thee, and, by his dealings of love, tells thee that thou belongest unto him. O unbelieving soul, answer, Lord, thou art my God! and lay aside these discouraging and despairing thoughts of thine! Oh that thou wouldst go away with such an answer in thy mouth! Do not answer God's loving-kindness, and his gracious dealings toward thee, with a distrustful heart; it is dishonourable to him, and grievous to his Spirit.

Obs. 3. God works an answerable disposition in the hearts of his people to him. This is thy duty, but God will work it in time if thou belongest to him. As thus: does God choose us to be his people? then the hearts of the saints choose him to be their God. Does God say, You are my people? the saints say, Lord, thou art our God. Does God say, I will dwell with them? they answer, Lord, thou art our habitation. Does God say, I delight in them? they say, Lord, our delight is in thee. Does God say, I will rest in them for ever? the church saith, O my soul, return unto thy rest. Here is a sweet answer, a rebound of all God's loving-kindness.

Obs. 4. The saints must profess God to be theirs. It is not enough to believe with the heart, but thou must confess with the mouth.

Obs. 5. It is the highest happiness of the saints, that God is their God; then they can say, they have enough. If we could say, This house is mine, this street, this lordship, this city, kingdom, or world is mine; what is all this? A Christian can say, The God that made all is mine. As it is reported of the French and Spanish ambassadors meeting together: My master is king of Spain, said the former. My master (replied the French) is king of France. My master, said the Spaniard again, is king of Naples. And my master, returned the other, is king of France. My master is king of Portugal. And, My master is king of France: still he answered with, My master is king of France, as being equivalent to all the different kingdoms of the Spaniard. So one saith, I have this house, this stock, this estate, this trade; Yea, but, saith a Christian, I have God, God is mine. Surely, having him, thou hast enough. And if God be thy God, he will be a God to thee. 1 Chron. xvii. 24, "The Lord of hosts is God of Israel, even a God to Israel." So it must be with thee, if thou art a saint of God, be a saint to God: are we a people of God? then we must be a people to God. Blessed are the people, that are in such a case; yea, happy are the people, whose God is the Lord.

Thus have we opened the gracious manifestations of God to his church, in part realized spiritually, to spiritual Israel here; but to be more sensibly fulfilled at the great day of Jezreel, that is, when the Jews shall be called, then the spouse of Christ shall visibly be thus married to him, and the Lord will be their God.

Quæ omnia Jufefi post antichriftum in fine mundi præftolantur. Hiero-
nym. in locum.

Jerome saith on the text, All the things here promised to the church, the Jews expect at the end of the world, after the time of antichrist: and I question not, that though in a spiritual sense this scripture is fulfilled now to the saints, yet in a more visible and sensible manner it will be all made good to the people of the Jews; and the Gentiles then joining with them even literally, the glory of the church shall be visible and apparent.

CHAPTER III.

Ver. 1. Then said the Lord unto me, Go yet, love a woman beloved of her friend, yet an adulteress, according to the love of the Lord toward the children of Israel, who look to other gods, and love flagons of wine.

THE close of the former chapter had in it much mercy, and this contains the expression of much love also to Israel; but yet God tells them of the mean and low estate they are likely to be in, before the time comes for the fulfilling of all the good which he intends for them. God purposes great mercy, but they must, for a long time, bear their iniquity, and be brought into a vile and desolate condition in their captivity; even until a second appearing of Christ. But in all this time the heart of God would be toward them; his intentions would be strong for good to that people, above all the people on the face of the earth, as a people that he intended yet to marry unto himself; and in time, mercy should break forth gloriously upon them, and his name be magnified in their so returning to him, that their hearts should melt toward his goodness, and not abuse it any more as formerly they had done; but they should "return, and seek the Lord their God, and David their king; and shall fear the Lord and his goodness in the latter days." This is the scope of the chapter:

In which you have three things.

1. God's love continued to "an adulteress," Israel.
2. The low and mean condition of this "adulteress" for a long time.

3. The return of God in infinite mercy toward them at the latter day, together with their return to him.

"Then said the Lord unto me, Go yet, love a woman beloved of her friend, yet an adulteress."

We have here a new injunction to the prophet, and that more difficult than the former. In the first chapter God commanded him to go and "take a wife of whoredoms," but here, to "love an adulteress," which is somewhat more than to take her unto himself. What was meant by taking "a wife of whoredoms," has been explained in the former chapter, and may save us some labour in this. Here there is a vision, as there; as if God should say, Hosea, it is just with me as it would be with thee, if thou hadst a wife an adulteress; notwithstanding all the love she has found, yet still an adulteress; and thine affections were fixed on her, so that thou couldst not withdraw them, but must needs continue to love her: so this people, whom I have loved, and to whom I have done so much good, have gone a whoring from me, and are an adulteress; yet, for all that, my heart cannot be estranged, but is still toward them; I yet love them.

Obs. It is through the strength of the covenant that God's love is so permanent. Others, who are not in covenant with him, God casts off for lesser sins, for any sins; but as for his covenant people, not even their adulteries, their idolatries, alienate the heart of God wholly from them. Surely then, if thou canst appeal to God; O Lord, thou that knowest all things, knowest that there is nothing of thy mind revealed to me but my heart is ready to do, and if I fail in any thing, thou knowest it is the greatest burden to my soul; oh that I knew more of thy mind! and that I had power to do more! surely God will love thee. You hear he loves his people, though an adulteress: so, now take this lesson, as thy sins cannot overcome God's goodness, let God's goodness overcome thy sinfulness.

"A woman beloved of her friend, yet an adulteress."

That is, (as Calvin, Vatablus, and many others interpret it,) beloved of her husband; as if God should say, Had they any such excuse for departing from me, that I have been a bitter husband to them, that I have used them hardly, and with rigour, then indeed they might have some plea; but I have loved them dearly, done much for them, and ever treated them in the kindest manner; yet are they gone a whoring from me. The wife that follows other lovers, thinks, if she can but say, her husband is hard to her, cares not for her, and loves her not, it palliates her adulteries; and so if the adulterous husband can say, What will you have me to do? I never come home but my wife is ill-tempered; and she loves other men: he thinks this is plea enough for him. But Israel could not have this excuse for herself, for she was an adulteress, yet beloved of the Lord. If we understand the passage thus, we may briefly

Obs. 1. The husband should be a friend to his wife.

There should be nothing inconsistent with a friendly demeanour between them. Yea, the love of the husband to the wife should far surmount the love of any friend in the world; he should be, at least, a friend to comfort and cherish her in time of sorrows, to bear the burden of affliction with her: and so the wife in return should act toward the husband.

Obs. 2. A base heart will prove base against all bonds of love. "Beloved of her friend, yet an adulteress." If you should ask, Who is he, or where is he, that is so base? Lay thy hand on thine own heart, and consider what the love of God has been toward thee all the days of thy life, and what return thou hast made to him. Thou hast had from God love that might break the heart of a devil; yet when any temptation comes to draw thee from God, thy base heart listens to it.

Obs. 3. It is a great aggravation of sin to sin against much love. We ought to fulfil our relative duties, though others do not so towards us. If a wife has an unkind, churlish, ungodly husband, yet she is bound to love and to obey him, to be observant of him in whatever may give him all lawful content. So, if servants have froward, churlish, cruel masters or mistresses, yet are they bound to be obedient to them: "Servants, be subject to your masters with all fear; not only to the good and gentle, but also to the froward," 1 Pet. ii. 18. It is no sufficient excuse for the wife to say, My husband is froward and unkind, and therefore what shall I do? nor for the servant to say, My master, or mistress, is unreasonable and cruel, what can I do? You must do your duty to them, though they do not to theirs to you. But if you have a loving husband, tender over you, then love is required much more. Love, above all things, should draw the heart; the knowledge that it is our duty may force obedience, but it is love that draws the heart most kindly. So, if a servant have a godly master and mistress, who respect and tender his good; if he should sin against them, this aggravates the sin exceedingly. To wrong love is a very great sin. Delicata res est amor, Love is a most delicate thing, and must not be rudely handled. A man who is of an ingenuous spirit had much rather be wronged in his estate than in his love; he cannot bear the injury done to it; when his love is abused it goes to his very heart: so it affects God when his people sin against his love; therefore it is said of the saints, when they sin, that they grieve the Spirit of God: he never says so of the wicked; they anger God, but the saints grieve him, because they sin so much against God's love. Charge this aggravation of your sin on your souls, and be humbled; collect together all the expressions of God's love to you, and let them lie glowing at your hearts, and melt them.

But inasmuch as God bids him take "a woman beloved of her friend," and calls not this friend husband, I think those express the intention of the Holy Ghost in this more fully, who interpret it thus: this friend is not meant of one who is fully married, but rather one in a way of marriage. Among the Jews it was usual for women to be under the protection of men: "And in that day seven women shall take hold of one man, saying, We will eat our own bread, and wear our own apparel: only let us be called by thy name," let us be under your protection. Isa. iv. 1. Even "the strange women," Prov. vii. 5. were wont, though they had many lovers, yet to have some in particular, under whose protection and care they might be; who was to see that they were not wronged, and to make provision for them; and such a one they were wont to call their friend; and often these friends would so provide for them, as to give them good hopes of marrying them at length, if they would be reclaimed, and forsake all their other lovers. Arias Montanus refers us to the second Elegy of Propertius; respecting the charge and care of such a friend. The Grecians had a similar custom; they called him under whose protection they put themselves, ἰραϊσος, and the woman, ἰραϊσα. It is said of Plato, that he had one Archenassa, who was called Plato's ἰραϊσα. Here the Lord would have the prophet take an adulteress beloved of her friend, that is, one that was a common adulteress, and yet under the protection of some special friend; so that if he could supplant that friend, and in time reclaim the love and affection of this adulteress, he might marry her to himself. This is according to the love of God to his people, that is, as if God should say, This people is going a whoring, but I will be content to take them unto myself, I will be as their friend, and so protect them, and care for them, until there be some proof of their being reclaimed, and then I will marry this adulteress fully unto myself. For God is not now fully married to the Jews, neither will that marriage take place until the glorious time of their calling comes; but yet God is as a friend to them to this day, that is, God takes this people yet under his protection, though they seem to be in a rejected condition, and so gives hope, yea, makes many promises, that upon their return to him he will marry them unto himself; yea, there shall be a more glorious marriage between the Jews and the Lord Christ, than ever yet there was between him and any people on the face of the earth. This I think to be the very scope and meaning of the words, "beloved of her friend."

Somewhat suitable we have Deut. xxi. 12, 13; when one of the Jews took captive a woman, he might not forthwith marry her; but if he loved her, she was to continue a certain time, and undergo certain purifications, and then he might take her. The Jews are for the present as that captive woman, in bondage, yet God has a love for them unto this day; but so, that they must abide a while until God be married to them; they are beloved of God, but as yet with the love of a friend.

The Seventy read the words "beloved of her friend," "one that loveth evil things," a mistake easily arising from the Hebrew words, for friend, and evil, differ only in the points.

"Who look to other gods."

Their eyes are upon other gods. Where the heart is, there is the eye. Timor figit oculum, so amor; Fear fastens the eyes, and so does love. The workings of the soul appear as much in the eye as in any member; it well conveys emotions of love, of trust, and of confidence. They "look to other gods," that is, they have confidence in other gods. Looking up to a thing, in Scripture phrase, is to have some confidence in it. Psal. cxxi. 1, "I will lift up mine eyes unto the hills from whence cometh my help;" that is, I look for help, and confidently expect it. But how from the hills? What! does David's help come from them? Some think this to be the place where afterward the temple was built, and the same as was then the place of the sanctuary; but because that is usually in Scripture in the singular number, the hill of God, not the hills; therefore I find Calvin, Mollerus, and others, think that David here speaks of confidence in the creature, because he presently retracts in the second verse, "My help cometh from the Lord." As if he should say, I lift up mine eyes unto the creature for help, this is the frailty of my nature and of the nature of man, to look for auxiliary forces from Jerusalem (which was a hilly place); I look for forces to come from thence, but they come not; well, I will not trust any longer in them, Jehovah is my help. So they interpret it. But now I would rather free the prophet from vain confidence in the creature, and so the words may, if you read them thus, Do I lift up mine eyes unto the hills? do I expect help from the creature? God forbid I should, for "my help cometh from the Lord."

Further, sometimes the Hebrew ba is used for by and so might be translated "above the hills;" other men look to the hills, I look above the hills. But rather thus, "I lift up mine eyes to the hills," that is, I look to God; why? because the place where the temple was to be built was hilly; and so this expression refers to those two hills, or rather, two ridges of the same hill, on which it was built, Moriah and Zion: as 2 Chron. iii. 1, "Then Solomon began to build the house of the Lord at Jerusalem in mount Moriah;" and Psal. ii. 6, "Yet have I set my king upon my holy hill of Zion." I look, saith David, unto God, my faith has reference to the place which God has chosen for himself: that this is the meaning will appear if we compare this with Psal. lxxxvii. 1, "His foundation is in the holy mountains;" not mountain, but mountains. The respect idolaters had for their idols, being manifested by lifting up their eyes to them, therefore God commanded them not so much as to lift up their eyes to their idols, Ezek. xxiii. 27: and indeed, we had need take heed of so much as lifting up our eyes to look on the emblements of the flesh; many will not commit their former sins, but they love to be looking that way. I have read of a loving wife, who, being at the marriage of Cyrus, was asked how she liked the bridegroom? How? saith she; I know not, I saw no one but my husband. Love and respect draw the eye either to God or to the creature. According as our hearts are, so our eyes will be.

וַיִּשְׂאֵהוּ
"And love flagons of wine." The word comes from one which signifies fundavit, he has established. The Vulgate renders it, vivacia urarum, the leaves, skins, and stones of the grape that remain after pressing, and sink down into the bottom of the vessel; noting thereby, how sapless, tasteless, and degrading idolatrous worship is in comparison of the true worship of God. The true worship of God is sweet, and lovely, and excellent; but man's institutions, how unprofitable are they! The spirits of such as plead for and delight in superstitious vanities, the devices of men, how dead and vapid do they soon become! though heretofore they have had some life and energy, yet, if once they delight themselves in the inventions of men in God's worship, their spirits grow very unsavoury to those with whom they converse.

But take the translation as it is in your Bibles, "flagons of wine," called by this name in the Hebrew, because the flagon, broad at the bottom, stands securely; that is, (as some interpret it,) they are as drunkards that call for one flagon after another. Superstitious and idolatrous people, when they have one mode of superstition, call for another; and when they have got that, they will have another, and are still desirous of more, never satisfied, but, as drunkards, they still thirst after their flagons.

Or rather, to denote the sensuality of the forms of their idolatrous worship, their flagons of wine are joined to their gods. The Seventy translate the word πέμπη, bellaria, delicacies made of wine and grapes by every art they could devise in order to please the appetite. From thence this observation evidently arises:

Obs. Spiritual adultery and carnal sensuality go together. They used flagons of wine in their idolatrous solemnities, and that made them love their idols so much the more. In the true worship of God, there is abundance of sweetness to satisfy the hearts of the saints, they need not sensual pleasures to complete their happiness; but in superstitious worship there is none such, therefore they are fain to call for flagons of wine, and other sensual things, to make up a full delight to themselves. Superstitious and idolatrous rites bring with them pleasure to the flesh, and hence are they loved and followed; people can hardly ever be taken off from them. In their idolatrous solemnities, they were wont to have feasts to pamper the flesh. Judge.

ix. 27, "They went out into the fields, and gathered their vineyards, and trod the grapes, and made merry, and went into the house of their god, and did eat and drink, and cursed Abimelech." So Amos ii. 8, "They drink the wine of the condemned in the house of their god." What is that? By oppression and violence they would rend the estates of men from them, and then make merry, yea, come into the house of their gods, and drink bowls of wine which they had gotten from the possessions of those whom they had wrongfully condemned. Let idolaters have their lusts satisfied, and they care not what god they serve. 1 Cor. viii. 10, "If any see thee which hast knowledge sit at meat in the idol's temple;" "at meat," they had their flesh satisfied in the idol's temple. Thus God complains of his people here. As if he had said, Let all bemoan my condition, for though I have loved Israel dearly, she has gone a whoring from me, and loves flagons of wine; and because she has more pleasure to the flesh in serving idols, she will serve them. What an abominable thing is it to forsake the blessed God merely for the love of wine! How many are there in the world who forsake all that good which is in God, in Christ, in heaven, in eternity, merely for flagons of wine!

Calvin renders it flagons of grapes, so the words are in the Hebrew, not flagons of wine; and observes, of grapes rather than wine, because there were artificial means used by them to make their superstitions more grateful to them: as when drunkards have drunk even ad nauseam, and begin to loathe what they delighted in, then they will use some artificial mixture of grapes or something else with the wine, to give it a new flavour, that they may still delight themselves in drinking; so, (saith he,) because their old superstitions have nothing in them to satisfy the heart, therefore they invent new kinds to please themselves with; and although they boast of their antiquity, yet the truth is, they are devising new ceremonies every day, to give a fresh lustre and pomp to their worship, or else it would grow loathsome even to themselves. We have seen in our own experience, that the wantonness of men's hearts in superstitious ways is very great, they are ever inventing new devices to uphold their old moth-eaten vanities.

Ver. 2. So I bought her to me for fifteen pieces of silver, and for an homer of barley, and an half homer of barley:

The prophet obeys God in this other hard command. God many times sends his prophets on very irksome duties, yet they must be willing to serve the Lord in the hardest work. "So I bought her."

The word here translated "bought," signifies also to dig, and is taken (as some think) from the piercing of the servant's ear, who was to be a slave until the year of jubilee, to denote the slavish condition this people should be in for a long time.

It signifies also to cut, excidit, "he has cut asunder." These different significations may be reconciled by reference to the customs of the Jews, who in their bargainings were wont to cut a beast in sunder, and so to go between the two pieces; or because they joined their right hands together, and then another came and put his hand between theirs, (as a spade is put into the earth,) and so did, as it were, cut them asunder: thence arose the various acceptations in which the word was used.

"To me." This buying was in order to marrying, that she might be under his care for a while, and then come to be his wife. It was the custom of men in those days to buy their wives. Jacob served twice seven years for Rachel, and so bought her. David bought his wife for a hundred foreskins of the Philistines; and Christ purchased his church to himself at a dear rate, even by his own blood: but "I bought her" (saith he) "for fifteen pieces of silver."

מָכַר

Contraheutes dextas invicem datas ut rem ratam esse significarent, percussendo discindebant, sicut et in fœderibus bestia dissecabantur. Pagu.

There is a necessity for fully explaining these words, that you may not only see the meaning of this, but likewise better understand some other passages of Scripture.

"Fifteen pieces of silver." How much is that? Fifteen shekels; for it is a rule among the Hebrews, when a piece of silver, and not the sum, is named, always to understand a shekel; and when a shekel is set down, and the metal not expressed, there silver is understood. Now the common shekel was, according to some, of the weight of one hundred and sixty grains of barley; according to Jerome on Ezek. iv. it weighed half an ounce. Josephus saith its value was about four drachms; that is, about eighteen or twenty pence of our money; and so I find most consider it, though much difference exists among interpreters.

This was to signify the vile and base condition into which Israel had brought herself, for thirty shekels of silver was to be given for the price of a maid-servant. Exod. xxi. 32, "If the ox shall push a man-servant or a maid-servant, he shall give unto their master thirty shekels of silver." Thirty shekels must be given as a recompense for the loss of a slave; yet the prophet must buy this adulteress for half as much, fifteen shekels. Israel, all the ten tribes, yea, the whole people of the Jews, are signified by this adulteress, beloved of her friend. So that now Israel, who were heretofore the dearly beloved of God's soul, his only people on the face of the earth, the peculiar treasure of God, his portion, his inheritance; had now by their sin brought themselves into a meaner condition, and were worth but half as much as any poor bond-woman in Israel. This thirty pieces of silver was the goodly price Christ was valued at by the Jews, Zech. xi. 12; Matt. xxvii. 9. This showed how Christ was humbled, that he must be sold for no more than was the price of a slave. But the price of Israel is but fifteen pieces, half as much. Israel was proud in the day of her prosperity, but now she has brought herself by her sin into a meaner condition than a slave.

"And for an homer of barley, and an half homer of barley." What that homer of barley was, and what the Holy Ghost intends by mentioning it, must be inquired into. First, an homer contained ten ephahs, and an ephah is nearly as much as our bushel, so that this homer contained about ten of our bushels. In Ruth ii. 17, it is said, that when Ruth gleaned in the field after the reapers, she beat out that she had gleaned, and it was an ephah of barley. And by this you may know the meaning of Isa. v. 10, "The seed of an homer shall yield an ephah;" why an homer was ten bushels, how then should the seed of nearly ten bushels yield but one bushel? It was a threatening of a famine, that though they sowed much they should reap but little, they should sow ten bushels, and reap but one.

Some, however, interpret an homer to be about the burden that an ass was able to bear; for הֵמֶר in the Hebrew signifies an ass, and so the burden of that creature was called an homer; but Ezek. xlv. 11, tells us plainly that an ephah is the tenth part of an homer.

There is great difficulty in understanding this, if we compare it with Exod. xvi. 16, where it is said they were to gather of the manna "every man according to his eating, an homer for every man;" and ver. 36, "an homer is the tenth part of an ephah." This seems contradictory, here an ephah is the tenth part of an homer, and there an homer is the tenth part of an ephah. But those who understand Hebrew know that these words are written with different letters, though in our English the pronunciation is the same; that in Exodus with y and the other with h in English the former is Gnomer, the latter Chomer, and so they should be read. Now this homer of manna which God gave for each man daily, was almost the tenth part of a bushel, four or five times as much as the Roman dimensum or chaenix, the allowance given by them to their servants; noting thereby that God is exceedingly liberal to his people.

But why "an homer of barley?" Because it was a mean food, and in those times rather the food of beasts than of men; God promised to feed his people with the finest of the flour of wheat: therefore, Rev. vi. 6, "A measure of wheat for a penny, and three measures of barley for a penny." But what means this, that there must be an homer of barley, and a half homer of barley, given for this adulteress, whom the prophet was to take unto himself? The scope of all is, to signify the mean condition in which the ten tribes, and afterward all the Jews, should be, till Christ came to marry them to himself. First, they should be in a contemptible condition, they should be valued but at half the price of a slave. Secondly, they should be fed but meanly and basely, even as slaves, or rather as beasts; this homer and half of barley should be for their sustenance.

This not only referred to the time of their captivity before Christ, but to all their captivity ever since, and that which they shall endure until their calling. Their mean condition, in the time of their first captivity, you may see, Lam. iv. 5, "They that were brought up in scarlet, embraced the dunghills;" they either lay in filthy places, like beasts, or else they were employed in carrying dung up and down. And to this day, we know that, in the esteem of others, the Jews are the vilest people on the face of the earth. An historian tells us of an emperor travelling into Egypt, and there meeting with some Jews, by whose appearance he was so disgusted, that he cried out, O Marcomani, O Quadi, &c., at length I have met with men viler than such or such, reckoning up divers of the basest people on the face of the earth. And to this day the Turks will suffer no Jew to turn Mahometan, unless he first become a Christian: so much more they esteem the Christians, acknowledging that Jesus Christ, though not God, yet was a great prophet; but as for the Jews, they think them a dishonour to the Turkish religion. And we read that the Romans, when they conquered other nations, would permit the vanquished to call themselves Romans, except in the case of the Jews, though never so willing to conform themselves to their customs, and to be their servants; lest the glory of the Romans should be tarnished by that odious people. Thus we see what shame God has cast on that people even unto this day, that they are counted as the very off-scouring of all nations. Suetonius tells us, that in the exactions that the Romans require of people, they imposed on the Jews more than on any other people. Thus, history and our own experience prove the fulfilling of this scripture, which I am now opening to you: She shall be bought for fifteen pieces of silver, and fed with barley; she shall be in a very low, base, and mean condition, until Christ shall come and marry her to himself.

O Marcomani, O Quadi, O Sarmatæ, tandem alios volis detiores inveniri. Ammian. lib. 2.

Alios Romanos appellari permitterent, non Judæos, ne quid latius adhaerescerent nomini ab odioso ac sordido genere. August. in. l'anal. l'viii.

Suetonius in Domitiano, c. 12.

Hence we may

Obs. 1. A people who have been high in outward glory, when they depart from God, make themselves vile and contemptible. God casts contempt on wicked men, especially on the wicked who corrupt his worship. Do we not see it at this day? In Mal. ii. 9, it is threatened that the priests, who departed from the law, and corrupted their ways, should be base and contemptible before the people. Has not the Lord done thus at this day? Even those who, not long since, gave themselves the title of the triumphant clergy, and the triumphant church, and boasted as if they would out-face heaven itself, and scare all men with their high-commission court. But what shame has God cast on this generation! the people loathe them, and we hope in time the Lord will sweep away the proud and haughty of them as the refuse of the earth. Yea, our whole nation has been a proud nation; what vaunting has there been of what a glorious church we had! Never such a one on the earth! We sat as a queen amongst the nations, and have behaved ourselves haughtily, and God may justly cast contempt upon us. The Jews called themselves "The temple of the Lord," "The temple of the Lord;" but God has now made them the basest nation on the earth. And indeed God has now begun to cast much shame upon us. The time was when the kingdom of England was a terror to other people, but of late they have been the scorn and contempt of nations. "When Ephraim spake trembling, he exalted himself in Israel; but when he offended in Baal, he died;" he became as a dead, poor, vile, contemptible people, Hos. xiii. 1. The Lord loves to stain the pride of men. How many have you known who have been proud and lofty, and the Lord has cast shame and contempt in their faces! even before those whom they looked upon heretofore with contempt, have they now been humbled.

Obs. 2. Though a people be under contempt, yet God's heart may be towards them to do them good at the latter end. The love of God's election still is on this people; God remembers them, and yet intends good to them. Who knows what contempt God may cast upon us? Perhaps he may let our proud adversaries trample us under their feet; but we hope he will not, because he sees their hearts so proud. But if he should, we should not despair; we must not conclude that God has quite cast off England, though he should bring all his people under contempt, so as to be trampled under the foot of pride. And if there be any of you whom God has so depressed as to render you contemptible, humble yourselves before God, but do not despair, the Lord may yet have a love for you; though you are now under shame and contempt, who knows but that this was the only way that God had to bow your hearts? God puts his own people under contempt, and yet it is all from love to them, and with an intent to do them good at last.

Obs. 3. After many promises of God's mercy and of a glorious condition, which he intends for his people, he may yet hold a very hard hand over them for a great while; and this we should especially remember. God having promised so much mercy in the former chapter, Israel might quickly grow wanton, and say, Though we be vile and wicked, yet God will marry us to himself, and we shall be a glorious people; and why need we take care? Nay, saith God, stay, though my heart be toward you, yet this generation shall suffer, and the next generation, and the succeeding one, shall suffer hard things, you shall be brought into the very vilest condition; yet my promise shall be fulfilled at the last. Here we see what care God takes that people should not grow wanton with his mercy, and think, O we are in covenant with God, and God has pardoned our sins, what need we care? Take heed of growing wanton, thou mayst suffer fearful things in this world. Though God may save your souls, yet you may be brought into as woeful a condition in your own apprehensions as ever any creature was on the earth. And for England, though it is true we have as many proofs of the love of God to us as any nation ever had, yet who knows what this generation may suffer, that has so sullied itself with superstitious vanities? We may be brought into woeful slavery, and then God may raise up unto himself another generation, upon whom he will bestow the mercy intended.

Obs. 4. Those who will delight their flesh to the full in a sensual use of the creature, it is just with God they should be cut short, and made to live meanly and basely, made to feed on coarse fare. The Jews had their delicacies before, and fared deliciously; now they must be fed with barley, worse than their servants, and eat that which was meat for beasts. How many has God thus dealt with, who not long since had their tables furnished with the choicest fare, and are now, perhaps, glad of a barley loaf for themselves and their children!

Obs. 5. If God will not utterly destroy a people as he might, but reserve mercy for them at last, yet they have cause to bless God, though their subsistence for the present be most mean. Though there be a threatening here, yet it contains a promise. The people of Israel, had they known all, had no cause to murmur at God's dealing, but to wonder at his mercy, though they had but a little barley to sustain them. And suppose God should bring us, in England, into such a low condition as to be glad of a barley loaf; and we know famine commonly follows war, and God may bring that upon us in a manner far beyond what we or our forefathers ever knew; but yet if the Lord do not cast us off utterly from being his people, though he feed us with brown bread, though we have never so mean a subsistence for the present, we shall have cause to bless his name. It was wont to be a phrase, Brown bread and the gospel are good fare.

Obs. 6. It is the way of God to humble those to whom he intends good, to prepare them for mercy, by cutting them short of outward comforts. If any of you have lived full-handed, your wives, perhaps, brought you good portions, and now all is lost; you had good friends in the country, and many of them now are plundered in their estates; and you fare meanly, and if you have bread for your children think it well; but, consider this, Is not God now humbling me, and thereby preparing my heart for himself? Oh blessed be God for this my condition; this bread is sweeter to me than all the provisions of my former life. When you sit in your house with your wife and children, and have nothing but barley bread to feed on, have these thoughts; I hope God does this in love and mercy, he is making this my condition the best I was ever in, and the greatest blessing to me.

Ver. 3. And I said unto her, Thou shalt abide for me many days; thou shalt not play the harlot, and thou shalt not be for another man: so will I also be for thee.

You shall not only be in such a low condition as a slave, and worse than a maid-servant, and be fed with barley; but you shall abide thus, and that for "many days." Thus they have abode these sixteen hundred years since Christ's time, besides their former captivity. The Lord would fully prove Israel, that their hearts were thoroughly humbled, before he would take them to mercy again. Never did any people deal more falsely with God in their humiliations, than they formerly. How often when they were in misery did they come with their seeming repentance and cry for mercy, and God showed them mercy; and as soon as they were delivered, they fell off again and went after their idols; and then, being in misery again, they cried to God and he delivered them, and then presently they returned to their idols again! Well, saith God, I will not deal so with you hereafter, I will not trust you as I have done; you have been in misery, and I have delivered you when you have cried to me, and then you have returned to your sins; but now you shall be thoroughly humbled, you shall be many years in this low and mean condition, and then your hearts will be completely broken, so that, when you return to me again, you shall never backslide. God has dealt so with many of you; you have been in affliction, and he has delivered you, and you have returned to your sins; you have been in affliction again, and he has delivered you once more, and you have backslidden again; and thus you have trifled with the great God: God may bring a sore and long affliction on you, that you shall be so thoroughly humbled, that you shall never return to your sins again as you have done. This is the meaning of "abide many days." When we would thoroughly cleanse a filthy garment, we do not only wash it, but we lay it soaking a great while, and let the frosts of many a night fall upon it: the Jews have so lain many hundred years. The hardness of man's heart is such, that afflictions will not work immediately. Though many wedges be inserted, and many blows struck on knotty wood, it stirs not: some metals are long in melting, yea, though the fire be very fierce.

Obs. 1. When God promises mercy, it is his ordinary method to seem to go quite contrary to a people, to seem as if he would quite destroy them. I will marry myself unto them in loving-kindness and in mercies: but yet I will let this people be above sixteen hundred years in this forlorn condition. And so it has been in all God's administrations since the beginning of the world.

Obs. 2. When God comes to humble sinners, they must be content to be humbled God's own time; they must not impatiently exclaim, "Lord, how long?" I have been thus long in a sad condition; I have prayed thus long. Is your sadness and affliction eternal? O no, a year or two perhaps; yet you have deserved an eternity of misery.

"Thou shalt abide for me many days; thou shalt not play the harlot, and thou shalt not be for another man: so will I also be for thee." That is, All this time you must take care that you do not seek after other lovers; let me have experience that you will now worship the only true God, and I will promise to stay for you as you abide for me.

"Thou shalt not be for another man." The Hebrew phrase, "to be" to or "for another man" means, thou shalt not marry another. Ezek. xvi. 8, "I entered into a covenant with thee, saith the Lord God, and thou becamest mine." Fuisti mihi, thou wert to me, that is, thou wert married to me. Lev. xxi. 3, "A virgin which hath no husband:" quæ non fuit viro, a virgin that was not to another man. Hence we may profitably

Obs. 1. That husbands must be to their wives, and wives to their husbands; that is, live to them: whatever thou hast, any knowledge, any parts, any grace, it must be to thy wife, for the benefit of thy wife; and what the wife has must be to the husband.

Obs. 2. In the time of the sorest affliction and trouble we must take heed we forsake not God. "You shall abide for me many days." Though I use you hardly for a long time, yet you must not think to go and shift for yourselves any other way. In time of affliction, though trouble continue long, we must not seek to help ourselves by false comforts. We have an excellent text, Psal. xlv., which describes a most afflicted state of God's people. Ver. 11, "Thou hast scattered us amongst the heathen." Ver. 12, "Thou sellest thy people for nought." Ver. 13, "Thou makest us a reproach to our neighbours, a scorn and a derision to them that are round about us." Ver. 17, "All this is come upon us; yet have we not forgotten thee, neither have we dealt falsely in thy covenant." And, ver. 19, 20, "Though thou hast sore broken us in the place of dragons, and covered us with the shadow of death. If we have forgotten the name of our God, or stretched out our hands to a strange god." As if he should say, God forbid such a thing as this; though we be in the place of dragons, under reproach, and in great affliction, yet we have not lifted up our hands to another god. We must not say as king Jehoram, 2 Kings vi. 33, "What should I wait for the Lord any longer?" He seemed to be humbled, and put on sackcloth; but would not be contented to wait longer for the Lord. Men's spirits under affliction are prone to think, Why should I wait for God any longer? I will now seek to help myself in mine own way, to shift for myself. The Lord forbid that such thoughts should be in any of our hearts. Sedebis mihi, Thou shalt be quiet, though thou dost abide in this sad condition a long while. Isa. xxx. 7, "Their strength is to sit still." And, ver. 15, "In returning and rest shall ye be saved; in quietness and in confidence shall be your strength." Alas! thou art now afflicted; where wilt thou find help, poor soul? Wilt thou go to false gods, to thy former sinful lusts? that is not the way to help thee; thou must abide until God's time come to show mercy to thee. The heart of man is strongly set upon good, and cannot be content to stay God's time; but if God subdue thy heart so far as to render it content to abide, though never so long, for God, and that it will not try to relieve itself by any unlawful means, this is a good sign that there is much love in reserve for thee. It is a proof of a strong affection in a woman, when there occur things that hinder the match between her lover and herself; Well, saith she, though there be some obstacles, and you make many objections, I will never marry as long as I live, except I may have him: this argues fervour and strength of affection. So here, I will marry you unto myself, saith God, and many things are to be done before that day, but then, after you have stayed my time, I will come to you in a glorious manner. As God deals with the Jews, so often in his marrying himself to a particular soul.

Obs. 3. God not only commands them to do it, but it is a promise and a prophecy that they shall do it. "Thou shalt abide," &c. But you will say, How have the people of the Jews abode for God? Thus; they have never to this day chosen any other god, and though they have not received the Messiah, yet ever since the captivity they have hated idolatry, and that was the thing God specially meant in this; Thou shalt not have any more idols, thou shalt choose no other god, no other husband; though thou hast been very wicked and sinful in this way, and formerly chosest all manner of gods, the gods of the Amorites, and Moabites, and of all the heathens round about you, yet now thou shalt choose no other gods but me. Thus to this day the Jews have acknowledged Jehovah to be the only true God, and cannot endure images. There is a remarkable passage relating to this in Eusebius's Antiquities, cap. 18. When Caius Caligula sent one Petronius to set up an image in the temple of Jerusalem, many of the Jews pleaded with Petronius, saying, Sir, what is it that you do? we beseech you do it not, deprive us of our lives first; for it is impossible, while we live, to submit to this, we will all die first. But, replied he, it is the command of the emperor; opposition is vain, it must be done. They answered, Seeing you will not transgress Caesar's command, neither will we violate the command of our God; we are not so faint-hearted, nor have we such a vain desire for the continuance of our lives, as to enjoy them at the risk of that eternal life, which is proposed for the keeping of God's commands. Such was their spirit then, and to this day they will not endure idols; and their being scattered here and there among papists, and seeing so much idolatry among them, they are thereby stumbled at Christianity, and their conversion greatly prevented; but if God would once pull down popery, certainly the Jews would quickly come in. God now seems about to do it, therefore all of us should assist as far as we can to demolish all monuments of idolatry, to make the worship of God more pure, and this will be a means to bring about the conversion of the Jews, and in this respect they have abode for God all this while: such I conceive to be the meaning of the text.

“So will I also be for thee.” What is the meaning of that? First, though you shall be long in captivity, saith God, and in a low condition, he content, do not take any other god as your husband; I will be content, I will stay, I will have no other people upon the earth but you, all the time you are in captivity.

But how does God abide for Israel now? God has chosen the Gentiles, how then does he stay for them?

First, All the Gentiles who are called come in to God, as being joined to the people of the Jews; God honoured the Jews so far, as that all the Gentiles who come in are to be made the Israel of God.

But rather thus, God abides for the people of the Jews to this day, in this sense, God never has taken, nor ever will take, to himself any nation upon the earth to be a national church, as the Jews were, and as it is probable the Jews shall be at their conversion: though God takes the converted Gentiles by their several congregations to be churches, yet to marry himself to a whole nation, as he did to the Jews, that is, if a man be born of that nation it shall be sufficient to make him a member of the church, this God never did since the Jews' rejection, and never will till the Jews be called again. God chooses kingdoms now, and so, in some figurative sense, a nation perhaps may be called a church; but to speak properly and strictly, there is no such national church as the Jews were. But then God will be married to that nation in a more glorious manner than ever; and God abides to this day for the glory which he intends for Jesus Christ, until they come in. And this I take to be a great reason why God, for the present, suffers his churches to be persecuted as they are. The church, ever since Christ's time, has been in a low and persecuted condition; the wicked have prevailed. What is the reason? God abides for this people of the Jews, and he is pleased himself to undergo many sufferings; and seems to say, In the mean time do you abide for me. I will be content to suffer much dishonour myself: many shall come in to Christ; but yet they shall be a poor, contemptible people, the wicked of the world shall prevail against them, shall scorn them, shall contemn them, so that I shall not appear to the world to be their husband, until you be called again: but when you shall return to me, then I will manifest myself indeed; you shall be a most glorious church, and there shall be such a full marriage between us, that all the world shall acknowledge it, and shall say, Come, behold the bride, the Lamb's wife. This is the scope of this scripture.

Obs. 1. Husbands should not require of their wives any thing but what they will answerably do for them. God doth so here; “Abide for me,” saith he, “and I will abide for you;” there shall be par pari, like for like. Many husbands will require hard things from their wives, but will do little themselves; and, on the other side, wives expect great things from their husbands, but do little themselves. There must be a proportion between what they expect from each other, and what they do to or for each other.

Obs. 2. In our sad condition God suffers as well as we. This may help us in our sufferings, to think, though we suffer much, God suffers as much as we. The people of the Jews, if they had hearts, might see now that God stays for his honour till they come in. So in all the persecutions of the church, does not Christ suffer, because the great work of reformation does not advance? If we are grieved, the Spirit of God is grieved as well as we, and suffers as much as we; God, as it were, abides for us, and stays for his glory. We desire that God would come and manifest himself, then we might be happy and rejoice; but so long as God stays our happiness, he stays his own glory. What abundance of glory does God lose in those praises he would have if the reformation were immediately perfected! but God has other ends, and is content to stay for his praises. Let us be content to stay for what we desire to have; it concerns God to hasten the work as much, yea, far more than it concerns us to desire it; we suffer something for want of it, but God suffers more.

Obs. 3. That soul which endures hardship a long time for God, and resolves to reserve itself for him, so that if it cannot have comfort in God it will have none elsewhere, may assure itself that God reserves himself for it. Certainly, nothing shall take off the heart of God from that soul, but there will be a blessed marriage between it and him. Is there ever a poor creature here with whom God seems to deal hardly, yet finds in himself this frame of spirit, Well, though God seem to leave me, and I am thus desolate, yet if I can have no comfort here, I will have none elsewhere; I will be content to wait; no creature shall have my heart. It is true, I am not able to guide myself, but I am resolved Satan shall never guide me; I am not able to do the will of God, but I will never do the will of the devil: and if God should leave me never so long, nay, leave me eternally, I will never have any other husband, I will rather die a widow; if he do not marry himself to me, I will be without comfort as long as I live. Is thy heart in this frame? Peace be unto thee; certainly God intends thoughts of mercy to thy soul; there will certainly be a marriage between God and it. And wheresoever this frame of heart is, oh how will it help against temptation! When a soul is in distress, and God seems to go off farther and farther, it exclaims, I have prayed long, and yet God seems not to hear, and afflictions prevail. We may ask, Why do you pray any more? why do you come and hear any more? if God will never come, you might as well take your pleasure for a while, you can but perish at the last. But when the heart answers, It is true, the Lord indeed seems to be gone, and I have cause to fear lest he should reject me; but, become of me what will, yet I will never have any other husband but God, never any other comfort but God's comfort, no other peace but the peace of God, and I am resolved that, if I perish, I will perish crying for it. In this frame thou art waiting for God, and God is waiting for thee in ways of mercy; and at length the bowels of God's mercy will yearn towards thee, as the bowels of Joseph yearned towards his brethren. For a long time Joseph used his brethren roughly, but they behaved themselves humbly and submissively towards him, and at length he could not refrain: so God may be using thee somewhat hardly for a while, yet keep thou in a humble and submissive frame of spirit towards him, do that which becometh a creature to do, whatever God does to thee; say, It is fit God should exercise his absolute power over me, and that I should do my duty to him: do this, and be sure thou art a soul that God will marry to himself in the end.

Obs. 4. So far as we are willing to be for God, God is willing to be for us. God requires that you should seek him with your whole heart, Jer. xxxii. 13. Mark how God answers, “I will rejoice over them to do them good, and I will plant them in this land assuredly with my whole heart and with my whole soul.” Jer. xxxii. 41. Will you seek God with your whole heart? I will do you good, saith God, with my whole heart. If all the faculties of your souls work toward God, all the attributes in God shall work for your good. If thy estate be wholly given up for God, God's riches shall be wholly for thee. Wouldst thou know how God's heart works towards thee? lay thy hand upon thine own heart; according to the beatings of thy heart towards God, so are the workings of the heart of God towards thee : thou mayst determine it thus ; thou canst not go up to heaven to know it, but go into thine own heart, and there thou mayst know : as a man may discover by the working of an engine within, what its operations are abroad. That is the reason why the saints, when they have had their hearts enlarged in prayer, have resolved what God will do for them, or for his church : as it is said of Luther, when he had been one time more than ordinarily earnest with God in prayer, he came to his friends and said, Well, it shall go well with Germany all my days ; look ye to it afterward. He knew what was decreed in heaven, by what took place in his own heart. We may know in a great measure what God means to do with his church, according to the inward beatings of our own hearts.

Obs. 5. See the happy advantage of the saints, beyond the men of the world, thus : Be you for me, saith God, and I will be for you. The men of the world can say, I am for the world, and the world is for me ; I am for my honour, and my honour is for me ; this is all their happiness : but now a saint can say, I am for God, and God is for me.

Oh the goodness of God towards us, that he is willing to be for us as we are for him ! For him ! alas, what can we be for him ? we are poor worms, vile creatures in ourselves, what can we do ? he has no need of us, we are bound to do all that we do. It is as if a king should come to a poor beggar, and say, Poor man, thou hast but little, yet do what you can for me, I will do what I can for you. This were a mighty disproportion. Alas, what can the beggar do for the king ? If you will but use your staff or what you have for me, I will use my riches, and glory, and all for your good, saith the king to the beggar. So saith God to a poor creature, Be you for me, and I will be for you ; stand for me, and I will stand for you ; use any thing you have for me, and I will use what I have for you. Oh the blessed condition of the saints ! Who would not be for God ? Do not now say, Alas ! I am a poor, vile, and unworthy creature ; so were the Jews : do not say, I have gone a whoring from God, and dealt falsely with him ; the Jews did so : Yet, saith God, whenever you will be for me, I will be for you. It is now the great question amongst us, Who are you for ? I will put the question to you all, Who are you for ? Are your hearts wholly given up to God, or are you for your lusts, for the creature ? Certainly the creature will deceive you ere long, and bring you no good : if you be not for God now, he will send you to the creature in the time of your distress. There is a time coming that every one of us shall see the need we have that God be for us ; let us be for God now, that God may be for us then. When we cry to him, and say, O Lord, let thy mercy and goodness be for us ; he will say, Who were you for ? You were for your lusts, now go to your lusts ; you would have none of me before, I will have none of you now. " You would none of my reproof : I also will laugh at your ealamity ; I will mock when your fear cometh," Prov. i. 25, 26. Mark, they would have none of God's reproof : he does not say, They would have none of my mercy, they would have none of my grace, therefore I will laugh at their destruction ; but they would have none of my reproof. Why ? The reproofs of God are the bitterest and hardest things ; yet, because they would have none of God's reproofs, he laughs at their destruction. What shall become of them then, who will now have none of the riches of God's grace offered to them in Christ ?

Ver. 4, 5. For the children of Israel shall abide many days without a king, and without a prince, and without a sacrifice, and without an image, and without an ephod, and without teraphim : afterward shall the children of Israel return, and seek the Lord their God.

Here is much privation, six "withouts :"
 1. "Without a king ;"
 2. "Without a prince ;"
 3. "Without a sacrifice ;"
 4. "Without an image ;"
 5. "Without an ephod ;"
 6. "Without a teraphim ;" but the last verse makes up for all ; "They shall return, and seek the Lord their God, and David their king." These "withouts" show the woefully confused estate that Israel was to be in for "many days," many years, both in regard of their civil and of their church estate. The civil state, "without a king, without a prince." Their church, without the four things which succeed. Though once they were the happiest people on the face of the earth in both respects, yet now they shall be most miserable. This they had brought on themselves, by setting up their idols in Dan and Bethel ; Dan, the place of judgment ; Bethel, the house of God ; there was abundance of corruption both in places of judgment, and in the house of God ; and now there comes on them abundance of confusion both in their civil and in their church estate. They received their laws, as well for civil as for church government, from God himself out of heaven, which no other people ever did ; but they leave God's institutions, and so are brought into all confusion.

They shall be "without a king."

How "without a king ?" When they were in captivity, they yet were under a king, the kings of Babylon and Assyria ; and they are still, in their dispersion, under the government of kings and princes. I answer, they have kings over them, but not of their own nation ; and that is the judgment : neither are they governed by their own, or rather by God's, laws : and for them to be in slavery under kings, is to them as bad, yea, worse, than to have no king at all. How sad a condition, for a people to be without a king to protect them, and to maintain their laws, privileges, and liberties !

When men reject God from ruling over them, it is just with God to put them under the rule of tyrants, of oppressors, of destroyers, and public enemies to their state. The blessing of government is very great, if just ; and therefore the Persians were wont, on the death of their king, to let all the people be for five days without any government at all, that, seeing the inconvenience and mischief resulting, they might the more willingly submit to government, and be more obedient when under it.

It is a question among politicians, whether tyranny or anarchy, tyrannical government or no government at all, be preferable. Though tyranny (unless carried to a great extreme) may be better than anarchy, yet certainly it is not better than to reduce power under good regulations, though that be attended with some trouble. The Power which first raises power, designs such persons and families to hold it, and puts limit to it, surely cannot be unable to regulate it that it should not prove its own destruction.

But here they were not only to be "without a king," but "without a prince" also. The word נָשִׂיךְ translated "prince," signifies a ruler, judge, or governor, and so I find it often used in Scripture. "All these were the rulers," the princes, "of the substance," 1 Chron. xxvii. 31. And Neh. iii. 9, "The ruler," the prince, "of the half part of Jerusalem." So that by "prince" here is meant judges, or any kind of rulers ; they shall be "without a prince," that is, without any judges or rulers. Though they had no kings, yet if the government had been in the hands of eminent men, judges over them, their condition had not been so sad. No long time had elapsed since their happiness consisted not in being governed by kings ; they were in a flourishing condition before they had any, and when first they came under their government it was from their own choice. God pressed they had rejected him, and sent them their first king in his wrath. Therefore their misery certainly did not depend wholly on being without a king. If God restrain not kings, they often desire to encroach on those liberties which the laws of the land, the light of nature, and God himself, give to subjects.

Plutarch in Vit.
Pyrrhi.

Plutarch tells us, that, on Pyrrhus coming to Athens, the Athenians, to show their respect and do him honour, admitted him, contrary to their custom with strangers, into their citadel, to sacrifice there to Minerva. When he came out, he told them that he was much indebted to them for that great favour, and in requital would give them this advice: Take heed that you never let a king again enter this place; intimating how easily they may be persuaded to intrinch on the liberties of those who come under their power.

And this should "abide for many days." It did abide for 700 years and upward before Christ. From the sixth of Hezekiah to Christ, the ten tribes never were under any governor of their own in all that time; and since Christ's time neither Judah nor Israel have had either king or prince of their own. Oh what a blindness is there upon this people! how dreadful is that darkness in which they now are; that, notwithstanding the prophecy was so clear, that "the sceptre should not depart from Judah until Shiloh came," and they have now been without a prince these 1600 years, yet they will not believe that Shiloh is come! Thus, when God gives men over to blindness and hardness, the clearest declarations will not be believed.

But their confusion in their church estate is more grievous than their civil; they shall "be without a sacrifice, and without an image, and without an ephod, and without teraphim." Two of these four express their being deprived of God's own ordinances, and the other two, of their being deprived of their false worship. They made a mixture in worship, and would have their sacrifice and their ephod, but, together with them, their image and their teraphim.

Obs. 1. Man's perverseness leads him to introduce mixtures into God's worship, he will retain something of that which is God's, but will also bring in something of his own, and that spoils all. An emperor of Rome, in one temple would have Christ and Orpheus worshipped both together. And of those who were sent into Samaria by the king of Babylon we read, 2 Kings xvii. 33, "They feared the Lord, and served their own gods;" but, ver. 34, it is said, "they fear not the Lord;" that is, though they acknowledged the true God, yet they would mix the worship of idols with his worship, and so God rejected all; "they did not fear the Lord" at all. It is no fear of God except we fear him only; it is no acceptable worship of God unless we worship him only. The heathens are content with mixture in their worship; you may worship one god, and join with it the worship of another, because there is not one of them who challenges to himself to be the universal good; but our God being the universal good, must be worshipped alone, without mixture.

There are two things in which we must take heed of mixture: the one is in Divine worship; the other is in that great point of justification. It is as much as our lives are worth to introduce foreign matter into either of these, we must in them both adhere to the rule laid down closely and strictly. These people had both, and God threatens they should be without both; seeing they would not confine themselves wholly to his institutions, they should have none at all; neither God's institutions nor their own.

We this day much resemble Israel. With respect to our civil state, much confusion is in that, though not altogether so much as was in theirs. And our church estate is very similar: we have neither the right way of worship, nor the false, in respect to the government of the church; the false is cast away and professed against, and yet we have not the true; only here is the mercy of God, that we are inquiring after the true, and "seeking the Lord, and David our king." The Lord gives us hearts to inquire to purpose.

The Septuagint translate these four words, זבחה ותרפים אפוד ופסולת ארזים by terms expressing true worship only; and therefore they render זבחה by θυσιαστήριον, an altar; and תרפים by ιερατείας, priesthood; and אפוד by εἰλωτισμός, or εἰλωτις, manifestations, a word used for the Urim and Thummim. But the Hebrew means, "Sacrifice, image, ephod, and teraphim," as expressed in your books.

First, then, to inquire into that which was the right and true worship, "sacrifice and ephod," and in what it consisted; and then into the other, "image and teraphim."

"Sacrifice." They should have no sacrifice at all, for since their temple was destroyed it was impossible they could. Hence it is that they pray with that mighty fervency of spirit, that God would build the temple again, "Lord, build, build, build thy temple in our days, in our days, in our days," &c.; because they knew they could have no sacrifice so long as their temple was in ruins. This was their sad condition, and to this day they have not the legal sacrifices, nor that which was typified by them. There were these three things in their sacrifices:

1. Their dedicating of themselves to God, showing their respect to him in the way he required, in their burnt-offering.
2. Seeking the expiation of sin, in their sin-offering.
3. Seeking for mercy, and rendering thanks, in their peace-offering.

Now to have no sacrifice in any of these three kinds, that is, to have nothing to offer up to the high and blessed God to show our respect to him; to have no means to expiate our sins when we have offended him; to have no way to seek to God for mercy in our necessities, nor to return praise; this must needs be a sad condition: this is the present state of the Jews. We have Christ, who is to us all these. Presenting him to God, is showing the greatest possible respect to God; presenting him is the expiation for our sins, the seeking of whatever blessing we desire, and our eucharistical sacrifice too for all our mercies. But those who are without Christ, are to this day without sacrifice, they have nothing to present to God. If thou wilt offer up thine estate, thy body, thy liberty, or thy name, this is no sacrifice acceptable to God; except thou hast Christ to present it to him, and canst offer all in him and through him, then indeed God graciously accepts. When thou hast sinned, what sacrifice wilt thou offer to God to expiate thy sin? all thy prayers, thy tears are nothing, unless accompanied with this sacrifice, Jesus Christ; in him, indeed, a contrite heart is an offering very acceptable to God. But so long as thou art without Christ, the judgment of the Jews is upon thee, thou art without a sacrifice.

"And without an ephod."

By this he means, first, that they should be without the priesthood. They should not have any church officers. And, secondly, they should have no means to know the mind of God. That this is the scope, appears thus:

First, That by the "ephod" is meant the priests, is evident from that expression, 1 Sam. xxii. 18, where it is said that Doeg "slew on that day fourscore and five persons that did wear a linen ephod;" that is, fourscore and five priests.

Secondly, Without the means of knowing God's mind, for the Urim and the Thummim were on the breastplate that was fastened upon the ephod; so that when they were without the ephod, they must needs be without their breastplate, for it was attached to the ephod, and could not be used for discovering the will of God, but only by applying it to the ephod. 1 Sam. xxx. 7, 8, "David said to Abiathar the priest, Ahimelech's son, I pray thee, bring me hither the ephod. And David inquired at the Lord, saying, Shall I pursue after this troop?" It was by the presence of the ephod that he inquired what God wished him to do in the matter, whether he should follow the troop, or not. And the 6th verse is very observable: you may see when it was that David was so anxious to make use of the ephod, to know of God what he should do. He was in an exceedingly distressed condition, for Ziklag, his own city, of which he had the charge, was burnt; and the men were all "grieved in soul," and talked of stoning him, because the Amalekites had come in his absence and taken away their goods, their wives and children, and burnt the town. If the acts of men in public places turn out unsuccessfully, the people are ready to fall in a rage upon them; this renders their condition very dangerous and troublesome, and should lead us to pray much for them. We are ready to envy those above us, who are employed in public services; but considering their danger, and how far the blame of every thing that falls out otherwise than we desire, is forthwith laid upon them, their condition is not so happy as we imagine. In this state was David, nay, in a worse, for the text saith that he and the men that were with him "lifted up their voice and wept, until they had no more power to weep," their hearts were so broken; yet in this sad and grievous condition "David encouraged himself in the Lord his God," and called for the ephod, to inquire of God what he should do. You observe, that this is the first time we read that David in his battles called for the ephod: when he went to Achish, he did not inquire; when he invaded the Geshurites and Amalekites before, he did not inquire; but now, when he was brought into straits, when his heart was broken, when he was in a weeping condition, he called for the ephod. When God brings men into straits and humbles them, then they will inquire of God with purpose of heart. We are now about to inquire of God, to know his mind; but we are not humbled enough, our straits have not broken our hearts, and perhaps we shall not so readily know God's mind; God may yet humble us more; and then we will come to inquire God's mind more effectually.

But to open this garment a little. The word "ephod," signifies, to close in, or gird about, because of the fitting of the garment to the priests, and the girding of it about them. There were various sorts of ephods; one peculiar to the high priest, which you have Exod. xxviii. 6. Others which the ordinary priests wore, and that you have in the place before referred to, about the fourscore and five priests slain by Doeg. A third was common to the Levites; thus Samuel, 1 Sam. ii. 18, "ministered before the Lord, being a child, girded with a linen ephod." A fourth, worn by others in their holy actions, especially by kings; "David danced before the Lord with all his might; and David was girded with a linen ephod," 2 Sam. vi. 14. And to this day the Jews have a kind of linen garment, but not like our ephod, yet with some resemblance to it, which they wear upon their heads, and suffer to hang down. When Alexander came to Jerusalem, Jaddus the high priest, arrayed in all his priestly garments, met him; which caused him, out of reverence, to fall down and prostrate himself before him. Josephus tells us, that the people likewise came with white garments, garments that had some kind of resemblance to this ephod; and adds, that the ephod was a garment a cubit in length, covering only the shoulders and the breast, open above and on either side, and girt around the chest. Others make it a long robe reaching down to the very feet. But the ephod was worn also over another robe: so Christ appeared to John, Rev. i. 13, "clothed with a garment down to the foot, and girt about the paps with a golden girdle," like the priests, for so they were wont to be arrayed; and Rev. xv. 6, the ministers of the churches, called by the name of "angels," are described as "clothed in pure and white linen, having their breasts girded with golden girdles;" not girt about their loins, but about their breasts, near their hearts. That which makes ministers of the gospel ready prepared for their work, is the girdle of truth, and this must be about their hearts; if their own devices and selfish aims gird them, that is, incite them to do what may advance their own interest, this is not the golden girdle, but like that rotten girdle of Jeremiah's, that "was profitable for nothing," chap. xiii. 7.

This ephod then was a holy garment, and others must beware of meddling with such, or of seeking to imitate them. When God had given Gideon a great victory over the Midianites, he imitated this ephod; and of the spoil he took from the Midianites, he made a rich and a glorious ephod; but the text observes, that thing proved to be "the destruction of Gideon's house," for "the people went a whoring after it:" he made it with a good intention, to testify his thankfulness to God for his victory, not thinking that it would be ever worshipped. It is dangerous for governors to imitate God's ordinances in garments or the like, and to preserve them amongst people; though with never so good an intention, that will not excuse them. Gideon's presumption in making an ephod, in imitation of the ephod appointed by God, proved to be the destruction of his house; yet this was that Gideon who a little before had destroyed the altar of Baal, and though then so much against idolatry, yet now he does that which promotes it. So may governors, if they take not heed, pull down one kind of false worship and set up another.

The Jews have many mysteries about this garment, it would weary you to hear them. I shall only observe, as most useful for you, that we must not read the books of the Old Testament as if they concerned us not. First, upon the shoulders of the ephod were set ranks of precious stones, with the names of the twelve tribes, according to their generations, engraven on them. And in the middle of the ephod, upon the breastplate, which was to be four-square, there were four rows of precious stones, and upon them likewise were engraven all the names of the tribes of Israel; and he bore them upon his heart. There is much to be observed in this.

Obs. 1. Let the tribes be never so mean in themselves, yet, upon the ephod, they were precious stones. The priest wearing the ephod was a type of Christ: let the godly be never so mean in themselves, yet, in Christ, God looks upon them as precious stones.

Obs. 2. These precious stones, that were upon the shoulders of the ephod, are called "a memorial," Exod. xxviii. 12. First, to signify Christ bearing the names of all the saints before his Father for a memorial, those twelve tribes representing all the churches that should be unto the end of the world. When God remembers his church, it is through Christ. God never remembers his church, but by Christ's carrying it before him: and that is the comfort of the saints; he therefore can never remember them to revenge himself upon them, for he never thinks of them but only as Christ presents them unto him.

Secondly, a memorial, (say the Jews,) not only because the priests were to bear the names of the twelve tribes, engraven in those stones, for a memorial before the Lord, but to signify that the priests themselves were to remember to pray for the tribes.

And thirdly, a memorial, to signify that both the priests and all the people were to remember their godly ancestors and predecessors, and to follow their virtues, and not in any wise to dishonour them.

But the first is the chief. These precious stones with the names of the tribes, were first upon the shoulder, and then upon the heart; upon the shoulder; this notes that Christ carries his church upon his shoulder, bears its burden, all their weight, all their afflictions. The shoulder of Christ stands under the churches, certainly therefore they shall never sink.

But may they not be so burdensome to Christ as to induce him to shake them off? No, Christ carries the memorial of his churches at his heart as well as upon his shoulders, and that makes Christ labour strenuously for the good of the churches. There is an infinite comfort in the spiritual meaning of this ephod, that belongs to all the golly; Christ night and day has thee upon his shoulder, and upon his heart, as a precious stone before God the Father. One thing further is observable about it. In Exod. xxviii. 12, the names of the twelve tribes were to be engraven on these stones in order, according to their birth: now in Rev. xxi. the twelve apostles, who in regard of their doctrine are made the twelve precious stones of the foundation of the new Jerusalem, are all the very same precious stones by name, excepting four, and these four I find interpreters think to be the same as the others, only under different names; for precious stones, either in regard of the places where they are found, or their quality or colour, bear various names; so that it is very probable that the stones in the Revelation were the same with those in Exodus: but there we do not find that they are set according to any dignity in one apostle above another, as there was in the setting of the names of the tribes; for the first precious stone to be laid of the foundation of the new Jerusalem, of the glorious church that should be, is the stone of Benjamin, who was the youngest; and if there might be any mystery in it, we may think it signifies thus much, at least we may thus adapt it by way of allusion, that the Lord will make use of the young ones of this generation, to open the way for the new Jerusalem, before any of the other tribes; God will cull out them to be the first stone of the foundation of that glorious church. In that we find there was not such order observed among the apostles as among the tribes, we are taught that Christ would not have us regard the apostles as superior one to another, and therefore you find they are never named in one unvarying order; in one evangelist they are set down in one order, and in another in another, as Matt. x.; Mark iii.; Luke ix.; so Acts i.; noting thereby, that there is no superiority nor inferiority in the ministers of the gospel.

Upon the ephod there were likewise the Urim and Thummim. It is very hard to tell the true signification of these; men have differed so much about it, that it would be tiresome even to enumerate their various opinions. Augustine, in his 117th question upon Exod., saith, it is hard to discover what this Urim and Thummim was; and Cajetan declares, that none yet have ever explained it; and they add, that even the Rabbins themselves say, the Jews were very ignorant on this point. But most probably one of these two, especially the

Fatentur Rabbini
samsam esse apud Hebræos harum re-rum ignorantiam.

latter. Some think that they were stones set in the breastplate, which by their brightness or darkness gave an answer to what they demanded of God; that is, when the high priest went to inquire of God what was to be done in any great and public affairs, he presented this breastplate with these stones before the Lord, and if God would give an affirmative answer, the stones gave a more than ordinary brightness and lustre; but if a negative, then the stones were darker than before. But we are not certain of this, and may rather conclude, on the other hand, that the Urim and Thummim (though we know not what matter they were made of, no more than we know what manna was made of) were somewhat that God gave Moses to put into the breast-plate, which by him was appointed as an ordinance, and to be presented before the Lord by the priest when they would know the mind of God; and when this was presented, God usually gave an answer to the priest, either by an audible voice, or by secret inspiration: yet not always obliging himself to answer thus, for we find that sometimes God did not reply when sought to by Urim and Thummim, as when Saul thus inquired of God no answer was returned. And it seems likely Josiah would not have sent only to Huldah the prophetess, if he might have had an answer by Urim and Thummim; but the answer depended on the pleasure of the Lord.

The words Urim and Thummim signify "lights and perfections;" some would make them to signify the knowledge and integrity of life that should be in ministers; but I rather think the meaning is, that they were bright, precious stones, perfected and fitted to do that for which God appointed them. The Septuagint calls them λόγια, the oracle. Hence, 1 Pet. iv. 11, "If any man speak, let him speak ὡς λόγια, as the oracles of God."

Now this must be on the breastplate of the priest, which the priest using, the people thereby came to know the mind of God. This was to signify that we must look for the mind of God by Christ. It is Christ who is come from the Father to reveal his counsels to us, and if we expect a revelation of the will of God in any other way than through him, we are mistaken. And further, this Urim and Thummim, this breastplate of judgment, was to be on the heart of the high priest, and that when he went in before the Lord, Exod. xxviii. 30.

Obs. 1. The answer that any minister of God in the name of Christ should give his people, should be an answer from his very heart, he must speak nothing but what it dictates; when he would answer any case of conscience, or make known any thing of the mind of God, his answer must proceed from his heart.

Obs. 2. It must be as in the presence of the Lord, as before God; he must consider in whose place he stands, to answer as from God through the great Prophet of the church.

To be threatened with the deprivation of the Urim and Thummim, seeing it was of so much use to them, is a great judgment. And this should be for "many days." Josephus saith, that they were without this two hundred years before he wrote his Antiquities, that was a hundred and five years before Christ; but it appears that they had no Urim and Thummim long before that time, for at their return from captivity, Ezra ii. 63, "the Turshatha," that is, the ruler, "said unto them, that they should not eat of the most holy things till there stood up a priest with Urim and with Thummim;" therefore they had not then a priest with Urim and Thummim, but expected to have one; whether that hope was realized afterwards is not known. This was the reason of that grievous complaint of Asaph, Psal. lxxiv. 9, "We see not our signs, there is no more any prophet, neither is there any among us that knoweth how long." Now it is probable that Psalm was made about the very time of their return from captivity, for in Ezra ii. 41, Asaph is named among those that came to Jerusalem from the captivity; "The singers, the children of Asaph, an hundred twenty and eight." But let it be then or afterwards, by this Psalm we may find that it was very lamentable to be without Urim and Thummim.

Obs. 3. The result of all is, that it is a grievous thing to the saints, when in the time of their straits they know not God's mind. When God at any time brings his people into straits, yet if they can discover the mind of their God, they are refreshed and encouraged; but when they shall seek to know God's mind, and the Lord refuses to declare it to them, this is a sad condition indeed.

About their being without an ephod—Jerome observes, That the hardness of the hearts of the Jews is very remarkable: that they should be so many hundred years without sacrifice and without ephod, without the true worship of God among them, or means to know his mind; and yet not guilty of any greater sin than the sin of idolatry, except it be the killing of Jesus Christ; is it not surprising that they do not reason thus, What sin is it that thus provokes God against us more than ever? Surely there is some greater sin than we have ever yet committed.* But, saith he, they can never find any offence, except the killing of Christ, to be a greater offence than idolatry, and yet they have a heavier judgment on them than ever they had, though they are not guilty of that sin as formerly. Surely, were they not extremely hardened, they would be convinced that all this is because of their rejecting and crucifying Christ the Son of God.

As they had the ordinances of God, so they had ways of false worship of their own, images and teraphim. I must show you what those were, and then how it is a threatening that they should be without them.

“Without an image,” seems to refer to the two calves they had set up in Dan and Bethel, in which they so much gloried; they should be taken away.

“Teraphim;” that likewise should be taken away. Now if you ask what this teraphim was? in the general, Teraph is a divining image: as the ephod was God’s ordinance by which to know the mind of God; so the teraphim was an invention of Satan to foretell things that were to come.† The teraphim was the image of the head of a man wrung off his body, perfumed by precious spices. Upon this head was a plate of gold with the name of that spirit by whom they would divine, or, (as some,) put under the tongue of this head; and this being set up upon a wall, burning candles and incense were offered to it, under some constellation:‡ thus they inquired concerning something that was to come. It was an oracle of the devil, that told them what success they should have in this or the other business; and sometimes it hit right. See the superstition of the Jews; they desired much to know the mind of God, but because they were afraid they should not know all by the ephod, which was the ordinance of God, they would join with the ephod the teraphim.

Obs. It is a very great and fearful evil, when men, in searching to know any thing of God’s mind, do not keep themselves to God’s ways of knowledge, to God’s own ordinances. It concerns us much now at this day. We are about inquiring the mind of God, that we may know it in matters which regard the commonwealth, but more especially concerning religion. I suppose there is none of us but will acknowledge, that the medium which God has appointed for the revealing of his will, is the Scriptures; that we must look into them, and seek to know God’s mind there. So far is good, but let us not join teraphim with them. Then do we join teraphim, when we rest not upon Scripture alone, but search after rules of man’s devising, and what may consist with our own carnal ends. The Lord may justly meet with us in wrath, if we presume to join our teraphim with his ephod. Pray that at this day, where there is so much searching after God’s mind, that those who are employed in it may confine themselves to the ephod, to the Scriptures, to that which is God’s ordinance for the revealing of his mind, that they may not join the teraphim, their own fancies and inventions of men, with them. So long as we keep to that rule, we may hope to do well enough; but if the teraphim be joined with the ephod, if any thing be joined with the Scriptures, though apparently never so rational, we have cause to fear God will leave us.

We find this word teraphim used sometimes in Scripture for the image of a man: as 1 Sam. xix. 13, when Michal took an image and laid it in the bed instead of David, the word in the Hebrew is teraphim: so when Rachel stole away her father’s images, the word is, she stole away her father’s teraphim; and some think they were her father’s divining images, and that she rather stole those than any others, because she would not have her father divine which way they were gone. Zech. x. 2, it is said, “The idols have spoken vanity;” the word is, the teraphim: by which we may see they were wont to consult their idols about their successes. And sometimes we find in Scripture that idolatry is called by this name, as 1 Sam. xv. 23, “stubbornness is as iniquity and idolatry;” the word is, is as teraphim.

But here occurs the question; God threatens to take away the sacrifice and the ephod, and that plainly is a threatening, but how is it so to take away the image and the teraphim?

You may understand it as a threatening thus: It is as if God would threaten to bring Israel into as desolate condition as a strumpet is brought into, when not only all her kindred and true friends leave her, but when all her lovers forsake her too, even those who pretended the most love to her, in whom she took abundance of comfort, and from whom she expected protection; yet now she is brought into such a condition, that she sitteth desolate, forlorn, and helpless: so shall ye be, saith God, your sacrifice and your ephod, yea, and teraphim, shall leave you.

Or rather thus: Howsoever it is a mercy for God to take away false worship from a people, images and teraphim, yet here it is a threatening, because it would much disquiet them to be deprived of these images and teraphim, and would be in their apprehension a judgment: as for instance, what trouble have we when the people conceive that any false worship is about to be taken away from them! they think they are undone; nay, when the inventions of men in God’s worship are but questioned, what excitement is there! men think their gods are taken away; as Judg. xviii., when the children of Dan came to the house of Micah and took away his ephod and his teraphim, he cried out after them, “Ye have taken away the gods that I have made, and what have I more?” what worse thing could you have done more? I had rather you had taken away all I had; and yet you say unto me, “What aileth thee?” Is it not so at this day? What is it that now breeds such disturbance in England, but that people think their teraphim shall be taken from them? whereas they have heretofore worshipped God in a false way, after the inventions of men, and now he is pleased to shed some light, and there is an inquiring after a right form of church government, and the true manner of worshipping God, they are even mad at this, and would rather lose their lives and their estates, than that their teraphim should be taken away: let that be taken away, and how shall they be able to pray? what! will you take away their religion? This is the language of * Quæ sit causa tam grandis offensæ ut tanto tempore relictis sunt? maxime cum idola non colant, præter interfectionem Salvatoris aliam non valent invenire. Hieron. in loc.

† Quædammodum per ephod Deo consecratur quid æquum esset consentibus significabatur, ita per teraphim idolorum prædicationes declarabantur. Procop. ad Sam. xv. 23.

‡ Mactabant hominem, cujus caput torquendo percindebant, quod postea sale et aromatibus condiebant, scribebantque super laminam auream nomen spiritus immundi, qua supposita capiti ejus, ponebant illud in pariete incendentes coram eo candelas, et adorantes coram eo, supponebant nomen spiritus immundi sub lingua ipsius, et ille alloquebatur eos. Sic R. Eliez.

men in many ignorant places in this kingdom, yea, the very language of many even amongst us here; they are verily persuaded that the parliament intend to abolish all religion in the kingdom; and the adversaries go about to infuse into men, that the parliament are a company of Brownists, merely because they anxiously inquire after the true way of worshipping God, and would have the land purged of all superstitious vanities: thus people cry out for their teraphim: "Great is Diana of the Ephesians." When King Edward the Sixth had but banished the mass, an army rose in Devonshire, and sent several articles to the king about their grievances, as causes of their rising. First, they said that their children were denied baptism: and as they now cry out that none but a company of Anabaptists do all this; so then the popish priests infused into the people of those remote counties, that they were to have no more children baptized, thinking this would exasperate them then against king and parliament. And secondly, they complained that their service, meaning the mass, was taken from them. King Edward was fain to write, to tell them that they were exceedingly abused, that they should still enjoy what was according to the word of God, that their children should be baptized; and as for the mass, that the Common Prayer Book was just the same, only whereas it was in Latin before, it was now turned into English: and so he quieted and satisfied the people. Thus it comes to be a threatening, that God will take away their image and teraphim, because the hearts of people are so vexed when their forms of superstition are abolished.

Now upon this confusion, when they are without king, prince, sacrifice, ephod, image, and teraphim, what shall be the result?

Ver. 5. Afterward shall the children of Israel return, and seek the Lord their God, and David their king; and shall fear the Lord and his goodness in the latter days.

A little before God's time is come to raise the most glorious church that ever existed in the world, the greatest confusion is likely to arise. Lactantius tells us, that just before the glorious church, all right shall be confounded, laws shall perish, men shall possess all things by force, good men shall be scorned and contemned; and though, in the times in which we live, one would think that wickedness had reached its highest, yet, in comparison of those evil days that shall happen just before this glorious time, these may be called the golden age. God will reduce all to a chaos first, as he did in the first creation, and then bring out of it a glorious building. We know the raising of that glorious church of which so much is prophesied, is called a creation, "a creating a new heaven and a new earth;" and it is probable enough, that as the heavens and the earth were first made out of a chaos, so those "new heavens and new earth" will be raised out of a chaos, out of that which seems to us to be but confusion. Of what do people complain at this day but of confusion? All things, they say, are brought into confusion. It is true, confusion is an evil thing, and we are to grieve for it, and to seek to prevent it; yet let us not be too much troubled, for you see, when the greatest confusion comes on the people of the Jews, then follows the greatest mercy, then they shall "return, and seek the Lord their God;" never return before that time. Indeed, till men be taken off from all others they will not return to God. When Saul had but a witch to whom he could go, he would rather have recourse to her than seek the face of God in repentance. Because God seems to leave us for the present, and suffers us to be in confusion, and we know not what to do, let not our hearts be disquieted, let us not recur to unlawful means; for mark, it was just a little before Saul was to be destroyed that he had attained that height in evil. There was a time that Saul inquired after God's mind, and God refused to answer him, but yet he would not then adopt such an unlawful course, but searched to see what sin was amongst the people that caused God to refuse him an answer. When Jonathan took the honey, "Saul asked counsel of God, but he answered him not that day." And Saul said, Draw ye near hither, and see wherein this sin hath been this day," 1 Sam. xiv. 37, 38; but afterward he became so evil, that when he was in a strait, and God answered him not, he forthwith went to the witch; but this was when he was near destruction.

Obs. 1. Wicked men near destruction, (as Saul was,) finding things in confusion, and God not showing them what is to be done, are soon in a rage against God, and seek after unlawful means to deliver themselves. The Lord forbid that this should be our condition. Let not us say, Things are now in such disorder that we cannot discover the mind of God; we consult ministers, and they know not what to say; they have cast out one government, and they know not what to bring in; and therefore it were better we were as before. If this be our reasoning, it is a sign that we are, like Saul, nigh to destruction. Let us be content to wait; they shall be "many days without a king," &c., and "then they shall return;" the fruit of their being without king, and prince, and ephod, and sacrifice, shall not be vexation and disquiet, but a returning to God and repentance. If things be worse, and we be brought into greater straits than ever we supposed, let us not murmur, but let us repent. Every one is complaining, but who is repenting? if there were as much repenting as there is murmuring, then we should soon know the mind of God.

Obs. 2. The use of sanctified affliction is to cause returning to God: "Then they shall return." Jerome expresses the life of an impenitent sinner by a line stretched out, he goes from the centre in a right line, and so goes in infinitum from it; but a penitent sinner is like a line bent, and turning back to the centre, though by sin he goes from it, yet by repentance he turns to it again: They are gone from me a great way, saith God, but I will turn them, they shall bend back again and return to me.

Obs. 3. Repentance is described by the word "return," to denote the folly of sin. In sin thou goest out of the way, and the truth is, though you think you choose a good path for yourself, yet you must either return or perish. It is just like a traveller, who sees a dirty lane before him, and is told that is the way he must go; but on the other side of the hedge there is a green and pleasant path, and he gets over into it, and so rides on a mile or two, till at length he is compassed about with ditches and rivers, so that he must either turn back or else lie there and perish; he returns with shame, and if any one that before told him of the other way see him, he now reproaches him with his folly. So it is with sinners; there are ways of God that lead directly to heaven, but because these ways are rugged, and they meet with trouble and persecution in them, and they see by-paths, though leading to hell, yet more plain and smooth, they will transgress, (for that is the word for sin,) will pass over, and for a while, in this their way, enjoy pleasure: but, friend, you must come back again, and if ever you mean to be saved, you must go in the way that you have refused.

Obs. 4. Here is an encouragement for old sinners. "They shall return, and seek the Lord their God." The Jews have been above sixteen hundred years in this woeful condition, forsaking God; but in their latter days they shall return, and seek the Lord, and God shall be merciful to them. Hast thou been forty, fifty, sixty years going from God? there is hope for thy soul: O return, return, ye old sinners.

But further, they shall return to "Jehovah," and seek him. Jer. iv. 1, "If thou wilt return, O Israel, saith the Lord, return unto me." They shall not turn from one false way of worship to another, but from the false way to the true, they shall return to God. It is that we now should look to. We must not think it enough to cast one false mode of government out of the church, and turn to another, though not so bad, yet not God's mode; if from any carnal policy we reject the way of God, it will prove a sore evil to us: it is one thing not to be able to bring in the way of Christ, another to reject it.

They shall seek Jehovah. The word "seek" signifies, conatu ac studio querere, to seek with endeavouring and study, rather than merely to ask and inquire; they shall be studious in seeking after God. They "shall seek the Lord," that is,

First, They shall seek his face and favour for the pardon of all their evil ways; they shall come and acknowledge their false ways and doings, and seek mercy to pardon.

Secondly, They shall seek the true worship of the Lord. Calvin, in a sermon on "Seek ye my face," interprets it to be a seeking of the ordinances and the true worship of God. So Psal. cv. 4, "Seek the Lord, and his strength:" what is meant by the strength of God there? It is the ark, for that Psalm was made at the bringing of the ark into the place which David had prepared, as you may see by comparing with 1 Chron. xvi. where the ark of God is called the strength of God, and Psal. lxxviii. 61, He gave "his strength into captivity." Surely, if the true worship of God be the strength of God, it is our strength too: a people are then strong when they entertain the ark of God, the true worship of God; and then indeed we seek God aright, when we seek to know the way of his worship.

Lastly, They shall seek to know his will in all their ways, and to do it.

Obs. It is not enough for them to be content to do just that which he has commanded, but they shall seek to know his mind, and what his worship requires. Some yield thus far to God, if any convince them that this should be done, then they will do it, they dare not then but comply; but when the heart is in a true repenting frame, it is in a seeking frame, it is laborious and industrious to know the mind of God. Whereas the heart of a sinner heretofore lay dead and dull, never stirred after God, now it is in a stirring, in an inquiring way; which is a sign of much good. Though thou hast not what thou seekest for, yet be comforted in this, that thou art seeking; "Their hearts shall rejoice that seek the Lord." Though thou complainest, I have been seeking a long time, but I know not the mind of God, I cannot apprehend the love of God, and the pardon of my sins: True, but the hearts of those "shall rejoice that seek the Lord;" if thou art in a seeking way, thou art in a saving way, there is cause thou shouldst rejoice in this, that God has led thee thus far.

They "shall seek the Lord," and that not faintly, but anxiously and effectually. Jer. l. 4, 5, They, "the children of Israel, and the children of Judah," when they shall be together, "shall go weeping, and seek the Lord their God; and they shall ask the way to Zion with their faces thitherward." Many of you ask questions, but your hearts are not right, your faces and the strength of your spirits are not set to yield to the will of God when it is revealed to you. And mark how it appears that their faces are thitherward, "Come," (say they,) "and let us join ourselves to the Lord in a perpetual covenant that shall not be forgotten." To seek God, is not merely to go to a minister and ask him a question, but to go with the strength of our spirits set to know the mind of God above all things, and so to resolve to obey, as to be willing to enter into a perpetual covenant, to bind ourselves to yield to whatever God shall reveal. When you come to a sermon, come not to get a little notional knowledge, but with your faces toward Christ and his truth previously; if you be a true seeker, enter into covenant with God, that to whatever God reveals to be his mind you will yield; and though you have heretofore opposed many revealed truths, say, Lord, here I am, ready and willing to enter into an everlasting covenant to be under the command of every truth. This is seeking God aright.

They "shall seek the Lord their God." This "their God" has two references, either to what is past, or to what is to come. To what is past; "their God," that is, the God who was once the God of the Jews, the God of their forefathers, the God of Abraham, of Isaac, and of Jacob. And secondly, "their God," that is, that God who is yet ready and willing to be reconciled to them, notwithstanding all their sins. Thus they "shall seek the Lord their God."

Obs. 1. It prevails much with the heart of a backslider, to think what God was once to him before he apostatized, and what he was to his godly parents and progenitors. There was a time that I enjoyed God sweetly, when I went to prayer I had blessed communion with him; it is otherwise with me now, I have apostatized. Let this consideration catch hold on thy heart and turn it this day: O turn, turn, thou apostate soul; God, who was once thy God in a gracious manner, is the same that thou hast vilely forsaken, yea, thy father's God also. Thou hadst a godly father, a godly grandfather; remember what a blessed God he was unto them, and return.

Obs. 2. The apprehension of a possibility to obtain mercy from the Lord, is a strong means to draw the heart to return to him. "Their God," the God whom they may yet hope to enjoy, notwithstanding all their departings from him. When they look on God as a God in covenant with them still, there is nothing to prevent his yet becoming their God. Let this argument arrest the spirits of all sinners who have departed from God. Backslider, thou hast departed from God in a foul and vile manner, but men and angels know nothing to the contrary but that he may be thy God for all this. Let me speak to the vilest sinner in this place before the Lord this day. Thou hast indeed most desperately and wickedly sinned against God; the Jews have done so. Hast thou crucified Christ? they have done so. Hast thou denied the truth and followed false ways? they have done so. Notwithstanding all thy wicked and evil ways, seeing thou art yet alive, I do this day yet once more pronounce to thee in the name of the great God, that there is nothing to the contrary, that either angels or men can possibly know, but that God may be thy God, and that this day God may enter into covenant with thee, and thou with him; this night he may come in and sup with thee, and thou with him; there may be a blessed reconciliation between God and thee; return, return, thou sinful soul.

"And David their king." That the Jews shall return and believe in Christ, is most ordinarily spoken and believed by the faithful, saith Augustine. In this their return and seeking God, they "shall seek David their king."

For the explanation of this, there are five things to be inquired into.

1. Who this David was.
2. Why David is named rather than any other.
3. Why he is mentioned in this place.
4. Why joined with seeking of Jehovah.
5. Why this epithet is added to David here, "David their king."

First, by "David" is evidently meant Jesus Christ. Nothing is more manifest than that Christ is meant by the name of David, saith Judeus in Christum nostrum crediturus, celeberrimum est in sermonibus ecclesiasticisque fidei. August.

Nihil est in ista propheta manifestius quam David regis nomine significatus Augustine. The Scripture is explicit on intelligitur Christus. this, in the New Testament calling Christ Aug. de Civit. lib. by the name of David. Compare Isa.

lv. 3, with Acts xiii. 34. Isaiah saith, "I will give you the sure mercies of David." What are they? In Acts xiii., where that place of Isaiah is quoted, the words are τὰ ὅσα Δαβὶδ, the holy things of David; the Holy Ghost there adopting the translation of the Septuagint, as is usual in the New Testament. And Psal. xvi. 10, where David seems to speak in his own person, "Thou wilt not leave my soul in hell; neither wilt thou suffer thine Holy One to see corruption;" is applied to Christ, Acts xiii. 36, 37. And Acts xv. 16, in the assembly of the church of Jerusalem, James, in his speech to the assembly, tells them of a prophecy that God would "return and build again the tabernacle of David," that is, convert the Gentiles to the profession of Christ. But you will say, Is this quoted right? for it was James's intention in the assembly (and it concerns all in such a grave assembly) to speak to the point; but how does James so here? The question at issue was, the calling of the Gentiles, and he proves it by that scripture where it is said, that God would "build again the tabernacle of David;" but how does that prove that God would call the Gentiles? You may see, if you examine the prophecy whence this was quoted, that this text was most appropriate; it is in Amos ix. 11, 12, where, after he had said that he would "build again the tabernacle of David," there follows, "that they may possess the remnant of Edom, and of all the heathen, which are called by my name." So that the tabernacle of David is indeed the tabernacle of Christ, and it shall be raised to this end, that he may possess the remnant of Edom, and of all the Gentiles that were to be called by the name of God. David is Christ because he was his type, and Christ was the seed of David.

Secondly, Why David is named rather than any other, rather than Abraham, Isaac, or Jacob; others were types of Christ as well as he, and Christ was their seed as well as David's. The reason is, because David typified Christ, especially in his kingly power over his own people, David was the first godly king over God's own people. Melchisedec was a king, king of Salem; but over the people of God David was the first type of Christ.

Thirdly, Why he is mentioned in this place, why the Holy Ghost adds to seeking the Lord, that they shall "seek David?" Was it not enough if the Holy Ghost had said, When the ten tribes of Israel (for he speaks of them especially) shall return they shall "seek the Lord" and the Messiah, but that they shall "seek the Lord and David." The reason is, the expression is introduced to remind these tribes of their great sin in revolting from the house of David; when they shall repent, this will lie near their hearts, they will mourn for this their transgression, and when they choose Christ to be their King, shall do it under the name of David; as if they should say, We indeed have cast off the house of David sinfully, but we now come and choose the Son of David to be our King. Thereby reminding us that,

Obs. True penitents, in mourning for their sin and returning to God, will go as far as possible to the foot of their transgressions, to their first defection, and mourn for that, and labour with all diligence to reform in that very thing wherein originated their sin.

Fourthly, Why joined with seeking the Lord; "they shall seek Jehovah, and David their king." It is added to show us, that none can seek God rightly but through Christ, they must seek God in Christ. "This is life eternal, to know thee, and Jesus Christ whom thou hast sent:" to know God alone is not eternal life, but to know God and his Son; so to seek God alone is not eternal life, nor will it ever bring to eternal life, except there be a seeking of God in Christ, seeking Jehovah and David conjointly. Grace from God the Father and from the Lord Jesus Christ must go together: no grace from God the Father, but from him through Christ; so no seeking of God the Father, Jehovah, but it must be with seeking of David likewise. It is not only dangerous, but terrible, to think of God without Christ; the very thought of him out of Christ is most dreadful to the hearts of those who know God. There are some indeed who have bold, presumptuous hearts, who will go into God's presence though recking in the very guilt of their lately-committed sins, and seek to God for mercy, and never think of Christ the Mediator; they understand not the necessity of seeking God in Christ, because indeed they know not with what a God they have to deal; but the soul that knows what God is, dares not think of God, much less come into his presence and seek him, but only through Christ. Plutarch, in the Life of Themistocles, relates, That when the Molossians would seek the favour of the prince, they were wont to take the king's son in their arms, and so go and kneel before his altar in his chapel; and that Themistocles did so when he sought the favour of King Admetus. So Christians, in seeking the face of God the great King, should take up his Son in the arms of faith. Luther, on Psal. cxxx., observes, Often and willingly do I inculcate this, that you should shut your eyes and your ears, and say you know no God out of Christ, none but he that was in the lap of Mary, and sucked her breasts; he means, none out of him. We must not, we should not, dare to look upon God but through Christ, and seek him together with David.

This is the evangelical way of seeking God; when we have sinned, if there be any way of help, it must be by seeking a merciful God; thus far nature goes, and most people go no farther; yea, most Christians, though they have the name of Christ in their mouths, yet their hearts go no farther than natural principles carry them. But the seeking God in Christ, is the true spiritual and evangelical way, "the mystery of godliness," to present a Mediator to God every time we come into his presence. I fear that many of our prayers are lost for want of this. There is much fasting and prayer, through God's mercy, amongst us, and I would to God there were no abatement; but though we ask, Will God leave his people when there is such a spirit of prayer? let us know, if it be not a seeking God in his Son, it is our own spirits rather than the Spirit of God. We may be earnest in prayer and cry mightily to God, yet if we take not up his Son in the arms of faith, and present him to the Father, thousands of prayers and fasting days may be all lost for want of this. The truth is, we must not depend so much on our prayers, though we are to rejoice and to bless God that there is so much prayer; but God's dealings towards us seem as if he would take us off, not from the practice of prayer, but from relying on it, to rely upon free grace in Christ alone. As this is the supernatural seeking of God, so it is the most powerful. It is not enough to seek God by virtue of a promise, except we seek him by virtue of Christ, who is the foundation of all the promises. We seek him because he is merciful, that is one way; yea, we seek him because he has promised mercy, this is a step higher; but we must go higher yet, we must look to his Son, in whom all the promises are Yea and Amen; otherwise, though we seek him never so earnestly, though we challenge his promises, and cry to him to remember them, yet if we do not act our faith on his Son, we may altogether fail.

And herein we sanctify that great name of God in that which is his great work, his master-piece, as we may say, or the great design he has to honour himself

Non solum preciosum, sed horribile est de Deo extra Christum cogitare. Lath.

Ego sæpe et libenter hoc inculco, ut extra Christum cogitatus deitatis dicatis nullam res scire Deum, nisi qui fuit in gremio Maræ et suavit ubera ejus. Luther.

by in the world here, and everlastingly hereafter. Certainly, though God has made the creature for his own glory, and expects we should honour his image in it; yet the great design God has to honour himself in and by is, that the children of men may behold this his glory as manifested in his Son, and reflect it on his own face; except you glorify God in this, he cares not much for whatever other glory you can give him.

When you seek God, you must not, therefore, expect good things from him merely because he is merciful, you must not think that the mercy of God serves to eke out our righteousness. Perhaps some will say, It is true, we are poor sinful creatures, and what can we expect from God, being sinful? but we hope that the mercy of God will pardon our sin, and so accept of our poor services. This is the way with most, they, as it were, employ God's mercy in a work that God never intended it for, that is, they would make the mercy of God to eke out their own righteousness, that so both joined together might serve as a means of atonement. No, you mistake God's mercy; the work of God's mercy is not this, but it is to show us our unrighteousness, our misery, our uncleanness, to show us Jesus Christ, to draw our hearts to him, to empty us of ourselves that we may wholly rely upon that righteousness that is by faith in him, and present that to the Father for sanctification and atonement: this is the work of God's mercy, and when it thus works, then it has its true, genuine effect.

Fifthly, Why this epithet is added to David, "David their king." True, we must seek the Lord and Christ, but why Christ the King? Because Christ in the latter days shall be fully honoured in his kingly power; they shall look upon him not only as Prophet and Priest, but as King. Hitherto Christ has been much honoured in his prophetic and priestly office, but not so much in his kingly; but in the latter days, when God shall call home his people, (the Jews,) then Christ shall be fully honoured in his kingly office. The tabernacle of Christ was raised in the primitive times, according to that speech of St. James, Acts xv. 16, "God shall build up again the tabernacle of David," he speaks of its accomplishment then; but there is a time when God shall not only raise the tabernacle of David, but the throne of David; Christ the King shall appear in glory. Ezek. xxxvii. 24, 25, "And David my servant shall be king over them;" it was spoken on the union that should take place between Judah and Israel, then "David my servant shall be king over them." David was long dead, but there is a time when David must again be king, that is, Christ shall reign on the union of all the tribes together. And again, the text adds, "David shall be their prince for ever;" when they are brought back into their own land: surely this prophecy is yet to be fulfilled. And Luke i. 32, 33, "The Lord God shall give unto him the throne of his father David: and he shall reign over the house of Jacob for ever; and of his kingdom there shall be no end." I know we usually think that this is meant only of his spiritual reign, but certainly there is to be a fulfilling of this prophecy in a reign that shall appear outwardly before the children of men. This opinion gathers strength by comparing this with other passages. Rev. xi. 15, "The kingdoms of this world are become the kingdoms of our Lord, and of his Christ; and he shall reign for ever and ever." In a spiritual sense the kingdoms of this world are always the kingdoms of the Lord and of his Christ, but a time is here spoken of, when the kingdoms of this world shall manifestly appear to be the Lord's and his Christ's, and then "he shall reign for ever and ever." Rev. iii. 21, "To him that overcometh will I grant to sit with me in my throne, even as I also overcame, and am set down with my Father in his throne." Mark this text, as one of the most remarkable we have. That kingly rule which Christ has for the present, is on his Father's throne; he is not yet on his own, but reigns conjointly with the Father; but there is a time in which Christ will have a throne himself.

Now you will perhaps think that that throne of Christ is in heaven at the day of judgment; but we find, 1 Cor. xv. 24, that at that day he comes to resign the kingdom; the words do not seem to import that he came to take it, but to give up the kingdom unto God the Father; therefore there is a time for Christ himself to have a throne, and with him the saints shall reign. Matt. xxi. 9, the children cried out, "Hosanna to the Son of David," because they looked upon the Son of David as one who was to reign.

In these "latter days" Christ shall break the kings of the earth who stand against him, as, indeed, many, yea, most of the kings of the earth have ever stood out to hinder this his kingdom. There will be a mighty shaking of the kingdoms of the earth when this shall be: "Whose voice then shook the earth: but now he hath promised, saying, Yet once more I shake not the earth only, but also heaven;" quoted in Heb. xii. 26, out of Hag. ii. 6, 7. God, in giving the law, shook the earth, but then he will shake the earth and the heavens, which some interpreters expound thus: not only the power of the meaner people, but that of the highest kings and emperors, and whatever is lofty in the world, shall be shaken when Christ comes to take the kingdom to himself; the Father will set him King upon his holy hill. Though "the kings of the earth set themselves, and the rulers take counsel together, against the Lord, and against his Anointed, saying, Let us break their bands asunder, and cast away their cords from us; he that sitteth in the heavens shall laugh: the Lord shall have them in derision. Then shall he speak unto them in his wrath, and vex them in his sore displeasure. Yet have I set my King upon my holy hill of Zion:" "yet" have I done it, though the kings of the earth and great ones of the world fret, and vex, and rage, and collect their might; though they blaspheme, and say he shall not reign, the Lord sitteth in heaven and laughs at them; let them do what they can, and gather what strength they can, and oppose it to the uttermost, "yet have I set my King upon my holy hill of Zion."

This is acceptable news, it is the joyful voice of the gospel, to tell you of Christ's coming to reign in the world. Isa. lii. 7, "How beautiful upon the mountains are the feet of him that bringeth good tidings!" What are those "good tidings?" those that say unto Zion, "Thy God reigneth." This, indeed, is the triumph of the church. Isa. xxxiii. 22, "The Lord is our judge, the Lord is our lawgiver, the Lord is our king;" for then shall the churches be delivered from the oppression of all tyrants in the world.

And this kingdom of Christ shall indeed be like David's kingdom; Christ shall be "David their king." I might show you many parallels, but I will only instance these two:

First, David was one of the most gentle of princes, and exceedingly loving and kind to his subjects: 1 Chron. xviii. 2, "Then David the king stood up upon his feet, and said, Hear me, my brethren, and my people." Mark how he, a king, speaking to his people, addresses them; he stood upon his feet, and said, "Hear me, my brethren, and my people." Thus the kingdom of Christ is declared to us, Psal. xlv. 4, "In thy majesty ride prosperously, because of truth and meekness." Christ shall be a most meek king; not a king of blood, ruling with violence and harshness, so as not to care for the love of his people, making his finger heavier than the loins of others; but he shall rule his people with all gentleness. Therefore the government of Christ is expressed by "a shepherd gently leading those that are with young;" and in this David and Christ are alike: Psal. lxxviii. 70, 71, "He chose David also his servant, and took him from the sheepfolds: for following the ewes great with young, he brought him to feed Jacob his people, and Israel his inheritance." So Isa. xl., having spoken of the glad tidings of Christ's kingdom, adds, "He shall feed his flock like a shepherd; he shall gather the lambs with his arm, and carry them in his bosom, and shall gently lead those that are with young." When Christ shall reign, he shall have great respect to the good and comfort of his people, he shall not disregard their liberties, but their benefit and his own glory shall be blended in one.

Secondly, "David their king," in regard of faithfulness. David was very faithful to his people, and therefore the mercies of God in Christ are called "the sure mercies of David," because "David was found faithful before the Lord." In Psal. xlv. 4, a prophecy of Christ's kingdom, the text saith, "In thy majesty ride prosperously; because of truth, and meekness, and righteousness:" there shall be righteousness in the kingdom of Christ. It is a blessed thing when we may confide and fully venture our estates, our liberties, and our lives on the promises of those who are above us. We know how many there are about great personages to draw them from things that they have promised with the utmost seriousness, and most solemn protestations to perform. I will give you one or two remarkable instances of this. King Edward the Sixth sends letters to London in the behalf of the duke of Somerset, the then protector; many of the lords had risen up against him, thinking he oppressed the people, and they sent at the same time to London for aid and assistance. On this there was a common council called in the city, and amongst them a wise and an honest man, one George Stadlowe, addressed the council thus: I remember a story in Fabian's Chronicle, of the wars between Henry the Third and his barons; the barons then demanded aid of the city of London, as our lords do now, and that in a rightful cause, for the good of the commonwealth, for the execution of divers good laws which the king would not suffer to be enforced; and the city did aid them, and an open battle ensued, and the lords prevailing, took the king and his son prisoners. The lords afterwards restored the king and his son to their freedom, on certain conditions, amongst which this was one, that the king should not only grant his pardon to the lords, but also to the citizens of London; and the conditions of this accommodation of peace were ratified by act of parliament; but what followed? was it forgotten? no, surely, nor forgiven neither, during the king's life: the liberties of the city were taken away, strangers appointed to be our head and governors, the persons and goods of the citizens endangered, and one persecution succeeded another. Again, in the history of Queen Mary's time we find, that because there was some dispute about her coming to the crown, she went to Suffolk, to the place where the duke that then rose up for another was most hated; and being at Framlingham castle, the Suffolk men came to her and promised their aid, on condition that she would not attempt the alteration of religion, which her brother King Edward had just established: she promised them there should be no innovation in religion, no, God forbid, yea, she promised it so solemnly that no one would or could doubt the performance; but afterward, when she got the power into her hand, the Suffolk men came to make supplication to her, that she would be pleased to perform the promise she made them, and she replied thus: Forasmuch as you, being but members, desire to rule your head, you shall one day be made sensible that members must obey their head, and not expect to bear rule over the same. And not only so, but to cause the more terror, one Master Dobs, a gentleman that lived near Windsor, who presumed in a humble address merely to remind her of her promise made to the Suffolk men, was three times set in the pillory, and others for the same cause sent to prison. We may see what hold heretofore promises have had on those who had the power to break them, and what temptations they have to withdraw their hearts from the fulfilment of their engagements. But when this our Prince comes, David our King, we shall find "the sure mercies of David," we shall find nothing but faithfulness in all his dealings.

"And shall fear the Lord and his goodness in the latter days."

"Shall fear the Lord." The words are, shall fear to the Lord, parebunt ad Dominum. The fear of God is much upon the heart of a sinner in his return to God. Such a sinner has high and honourable thoughts of God. They shall return, and fear the Lord. The unthinking vanity of his spirit, the boldness of his heart, are gone, and the fear of God rules in it. The majesty, the power, the authority of the great God are strongly impressed on him; when he comes to worship, the fear of God makes him worship God as God, it abides with him even all the day long, you may see written on his life the fear of the great God. And this not a servile, slavish fear, but a holy, reverential, filial fear. Isaac had such a fear of God, that from it God is called "the fear of Isaac." This is a most precious fear: others fear poverty, imprisonment, disgrace, their fellow men; but, saith a true repenting heart, "I fear the Lord:" this fear is the well-spring of life to him, it is the very treasure of his soul, Isa. xxxiii. 6.

I shall speak of the fear of God here only as it concerns this place. It is introduced here, to show that when this glorious church shall be formed, when God shall call home his own people the Jews, and bring in the fullness of the Gentiles, then shall the fear of God mightily prevail upon the hearts of people; and the greater God's goodness shall be, the more shall the fear of God be on their hearts. It is remarkable, that almost all the prophecies which speak of the glorious condition of the church, ever make mention of the fear of God that should rest then on the hearts of the people. One would rather think there should be a reference to the joy they would have, and that there should be nothing but mirth and triumph in those times; but the Scripture speaks much of fear that shall be then, and more then than at any other time. Thus in Rev. xi. 18, a most remarkable prophecy of Christ's coming, and taking the kingdoms of the earth, and bringing his reward with him, it is said, he shall come and give a reward to those that fear him. And Rev. xiv. 6, 7, "I saw another angel fly in the midst of heaven, having the everlasting gospel to preach unto them that dwell on the earth, saying with a loud voice, Fear God, and give glory to him." Mark an angel when he comes to preach the everlasting gospel, how does he preach it? what, Cast now away fear and rejoice in this everlasting gospel? No, preaching this everlasting gospel, he saith with a loud voice, "Fear God and give glory to him." So Rev. xv. 3, 4, contains the song of the saints when they are delivered from the power of antichrist, and what saith it, Rejoice and be glad? No; "Great and marvellous are thy works, Lord God Almighty; just and true are thy ways, thou King of saints. Who shall not fear thee, O Lord, and glorify thy name? for thou only art holy: for all nations shall come and worship before thee; for thy judgments are made manifest." And again, Rev. xix. 5, "And a voice came out of the throne, saying, Praise our God, all ye his servants, and ye that fear him, both small and great."

But why fear the Lord in these times?

For these four reasons.

First, Because of the glory of Christ their King. They shall behold their King in glory that shall cause fear. Rev. xix. 12, 13, 15, 16, Christ is described with his "eyes as a flame of fire, and on his head many crowns; and he was clothed with a vesture dipped in blood; and out of his mouth goeth a sharp sword, and he hath on his vesture and on his thigh a name written, King of kings, and Lord of lords." Thus they shall behold Christ, and therefore they shall fear.

Secondly, Because of the great works of God that shall then take place; "the heavens shall depart like a scroll, and the elements melt with fervent heat." This is meant of the time when there shall be "new heavens and a new earth," and refers to the prophecy of Isaiah, and apparently, and so interpreters generally explain it, regards the state of the church. Heb. xii. 26, quoted out of Hag. ii. 6, "Whose voice then shook the earth, but now he hath promised, saying, Yet once more, I shake not the earth only, but also heaven." There shall be wonderful works of God in the earth when those days come, therefore there shall be much of the fear of God.

Thirdly, Because the holiness and purity of the worship of God, and of his ordinances, shall cause fear. Did we see the ordinances in their true and native purity and holiness, it would inspire us with much awe. Some have but seen the execution of that one ordinance of excommunication solemnly performed, and it has daunted their spirits, and struck awe into the most proud, profane, stubborn, and wicked hearts; the beholding, then, of all the ordinances, and all duties of worship, in their native purity, holiness, and glory, cannot but cause much fear. Psal. lxxviii. 35, "O God, thou art terrible out of thy holy places:" God will be terrible out of his holy places and out of all his holy ordinances.

Fourthly, Because the holiness of the saints, appearing brightly in their very faces and conversations, shall strike great fear. "Holy and reverend is thy name," is said of God, and so it shall be said of the saints in that day; their graces shall be much exalted, they shall sparkle with abundance of the graces of God's Spirit resting on them; their wisdom and holiness shall make their faces shine, "holy and reverend shall be their names." Psal. lxxxix. 7, "God is greatly to be feared in the assembly of the saints;" saints who walk close with him have a majesty in their appearance which appals guilty consciences. I appeal to apostates, to professors who frequent secret haunts of wickedness; when you come but into the presence of one who is a truly gracious and godly person, whom your conscience tells you walks close with God, does not even the very sight of such a one awe you? the very lustre of the holiness you see in such a one strikes on your conscience; then you think, he walks close with God indeed, but I have basely forsaken the Lord, and have frequented haunts of wickedness, and have brought dreadful guilt on my soul since I saw him last. Ecclesiastical history tells us, when the officers came to apprehend Basil, being then engaged in holy duties, such a majesty and lustre came forth from his countenance, that the officers fell down backward (as they did who came to apprehend Christ) and were not able to lay hold of him. Surely, when the saints shall be exalted in their holiness, when every one of them shall have their souls filled with God, it will cause abundance of fear in the hearts of all those who shall even converse with them.

But the wicked shall fear too, as well as the saints. Luke xxi. 26, "Men's hearts shall fail them for fear," shall be verified in these days, as it was in the destruction of Jerusalem.

The saints shall "fear the Lord and his goodness;" the words in the original are, they shall fear אל-יהוה אל-הוה, to the Lord, and אל-ישׁוּב אל-הוה, to his goodness. It is in effect the same; the goodness which God shall manifest shall excite this fear in their hearts.

You will say, What goodness? what shall that goodness of God be that shall move the hearts of this people with so much fear?

I will tell you briefly, for I have spoken of it at large on the last words of the first chapter of this prophecy, "great shall be the day of Jezreel;" and shall now only add, The goodness of God which in that day they shall fear, shall be this:

First, That ever he should regard such a wretched people as they, and pardon all their sins. What! Israel, the ten tribes, who had most wretchedly forsaken God, who had crucified Jesus Christ, crucified David their King, yet that that blood which they shed should be applied to them for the pardon of their sin! Oh the goodness of God! They shall fear this goodness in showing mercy to such a hard-hearted, stubborn, stiff-necked people as they have been; this goodness of God will break their hearts.

Secondly, Because God shall then make the difference between him that feareth God and him that feareth him not. Then shall God take away all the reproach of his saints. What bitter reproach has there been on the saints since the beginning of the world, especially since the times of the gospel! Reproach, first, because they are a mean people. Secondly, because they suffer so much, and God lets his adversaries prevail over them. Thirdly, because they wait upon God, and God seems not to come, the adversaries say, Where is your God? no marvel you pray and fast, what is become of all? Here will be manifested the goodness of God at that day in wiping off all this reproach. They shall have so much mercy, so much honour from God, that it shall appear before all the world that it was good to wait upon him; so much as shall compensate abundantly all their sufferings; they shall bless God that ever it was put into their hearts to suffer for him, and to wait upon him. And because God foresees what goodness he has laid up for his people, which they shall enjoy ere long, (and we know a thousand years with him are as one day,) is the reason why he suffers them to be so oppressed for the present; he knows he has such goodness for them hereafter, yea, in this world, that all the world shall say that God has dealt well with them, that he was not a hard master to them, to make them wait so long, and to let them suffer so much as they do. I will give you for this one excellent scripture, perhaps you have not considered the emphasis of its argument, it is Heb. xi. 16, "But now they desire a better country, that is, an heavenly: wherefore God is not ashamed to be called their God: for he hath prepared for them a city." The poor persecuted saints wandered up and down, were content to leave their own country, their estates here, and sought another country, a heavenly, but they had it not, their enemies prevailed over them, as if God had forsaken them; but "God is not ashamed to be called their God;" why? "for he hath prepared for them a city." Mark the force of the argument, "for he hath prepared for them a city." This city is the one referred to in the text I am now speaking of: sometimes it is described as a tabernacle, "The tabernacle of God shall come down from heaven;" sometimes as a city, sometimes as a country, as a kingdom, sometimes as an inheritance; here, "God hath prepared for them a city," that is, there is a glorious time for God's people, when they shall have the new Jerusalem come down from heaven unto them. Now then, saith God, though my people be in a suffering condition, "I am not ashamed to be called their God," I am not ashamed to own them, for I have glory enough for them: as if God would be ashamed that he should ever profess such an interest in this people, and they such an interest in him, if there were nothing in store for them, if there were not a time to recompense all their sufferings. As if a master should have a servant, or a prince a subject, and they suffer extremely, and have no help; but still when they expected aid, none should arrive, and when they think, Surely now it will come, still it should fail them; yet if you know that at such a day you shall be able to recompense them for all this, and to advance them and bring them to such honour that they will bless God that ever they were in your service, you will not be ashamed to own them. But if these servants shall suffer in your cause, and you have no time nor ability to recompense them, but they must suffer, and suffer for ever, you would be ashamed to own them. So God is pleased to speak here; Because I have prepared for them such a city, though they be in present persecution, I am not ashamed to own them for my people, and do not account it any dishonour to me, for there is a time coming that will answer all objections. This is the goodness of God.

They shall fear this goodness. Fear it; how?

In these several respects.

First, They shall admire "his goodness," and in their admirations stand even amazed at it; the fear of amazement shall possess them. 2 Thess. i. 10, when Christ shall come, "he shall come to be admired in all them that believe." In Luke v. 26, it is said, "They were all amazed, and glorified God, and were filled with fear, saying, We have seen strange things to-day." When this "goodness" of God shall come, all the saints shall stand admiring it with amazement, and say one unto another, We did heretofore hear of prophecies and promises, and we thought when they were opened to us, our hearts did burn within us; oh, they were blessed things! but now here is goodness we never thought of, this is higher and more glorious than we ever imagined. Thus they "shall fear the Lord and his goodness." You have a similar place in Jer. xxxiii. 9, "It shall be to me a name of joy, a praise and an honour before all the nations of the earth, which shall hear all the good that I do unto them: and they shall fear and tremble for all the goodness and for all the prosperity that I procure unto it."

Secondly, They shall upon this fall down and worship this God with fear. Oh how shall their hearts adore this God, because of this his goodness! As we read Exod. xxxiv., when God had told Moses that he would "make all his goodness pass before him;" when God came and "passed by before him, and proclaimed, The Lord, the Lord God, merciful and gracious, long-suffering, and abundant in goodness and truth, keeping mercy for thousands, forgiving iniquity and transgression and sin;" the text adds, When Moses heard this, he "made haste, and bowed his head and worshipped" before the Lord. Indeed nothing will cause a gracious heart to make more haste to worship God, than the beholding the glory and lustre of God's grace and goodness; then the heart will not stand dallying and trifling any longer, but will make haste to worship before the Lord. God often shows his greatness to you, and that convinces your consciences a little, and you think you must abandon your sinful courses; then temptation prevails over you again; but when God comes and makes known his goodness, then the heart stands out against the Lord no longer, but gives up itself to him in an everlasting covenant.

Thirdly, They shall fear to offend this goodness of God. It shall be a mighty engagement on their hearts to walk close with God. It is a sweet disposition indeed when the heart has been both humbled before God and his justice, and fears God and his goodness.

Obs. Whereas many will say, Oh the goodness of God will break our hearts, if ministers did preach only it; but when they preach the law, when we hear of terror, that hardens our hearts: take heed of this, there is more evil in it than you are aware. A truly gracious heart will fall down before any exhibition of the Lord, and it is not a good sign to be wrought upon only by the goodness of God, but may arise from much stubbornness of heart. Have you never known a perverse servant, or child, that as long as you are displeased with them, would resist you; but, perhaps, if you would yield a little, they would yield to you? Is this a good disposition? does it not arise from obstinacy in a child, or in a servant, or in a neighbour, that they will never yield to you till you yield to them? This is precisely the disposition of many; as long as they hear of God's greatness, and the terrors of the law, and God's justice, they are hardened; and why? because they stand out stoutly against God, notwithstanding his wrath is revealed from heaven. But, say they, when God's goodness is preached, then we yield; that is, except God will yield to them they will not yield to God. But when I can yield both ways, fear his goodness and his justice, then it is a sign of a gracious disposition indeed.

Fourthly, They "shall fear his goodness," so that they shall no longer slight nor abuse the goodness of God; they shall not do evil because God is good, but shall fear his goodness. We have a generation of men who, at this day, extremely abuse the goodness of God, even God's goodness in the gospel, in those blessed things revealed to us in Jesus Christ. As thus: we find this revealed in the gospel, that it is God that must work the will and the deed; the covenant of grace to be such, as that God does not only require, but work all for us: how is this goodness misinterpreted and abused! Therefore, say they, what need we do any thing? why do ministers urge people to duties? Your principle is good; the truth is good, that it is God that works all in the covenant of grace, but it is very absurd and vile, and an abuse of God's goodness, to infer that therefore you must not work together with the Lord as rational beings. Again, the gospel reveals to us "the righteousness of God in Christ," that we must not stand before God in our own, but in the righteousness of Christ; this principle is good, but how is it abused! false deductions and absurd consequences drawn from it: therefore say they, To make conscience of duties, what is it but legal? and they who do it, what are they but duty-mongers? Oh! wanton, wanton spirits, who do not fear God and his goodness, but abuse them both! Again, the Scripture tells us in the gospel, that all sins are pardoned to believers in Christ, all sins both great and small; "there is, therefore, now no condemnation to them that are in Christ Jesus," no, not one moment after they are once justified: this is God's goodness, and thou shouldst fear it: the principle is right, but it is vile to deduce as a consequence, that to preach that we must be humbled for sins is legal preaching; neither will these men ever confess their sins because of this goodness of God. This is to be wanton indeed, not to fear this goodness of God. Moreover the goodness of God in the gospel tells us, that the grace of God is strong, that the saints shall persevere, that those that are once in Christ shall never fall away; therefore say they, Let us indulge ourselves; why need we be careful of our ways, seeing the grace of God will carry us through? Oh! thus to abuse this goodness of God is wicked; the heavens may blush to behold it, and the earth tremble under it. But we have not so learned Christ; the more of the goodness of God in Christ that is made known to us, the more should we fear him.

The goodness of God in the gospel is so rich, that, the truth is, because the hearts of men are so vile, and so ready to abuse it, we are almost afraid to preach it. Oh! is this the fruit of the preaching of the gospel? Never was the gospel so clear as in England, and in no age as in this; and is this the fruit of all, that men should draw such absurd consequences from it, and go away harder from that which is the softening word? When we come to preach the goodness of the gospel, we come, I say, with fear, yea, trembling, lest it should cost the damnation of some soul. The preaching the goodness of God in the gospel certainly causes, ex accidente, the damnation of many a soul. Therefore, meanwhile, you who are God's saints, know how dearly God tendereth you, when he will have the goodness of the gospel preached to you though at the risk of the damnation of many a soul. You had need prize it therefore, and make a good use of it. Let this meditation cause you to improve to the uttermost what you hear of all the goodness of the Lord: That which I hear is costly to some, it costs the perishing of many a soul that I may have it; and though God see that many souls will be hardened by it, Yet, saith God, let them be hardened, these my servants shall not want it, though they perish for ever. When a man hath a thing in his house, and he hears that it cost dear, even the lives of many men, he has other thoughts of it than before. David had a reverent respect to the water of the well of Bethlehem, because procured at the hazard of men's lives. Learn then to fear God and his goodness.

Fifthly, In all rejoicing in and praising God for his goodness, there shall be a mixture of fear. They shall be well skilled in this mystery of godliness, when they enjoy so much of God's goodness, and are called upon to sing and rejoice, yet sing with a mixture of fear. Their hearts shall be very serious and spiritual in all their joy. It is very hard for us to rejoice in God's goodness, and not to have our hearts grow light and vain, to keep a day of thanksgiving with a serious spirit; for joy commonly causes vanity in the hearts of men. But now the goodness of God shall be so strong in their hearts, that though they shall seek and rejoice abundantly in God's goodness; yet with such an abundant mixture of fear, that their hearts shall be kept serious, holy, and spiritual in his service: thus, in Exod. xv. 11, when Moses was blessing God for his goodness in delivering the people out of Egypt, (which was a typical song, as appears in the Revelation, that bondage typifying antichristian bondage,) mark the expression, "Who is like unto thee, O Lord, among the gods? who is like thee, glorious in holiness, fearful in praises?" God is to be praised, but so praised, that his name must be "fearful in praises." Consider this in all your joyful celebration of the memorial of God's goodness; you must so rejoice and bless God, as to manifest this before all you converse with, that the name of God is fearful in the praises you offer to him: this a slight, trifling spirit cannot do. So Psal. lii. 6, "The righteous also shall see, and fear, and shall laugh at him." Mark what a mixture is here, "The righteous shall see, and fear, and laugh," he "shall rejoice," but "with trembling," Psal. ii. 11.

God much delights to have the glory of his goodness appear thus. We have much goodness of God at this day, and he calls us to fear him and his goodness: if we give him not his glory in this, he may soon call us to fear him and his greatness; to fear him and his justice; to fear him and his wrath. This is the argument now, "There is forgiveness with thee, that-thou mayest be feared." But how soon may God justly turn this, and oblige us to say, There is wrath, vengeance, sword, fire, blood, storm, an horrible tempest, with thee, therefore thou shalt be feared! Our consciences are ready to misgive us when we have any evil tidings, for we have much guilt on our spirits; we have had much goodness indeed from God, (who ever thought to have lived to see the goodness that you have seen?) but because you have not feared God and his goodness, this is the reason of your hearts misgiving at evil tidings, and saying, Oh, now God is coming against us with his wrath that he may be feared.

Something might be said to explain a little the difference between fearing God and his goodness, and fearing God and his wrath and justice in a legal way; but I shall only briefly observe,

1. Such a fear as enlarges the heart, is the fearing God and his goodness; other fear contracts it. We have an excellent text for this in Isa. lx. 1, compared with ver. 5: "Arise, shine; for thy light is come, the glory of the Lord is risen upon thee:" and so he goes on describing God's goodness, in reference to the times that we are speaking of; then adds, "Thou shalt see, and flow together, and thine heart shall fear, and be enlarged:" when the heart so fears that it is enlarged unto God, this is the fearing God and his goodness aright.

2. It is a fear that leads the heart to cling to God for ever; it drives not from God, but makes the heart cleave closer to him; such is the force of the Hebrew here, they shall fear to God and to his goodness: "I will put my fear in their hearts, that they shall not depart from me." This binds the heart to God.

3. This fearing God and his goodness works the heart to a high degree of sanctification. 2 Cor. vii. 1, "Having therefore these promises, let us cleanse ourselves from all filthiness of the flesh and spirit, perfecting holiness in the fear of God:" and Heb. xii. 28, "Wherefore we receiving a kingdom which cannot be moved, let us have grace whereby we may serve God acceptably with reverence and godly fear."

Lastly, It is a fear joined with love, whereas the other fear leads the heart to have hard thoughts of God. Beware of that fear of God that makes you to think hardly of him. In times of danger many begin to fear, and presently they wish they had never engaged themselves so much in ways that succeed so ill; and cry out of others, You would needs do thus, and you see the result. But the fear of God and his goodness, is joined with blessing God that ever you knew his ways and were engaged in them.

"In the latter days."

God is content to stay for that which is indeed his chief glory until the latter days, for though in these former days God has had glory, yet he has had but very little. Let this be an argument for our patience; though we have sufferings now, let us wait as God waiteth.

But "the latter days," when are they? The times of the gospel are generally called "the latter days;" but this, though it refers indeed to the whole time of the gospel, yet especially to the latter times of those latter days. If you would know what these latter days are, though I will not take upon me to give you the day, or week, or month, or year, yet I will show you that probably these "latter days" are at hand.

For understanding this, we are much assisted by what we have in Daniel concerning the four kingdoms, and the prophetic chronology; it comprises the time from the captivity of the Jews to that in which the counsel of God shall be fulfilled. You have there a description of four several monarchies, the Babylonian, Assyrian, Grecian, and Roman; now in the last of these, Daniel saith, chap. ii. 44, "shall the God of heaven set up a kingdom, which shall never be destroyed: and the kingdom shall not be left to other people, but it shall break in pieces and consume all these kingdoms, and it shall stand for ever." In this last (namely, the Roman) has the kingdom of Christ begun to appear already; but God tells Daniel, chap. xii. 13, "Thou shalt stand in thy lot at the end of the days." Now observe, the chief prophecy we have respecting the time of these latter days is contained in that expression of "time and times and half a time;" and compare with this Dan. vii. 25, "And they shall be given into his hand until a time and times and dividing of time," and Rev. xi. 2, "The holy city shall they tread under foot forty and two months," and ver. 3, The "witnesses shall prophesy a thousand two hundred and sixty days;" now a thousand two hundred and sixty days, are the days of a "time and times and half a time," or of three years and a half, and so are the days of forty-two months. Then the woman in the wilderness, Rev. xii. 6, shall be fed there a thousand two hundred and sixty days, still the same number; the witnesses shall prophesy a thousand two hundred and sixty days; the holy city shall be trodden under foot forty-two months; and the woman in the wilderness shall be there a thousand two hundred and sixty days. And again, Dan. xii. 11, "From the time the abomination that maketh desolate is set up, there shall be a thousand two hundred and ninety days;" a few days more, not many. You see then the Scripture prophecies of some great thing to be done at this time, at the end of which are these "latter days."

But all the difficulty consists in understanding when the three years and a half, or forty-two months, or one thousand two hundred and sixty days, begun; having discovered it, we may know when these latter days shall be. Brightman makes the one thousand two hundred and ninety days begin at Julian's time, when he would have set up the abomination, that is, the Jewish worship again, by rebuilding the temple; and reckoning one thousand two hundred and ninety days for one thousand two hundred and ninety years, his time by computation will fall about the year 1650. The other passage in the Revelation (and that in Daniel refers to the same) denotes the time that the churches shall be under the persecution of antichrist; for a thousand two hundred and sixty years the beast shall prevail, and the witnesses prophesy in sackcloth, and the woman abide in the wilderness.

But when did antichrist begin to reign?

For that observe, It must be at the time when the Roman empire was broken up, and the dragon resigned his power to the beast; when the power of the dragon that persecuted the Christians under the Roman empire was given to antichrist, so that they became subject to persecution under him: here the one thousand two hundred and sixty days begin.

That the Roman empire must be given up first, appears, 2 Thess. ii. 7, "For the mystery of iniquity doth already work: only he who now letteth will let, until he be taken out of the way;" that is, as expositors generally interpret it, when the power of the Roman empire is "taken out of the way," then shall that wicked one be revealed; there were many antichrists before, but then that wicked one that shall "exalt himself above all that is called God," shall have power to persecute the church. Hence it is observable, that the custom of the church was to pray for the continuance of the Roman empire, because they knew when that was broken antichrist would come. Now the dissolution of the Roman empire was at the raising up of those ten distinct governments, called in the Revelation, ten kings; and the raising up of those kings was about four hundred years after Christ; it is hard to fix on the precise year, so much difference exists in chronologers' computations; and after that period there must be one thousand two hundred and sixty days, that is, one thousand two hundred and sixty years. Make this computation, and compare all these passages together, and it would seem that the time cannot be distant, but that in the present century these latter days shall come, when the people of God and the Jews shall "return to Jehovah and David their king, and fear the Lord and his goodness." The nearer the time comes the more will these things be cleared: Dan. xii. 9, "Go thy way, Daniel: for the words are closed up and sealed till the time of the end;" none of the wicked shall understand, but the wise shall lay it to heart.

But one point remains, why the Scripture expresses this rather by so many days, than years? The reason is, because God would have his people think the time until his goodness should be revealed but short; if he had said they should be one thousand two hundred and sixty years under antichrist's persecution, it would have sounded harsher: No, saith he, it shall be but so many days (though flesh and blood may think even this time long); yet look upon it as days; it is but a short time to me, and it will be a short time to you; within one thousand two hundred and sixty days you shall be delivered from his tyranny, and then you shall have this voice from heaven, "The kingdoms of the earth are become the kingdoms of the Lord and of his Christ, and he shall reign for ever;" and then shall ye, together with the Jews, seek the Lord and David your king, and fear the Lord and his goodness.

Now, by God's goodness, we have gone through these three chapters. Tertullian saith, Adoro plenitudinem Scripturarum, I adore the fulness of the Scriptures. By searching thus into the Scriptures, we may come to see rich treasures in them, and so, like him, adore their fulness. How do we read over texts, as if they contained nothing! but certainly God has revealed much more of his mind in them than we are aware of: let us all then be in love with the study of the Scriptures.

CHAPTER IV.

Ver. 1. Hear the word of the Lord, ye children of Israel: for the Lord hath a controversy with the inhabitants of the land, because there is no truth, nor mercy, nor knowledge of God in the land.

IN this chapter we have,

I. A suit commenced.

II. The pleading of God.

III. Judgment pronounced.

IV. Exhortation to Judah to beware that she come not into the same condition.

V. Execution, God in his wrath giving up Ephraim to himself.

I. A suit commenced. Israel is cited: "Hear the word of the Lord, ye children of Israel."

Obs. 1. The knowledge that any truth is the word of the Lord, is a special means to prepare the heart to receive it with reverence and all due respect, even though it be hard and grievous to flesh and blood. It was a hard message that Hosea had to bring, to tell them of God's controversy; he therefore makes this preface, "Hear the word of the Lord." Hard truths are hardly borne; but when the authority of the infinite God appears in them, be they either for us or against us, our hearts must bow to them; they lay bonds upon the conscience, and bind over to eternal death those who reject them. 2 Chron. xxvi. 12, Zedekiah, a king, is charged with not humbling himself before the prophet Jeremiah. Though the prophet be never so poor and contemptible in himself, yet if he bring the word of the Lord, Zedekiah the king must humble himself before him.

Obs. 2. The nearness of a people to God, exempts them not from God's contending with them for sin. "Ye children of Israel." In this appellation God puts them in mind of the covenant he had made with them and they with him: You are not heathens, but the children of Israel, in covenant with me, a people near to me, yet I have a controversy with you. Neither should nearness to us exempt any from our contending with them. "If thy brother, the son of thy mother, or thy son, or thy daughter, or the wife of thy bosom, or thy friend, which is as thine own soul, entice thee secretly, saying, Let us go and serve other gods; thine eye shall not pity him, neither shalt thou spare, neither shalt thou conceal him; but thou shalt surely kill him; thine hand shall be first upon him to put him to death," Deut. xiii. 6, 8, 9.

Obs. 3. The nearer the relationship the more grievous is the controversy. "Hear the word of the Lord, ye children of Israel." It is a sad thing for one nation to have a controversy with another; much more for a people to be at controversy with itself; yet more sore and grievous is it when the controversy comes nearer, into the family, between husband and wife, between father and child, between dearest friends who were before to each other as their own souls: Prov. xviii. 19, "A brother offended is harder to be won than a strong city: and their contentions are like the bars of a castle."

"Hear ye." O prophet, saith Œcolampadius, what is it thou hast to say, that with so much earnestness thou callest to have the word of the Lord heard? The solemn message of the prophet to this people is, "The Lord hath a controversy with the inhabitants of the land."

The word רִיב translated "controversy," signifies a debate, or contention, and comes from רִיב contendere vel privatim vel coram iudice, to contend privately or before a judge. As in Exod. xxiii. 3, "Neither shalt thou countenance a poor man in his cause." The Septuagint render it επισας, iudicium. The same word is translated by them also εἰς, Job xxix. 16, where the word for "cause," is the same as here translated a "controversy." The Lord hath a cause to plead with this people; the prophet stands up for God to plead against them in his name, he pleads for the King, the King of heaven: so should all faithful ministers take heed that they be on God's side, pleading his cause, for they are God's sergeants at law, his attorneys, his solicitors. The king's lawyers are sworn that they shall never plead against him, nor take fee on the other side; and yet how many, even in the exercise of their ministry, show that they have taken fee on the other side! How many plead against God, against his sabbaths, against his ordinances, yea, plead sometimes against the power of godliness, against those things wherein the chief dignity and glory of God consists! Truly, the devil has not more cordial solicitors and pleaders for him than those who would be accounted the prophets of the Lord.

"The Lord." As if the prophet should say, Though you think you can make your cause good with me, and with Amos, and the other prophets, know you have not to deal with us; God will no longer stand pleading with you by his ministers, he will take the cause into his own hands, and will plead by his judgments. So the Lord tells the people, Gen. vi. 3, that his Spirit should no longer strive with them. What is that? That is, in the way of Noah's ministry; but that he would come and strive himself after another manner, by bringing the flood upon them.

Obs. 1. For God to take the controversy into his own hand, and to contend with them in a way of judgment, is most dreadful for sinners; "It is a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living God." You think ministers are harsh, and preach terrible things; but if you had to deal with God immediately, if he did not speak to you by man, but come himself and plead with you, you would find it much harder. When Job's friends were pleading with him, he could with them easily sustain his cause; but in chap. xxxviii. 2, God himself comes and speaks out of the whirlwind, "Who is this that darkeneth counsel by words without knowledge?" And Job answereth the Lord and saith, "Behold, I am vile," chap. xl. 4. And the Lord still pleading with him, he is constrained to exclaim, "I have heard of thee by the hearing of the ear; but now mine eye seeth thee: wherefore I abhor myself, and repent in dust and ashes," chap. xlii. 5, 6. In Psal. cxxx. 3, David uses similar language, "If thou, Lord, shouldst mark iniquities, O Lord, who shall stand?" The sense would have been complete thus, If thou, Lord, shouldst mark iniquities, who shall stand? There would have been a mighty emphasis in the word Jehovah; who shall stand, for it is thou, O Jehovah? but the word Lord is repeated, to show that the sight of having to deal with God in our sins, without a Mediator, is very terrible. If thou, Lord, shouldst mark, then, O Lord, who shall stand?

Obs. 2. Sin causes a most dreadful controversy between God and the soul, between God and a nation. For this, God comes to strive, to contend for his glory, and the sinner strives and contends against God: and here we may remark,

1. That God is infinitely above every sinful impenitent soul, and every sinful impenitent nation; vainly do they strive with their Maker. "Let the potsherd strive with the potsherds of the earth," Isa. xlv. 9. The Lord is far above them. And to intimate therefore the distance between God and us in this controversy, our text saith, "The Lord hath a controversy with the inhabitants of the land," poor earth-creeping creatures that have dwellings here below, whose houses are houses of clay, and God is the great God of heaven and earth.

2. The controversy that God has with a sinner is a just controversy, God has right on his side, and the injury done to him is great.

3. It is a controversy which we have begun; God did not begin it with us, but we began it with him, and must have the worst of it.

4. It is an old controversy, a controversy of our forefathers, a controversy which God has had with one generation after another, and we, as a wretched generation, stand forth to hold up the old controversy. As in England in the times of the barons there were wars for hundreds of years; and when one generation was gone, the generation after stood forth to hold up the controversy: so it has been between God and man; God has had a controversy with the children of men ever since the fall of Adam, and one generation after another has stood forth to hold up the controversy. And thou, wretched sinner, standest up in thy generation, in thy place, to sustain the controversy that mankind has had with God since his expulsion from Paradise.

5. It is a controversy which stirs up all the power and all the wrath of God against a sinner. A man who has a controversy with another, employs and exerts all the strength he has against his opponent; and if God have any power in him, it shall be put forth in making his cause good against a sinner: "If ye walk contrary unto me, I will walk contrary unto you;" my power, my wisdom, all mine attributes are against you, Lev. xxvi.

6. This controversy is a deadly controversy, one which strikes at our lives, at our souls, at our eternal state.

7. This is a controversy with God, who is determined to have satisfaction in some way or other for all the wrong we have done to him.

8. It is a controversy which only the Lord Christ, that great Mediator, that great Peace-maker, is able to make up. None can reconcile God and a sinner but Christ, God-man. He must stand before God to satisfy for the wrong the sin of man hath done unto him.

9. A controversy with him who has thee at infinite advantage, who has thee under his feet, and the point of the sword of his justice at thy heart.

10. A controversy which, if thou look not to it, is likely to prove an everlasting controversy. "I will not contend for ever, neither will I be always wroth: for the spirit should fail before me," Isa. lvii. 16. This

Quid dicitur eis, o propheta, qui tanta diligentia vocas ut audiat verbum Domini. Œcolamp. in locum.

Œcolampadius, what is it thou hast to say, that with so much earnestness thou callest to have the word of the Lord heard? The solemn message of the prophet to this is spoken to those who are in covenant with God, in regard of the lesser controversies which after their reconciliation may exist between God and them: but with thee who art yet in the great controversy that God has with sinful man, it may prove an everlasting controversy, if thou dost not look to it, and become reconciled to God in Christ. The Lord has appointed a certain period for thy coming in to make up thy peace with him, to "lay hold of his covenant;" if thou neglectest that time thou art lost, undone for ever. God will certainly overcome thee, God will have the day of thee, the Lord will overcome when he judgeth. Julian strove a great while against the Lord, but at length he was forced to acknowledge with his blood cast up into the air, Vicisti, Galilæe, vicisti, Thou hast conquered, O Galilean, thou hast conquered.

It is a vain thing for thee to stand out striving with this great God. Job xl. 2, "Shall he that contendeth with the Almighty instruct him?" So it is translated in your Bibles, but the original is perhaps better rendered by Pagnine and others, "Is there any wisdom," or any learning, "in contending with God?" any knowledge showed in that? No, certainly, there is no knowledge, no wisdom, in contending with the Almighty: our greatest wisdom is to fall down and be humbled before the Lord.

My brethren, this is no time to have any controversy with God, to stand out against him in ways of enmity. When such blackness of darkness is upon us, even storms of blood hanging over our heads, it surely is time to be at peace with Heaven: "Because there is wrath, beware lest he take thee away with his stroke," Job xxxvi. 18. The Lord is come forth from his place, he is pleading his cause, and now in the ways of his administration he declares, that he will have glory from his creature; he "hath sworn by himself, the word hath gone out of his mouth in righteousness, and shall not return, That to him every knee shall bow, every tongue shall swear." It is no time, therefore, now for us to have controversies with God, to have controversies with God and man both, with heaven, and earth, and with our own consciences. What shall become of us? "Be not thou a terror, O Lord, unto me," saith Jeremiah, "for thou art my hope in the day of evil." If God be a terror, and the days be evil, what will become of us?

Consider this, you who are so often in controversies with your neighbours, that God has a great controversy with you; and satisfy not yourselves with this, that you are able to clear yourselves before men, for what avails that, so long as this controversy continues?

It is wisdom to make an end of it betimes: "The beginning of strife is as when one letteth out water; therefore leave off contention before it be meddled with," Prov. xvii. 14. The beginning of strife, especially with God, is most dreadful; if thou go on but a little while, thy heart may be most desperately set against God, and for ever left to strive against him, never to come in and be humbled before him. This is the reason (I verily believe) of the horrid wickedness of some amongst us; we wonder that they, one after another, should dare to venture on such horrid wickednesses. At first, it may be, there was some dreadful breach between God and their souls when they were young, and they fell (though the world perhaps knew it not) into some foul and abominable sin; and having departed so far from God then, they now go on and fight against the God of heaven in such a desperate manner as no age but this can afford us any examples of. God has a controversy with nations also for their sin. Those who are to sue for God may well charge us, that the Lord has a controversy with the inhabitants of the land at this day. If ever he had a controversy with a people he has it with us. The Lord has a fearful controversy with us, most fearful things to charge this land with. I might instance some that are more peculiar to this nation than to any other on the face of the earth.

1. The hatred, contempt, and persecution of the power of godliness. No nation on the face of the earth has ever had such guilt in this respect as England; persecuting faithful and godly ministers of the same religion, holding with them all fundamental truths, yea, all the articles of religion and every point of doctrine; I say, never any nation was guilty of such persecution as we; silencing many for mere trifles; persecuting others for keeping the sabbath. It is true, other countries are loose in their observation of the sabbath, but no country on the face of the earth has ever persecuted the keeping of it as England has done; and that by the countenance of those in authority. We are sinners, and others are sinners, but the Lord has a controversy with us for these things in a more special manner than with any people on the face of the earth this day.

2. This controversy which the Lord has against us, is an old controversy too. I may apply that which God speaks, Jer. xxxii. 31, concerning the city of Jerusalem, unto us, "This city hath been to me as a provocation of mine anger and of my fury, from the day that they built it, even unto this day." So, ever since the Reformation commenced have we been a provocation to the Lord.

3. A general controversy, even with all sorts; a controversy with our kings and princes, with our nobles, our gentry, our cities, countries, universities, common people; with wicked people, with godly people, with the saints, with all.

4. It is the most unkind controversy on our part that any nation was ever engaged in; for God had dealt with us in a way of love more than with any nation in the world besides, he made us even as "the dearly beloved of his soul," and yet, for all this, we have contended against him. This unkindness goes even to the very heart of God.

5. The Lord has sent many faithful ambassadors to plead his cause with us. He never to any nation on the earth sent more faithful ambassadors, that have pleaded his cause with more power and evidence of the Spirit, than to us in England; yet we have stood out.

6. We have had as many offers of mercy as ever people had. Many a time have we been upon the brink of judgment, and the bowels of God have been towards us, and he has said, "It shall not be."

7. The Lord has been as patient, and forbore as long as ever he did with any people before he came to execution. Where do we read of a people that has had, as we, nearly a hundred years' peace? no where that I know of in all the Scripture.

8. The Lord has had us at advantages as much as can be; we have broken as many treaties as ever people broke. When we seemed to yield to God, we have but flattered him with our lips and dealt dissemblingly with him.

9. God has broken the backs of others with whom he has had a controversy. He has had a controversy with Germany, and how has he dealt with it? It is reported that in Germany, when the war was but twenty or thirty miles off, they went on in their trading, and followed their businesses, buying and selling, and hoped that they should be safe; but God came in his judgments, and desolated Germany. Thus is he beginning to deal with us. Is not some part of England at this day as desolate as Germany itself?

10. Those that knew most of God's mind, have been so afraid of this controversy, that they have fled for fear of the wrath of God; and we have slighted, jeered them for it, ascribed it to their foolish timorousness and melancholy conceit: the Lord now seems to justify their fear

The Lord is now for the present out against us in as dreadful a way of wrath as ever he was against any people of the earth. I never read in Scripture nor in history of a more dreadful wrath of God against a people, all things considered, than is against us at this day. Amos vii. 4, "The Lord called to contend by fire;" surely the Lord does it at this day, he calls to contend with England by fire, in a most dreadful way; and who knows what the end shall be? That he has a most dreadful controversy against England, will appear if we further consider,

1. That a people complaining of bondage heretofore, yet, when God offered deliverance, should be so far left of him as to prefer making themselves and their posterity slaves. Surely God has a dreadful controversy against us, it were else impossible that such a thing should be in the hearts of men. Men love liberty, and groan under bondage: we did groan but a few years ago, and the Lord was coming to help us, and yet we are now so left of God that we even turn again to our former bondage, and would have our ears bored that we might be perpetual slaves, Exod. xxi. 6; Psal. xl. 6.

2. We not only turn again to bondage, but do so out of a spirit of enmity against the yoke of Jesus Christ. This is the very ground of it; in a great part of the kingdom, whatever yoke they have upon them, they are resolved they will not have the yoke of Christ, out of a spirit of enmity against the godly party, who desire and endeavour reformation.

At the beginning of this parliament, when we began to hope for some liberty and reformation, what joy was there generally in the kingdom! all men agreed together; but when the wicked and carnal began to see that their godly neighbours rejoiced and blessed God that their desires were being fulfilled, presently they turn, out of a spirit of malice against them; Rather than they shall rejoice, rather than they shall be gratified, we will turn back again to the former bondage, and we will stand and oppose that which heretofore we rejoiced in. They have therefore turned malignants against that cause which a man would wonder that ever rational men should oppose. But there is also a spirit of malice against Christ and his ordinances: men would enjoy their lusts; they think if reformation come they should not have them with their former liberty; hence arises the opposition of the gentry and others in the country. Surely God has a controversy with us.

3. That men should so vilely desert those whom they have chosen and trusted, and who have been faithful, those worthies in parliament, who have ventured their lives for them; basely and unworthily now to desert them, is one of the greatest judgments of God upon the hearts of men. If they complain of them now, they would have complained much more of them if they had complied. Suppose the parliament had made up a patched reformation and a crazy peace, liable to be broken on every occasion, would not the people of the land have cried out of their unfaithfulness? But now, when they venture themselves and labour so hard for a sound peace, to be deserted! An unworthy generation, a generation that we have cause to fear is become the generation of God's wrath and the people of his curse. People are affected according to success; we complain of those in parliament because of some difficulties in the work, yet if they had not done what they did they would have been complained of much more. So of ministers: sometimes ministers speak and stir up people because their consciences tell them they would be unfaithful to their country and to the cause of God if they did not; and forthwith men call them, as they did Luther, the trumpets of sedition and rebellion; whereas, on the other side, if they had said nothing, then the cry would have been, that they had betrayed their country, and that they were not so faithful in their places as they should, and therefore people were so bad as they were. Thus hard it is for God or man to please people.

But further, that not only the people, but that so many nobles, and some members even of the parliament, should desert their brethren, and join with papists, French, and Walloons. Not long since, a company of vile wretches were gathered together to fight against our brethren of Scotland; yet these people, vile as they were, could not by any means be induced to fight against them. But now, not the vile ones, but nobles, knights, and gentry, can be brought to fight against the parliament, their own brethren. Is not here a mighty hand of God against us? Could this ever be if God had not a dreadful controversy against England?

4. That men should be so blinded as to think the protestant religion should be maintained by an army of papists, the laws and liberty of the subject, by an army of delinquents and strangers; yea, that the king with papists, delinquents, French, and Walloons, should better maintain the liberty of the subject and the protestant religion, than with the parliament; is not the hand of God upon the people of this land when they believe this? Are they not infinitely besotted? can we think that men ended with reason should do this? Surely not, if the judgment of God rested not fearfully on their souls.

5. God surely contends fearfully with us when he suffers such an ill cause to prosper and attain to such a height. Both England and the countries around us stand amazed at this success. Surely the Lord is against us, or else it could not have been.

6. When there exists a design so desperate, so long maturing, carried on by such means, and now at such a time breaking forth with such violence, and yet men cannot see it. The track of the design is as apparent as the sun at noon-day, and by comparing one thing with another we may clearly see how it has proceeded step by step. Would you not think it a besotting thing, if there should be a train of gunpowder laid along the streets from some place to the parliament house to blow it up, and yet that men should pass by and say, they see no such thing? Certainly the design against our religion and state, to bring us under tyranny and slavery, is as evident and plain in its progress, as ever was a train of gunpowder laid to a place that men desired to blow up; and yet men see it not. Surely God's hand is out against us.

7. That we should have so little fruit of our prayers as we have at this day, yea, that God should seem to be angry with the prayers of his people. This argues a fearful controversy. And in this one particular amongst others; what prayers in England have been sent up to God for the Palsgrave's children! and that now, instead of answering our prayers, God should send two arrows, as it were, out of those loins to do us mischief, that it should come from them for whom England has done so much, and sent up so many prayers to God; that they in return for all this should come hither to make havoc of the kingdom, surely proves that the hand of God is out against us.

8. That our brethren should be so spoiled, and ourselves in such danger of drinking the dregs of the cup, yet where are our hearts? The judgment of God is upon the hearts of men, that they stir not and act like men, but see their brethren spoiled before them; and in the mean time, all that keeps them quiet is only that they hope they shall be the last. God's hand is upon the hearts of men, else this could not be. Could one ever have thought that Englishmen could have borne this? If one had told them before that an army of papists should rise up with French, Walloons, and Irish, to spoil the kingdom, to destroy our brethren, would one have ever imagined that Englishmen should have borne it, and stirred no more than they have done? You talk indeed of this and that, and of going forth every fourth man; but all such resolutions and such great words generally fall to the ground, as if men were willing and content to lay down their necks upon the block. Surely the guilt of the blood of our brethren may justly come upon us, and God may have a controversy with us for suffering it to be spilled.

9. That God should put so many opportunities of mercy into our hands, and we neglect all, manifests the hand of God to be against us, and is a fruit of his controversy with us.

10. That God himself should take away our opportunities, that when we are nigh to deliverance he should drive us back, is an argument of a heavy controversy indeed. Numb. xiii., when the people were come very near to Canaan, and were even ready to take possession, God resolved against them, that none but Caleb and Joshua should enter, and they were beaten back again: and in chap. xiv. 33, it is said, that the people, when they heard this, mourned greatly, for they saw the hand of God out against them. The truth is, we have been on the very borders of Canaan. O! what an opportunity God put into our hands in the west! I say not we lost it, but there God's own hand showed itself against us; Bristol then might have been saved, but God would not. And so when we were even near deliverance God seemed to drive us back, as if saying to us, I approve not, I have somewhat more to say to this generation; it may be I may show mercy afterward to their young ones, but against this my wrath shall be let out. Surely we may be afraid, from the ways of God's present administration, lest this should be in God's heart. However, let us consider it, and mourn greatly before the Lord. God "hath a controversy with the inhabitants of the land."

It is no time now to have controversies one with another, to be wrangling one with another about matters of opinion. It is time for us now to lay down all our private controversies, and fall to making up the controversy with our God. It is no time now for brethren to strive with brethren, but to strive and wrestle with God in prayer. If we have any strength with us, let it not be spent in contending one with another, but let all our strength be spent in seeking to make peace with our God. It is said of the Romans, that they had a temple of Concord, and none were to go to offer any further sacrifice, till they had first offered in that temple. The Lord expects the same of us; we should agree one with another, lay down all our own controversies, and then give up ourselves, as one man, to this great work of making up our controversy with him. If two chickens be fighting and the kite come near, they will leave pecking one another and run to the hen for shelter. We stand pecking and snarling one at another, and many, that say they will do thus and thus for the public cause, take exception against this man and that man, and at this thing and that thing, and so let their private grudges come in and draw them off. O, let us not be quarrelling now the kite is coming near, let us run and shelter ourselves under the protection of God, by making our peace with him.

As for the controversy that is this day between the king and us, we can in that appeal to God, that there is no just cause the king should contend with us, as we only desire to deliver ourselves from tyranny and slavery. Our privileges and liberties are dear to us, they are our right as truly as his honour is his. That which he inherits was his forefathers', and that which his forefathers, his predecessors, inherited, came at first from the people, who set up such a family to rule and govern them; and certainly they never set it up but for the public good, not for their misery and ruin. We can appeal to God, that we desired nothing else but to live peaceably and to serve God in our land, enjoying only what God, and nature, and the laws of our land had made our own. We know the relation between him and us, and the bond is mutual; and if there be any thing done now that perhaps cannot be justified by any positive, explicit law of the land, let men know that yet it may be justified by the very light of nature and by the law of arms. It cannot be imagined but if those that ought to be the protectors of the law, against law deal so hardly with us, that we must have recourse then to the law and light of nature; it is impossible this should be otherwise, and this God himself approves.

Whatever, therefore, becomes of this controversy between him and us, whether reconciliation or not, yet we have peace in this, that what we have done in resisting a deluge of misery that was coming upon us, if we had not done it, our consciences would have upbraided us, generations to come would have cursed us, the nations around us, yea, our very enemies, would have scorned us for our base cowardliness, for our sordid spirits; would have derided us as an unworthy generation, that could see itself and posterity sinking into misery and brought under slavery, and out of base fear and sluggish litherness, and effeminate softness of spirit, could suffer all to be brought into bondage to the humours and lusts of a few men. We can, therefore, with comfort and boldness stand at God's tribunal, and plead the uprightness of our hearts and justness of our cause in this controversy, whatever ensues. But in the controversy that God has against us, there we fall down at his feet, and acknowledge ourselves guilty before him; yea, we come with sackcloth upon our loins, and ashes on our heads, with ropes on our necks, and plead mercy only for our lives. And this is the work that we have to do in all the days of our humiliation, to seek to make an atonement between God and our souls and the land, in regard of that dreadful controversy he has against us. Now, blessed God, because thou tellest us in thy word, "Because I will do this, therefore prepare to meet thy God, O Israel;" thou threatenest hard, great and sore evils, and thou callest now to us, Because thou wilt do this, England, O England, prepare to meet thy God; we come, (oh that this might be our answer,) we come, Lord, and meet thee with our souls bowed towards thee, with our hearts bleeding that we have provoked thee to cause so much bloodshed of our brethren amongst us. O Lord, our hearts are open to thee, and with trembling spirits we cry to the Lord, What wilt thou have us do? If thou proceed against us in thy controversy, we are undone, we are undone. O Lord, forgive; O Lord, arise and be merciful, we beseech thee; for by whom shall Jacob rise, for he is small? by whom shall the people arise? by whom shall the power of godliness and thine ordinances be maintained?

How happy were we (think some) if the controversy between the king and us were at an end, that we might have peace! Oh if the people were happy that were in such a case, how happy the people that were at peace with the King of heaven! If the controversy between God and us were at an end we should be happy indeed. The Lord and the land is at a controversy, and this makes us cry out unto God; but yet woe unto us! here is the misery, we still keep our sins that cause the controversy. Jer. xxxv., "Will the Lord reserve his anger for ever? will he keep it unto the end?" mark what the answer is, "Behold, thou hast spoken and done evil things as thou couldest." Thus you have said; but what is the fruit of this? You have done evil as you could. We in the days of our fasts cry, Lord, wilt thou reserve thine anger for ever? wilt thou keep thine anger unto the end? Behold, thus we speak, but we continue to do evil as we can. "We wait for light," saith Isa. lix. 9, 10, "but behold obscurity; for brightness, but we walk in darkness. We grope for the wall like the blind." We indeed grope as if we had no eyes, and we stumble at noon-day as if it were night. Men to this day are ready to cry out and say, What shall we do? as if the way were not clear before us what we should do. The way is clear enough if we had hearts, but "we grope as if we had no eyes, and we stumble at noon-day as in the night." In many places of the kingdom they "roar all like bears," and they have cause to do so; for they are miserably spoiled, their wives ravished, their houses plundered, themselves imprisoned: and for the rest of us, "we mourn sore like doves," night and day; and "we look for judgment, but there is none; for salvation, but it is far off from us:" mark what follows, "For our transgressions are multiplied before thee," (there is the ground of that controversy between God and us,) "and our sins testify against us, for our transgressions are with us." Surely, my brethren, God is willing to be at peace with England again; the controversy is great and sore, yet we may confidently declare that the Lord is yet willing to be at peace with England, and the sufferings of England go as near the heart of God as ours. Oh that we knew then what it is that is the great makebate between God and us, that we might get rid of it! Would you know it? In 2 Sam. xx. 21, Joab saith, Deliver us Sheba the son of Bichri, and we will depart from the city and go every one unto his tent. If amongst us delinquents were punished as they ought, if the hearts of people were prepared to have the remainders of superstition and idolatry cast out, if they were willing to receive Jesus Christ as King among them, the sound of retreat would soon be heard, the controversy would soon be at an end; and except this be the foundation of our peace, either there will be no peace at all, or it will not hold long. In our raising of forces there used to help ourselves and our brethren, (seeing we pretend we will do more than before, and it is time we should if we be not a people destined to destruction and ruin,) he sure we begin here, let us do more than ever we did before to make up this controversy with God. It is reported of Achior, one of Holofernes' captains, that he counselled Holofernes to inquire first, whether the Jews had offended their God, before he attempted to make war against them; for if they had, he then assured him that that would be their ruin, and that he might go up and overcome them; but if he could not hear that they had sinned against their God, it was in vain for him to strive against them. Truly, it concerns us nearly to make up our peace with God, that when our adversaries come out against us they may not indeed be made use of to avenge God's quarrel upon us, for then they will thus easily improve all their advantages, and say, that they, indeed, are not come out against us without the Lord. Every victory they now get, they are ready to flatter themselves, and say, that God fights against us, and God approves them; and tell us, the reason they prevail is, because God is against us; and so we know Rabshakch did, though a foul railer: "Are we come up without the Lord?" said he. And the enemies of David spake against him, "saying, God hath forsaken him; persecute and take him: for there is none to deliver him," Psal. lxxi. 10, 11. Thus they will be ready to say upon every occasion, The Lord has forsaken them, let us persecute and take them. And certainly, if the Lord should suffer them to prevail, many of them would think they did God good service by slaying and rooting out the generation of God's people that is here in England, and would be confident that it was the mind of God that they should be rooted out. Therefore we had need look to it to make up our peace with God, that the controversy between him and us may not prove to be their victory.

Obs. 5. Men should be willing that the cause that is between them and their inferiors should be pleaded. God having to deal with poor earthen creatures, might presently have let his wrath out against them and destroyed them. But mark, God is willing to have his cause pleaded with vile creatures, so that all the while he is pleading there is time and space for them to come in; as if a controversy be between husband and wife, though the one be superior and the other inferior, they think it right to debate it between themselves with meekness and love. Job, chap. xxxi. 13, professed he did not despise the cause of his man-servant, when he contended with him, but he would have that pleaded and made out. Jehovah, the mighty God, condescends to put his cause to a suit, he will not pass sentence upon poor creatures till it come to a trial. Be not then surly and scornful towards your inferiors.

Obs. 6. whatsoever mercy you have from God, you are to look upon it as a fruit of God's faithfulness to you, (if you be God's,) and as a ground of your obedience to him, and his pleading with you if you walk not answerable to it. "The inhabitants of the land." The inhabitants of the land; what land? The inhabitants of the land of Canaan, a controversy with them! Mark, God fulfilled his promise in bringing them into the land of Canaan, and now he pleads with them for the forfeiture of their promise. Psal. cv. 44, 45, he tells them, that he had given them the lands of the heathen, "that they might observe his statutes and keep his laws;" that was their condition. God fulfilled his part by bringing them into the land, but when they were in the land they minded not their part. You know, God often charged them when they came into the land to do this and that, and they promised they would do it, but when they were once brought into the land they forgot it, and forsook God. God now comes and pleads with the inhabitants of this land; as if he should say, I have done my part in bringing you into the land, now I come to plead with you for breaking your promise and covenant.

"The inhabitants of the land." Jerome has another note upon it, but as it is farther off, I will only name it. "Rightly," saith he, "are they called to answer and to judgment who are the inhabitants of the land, and do not look upon themselves as sojourners and strangers in the land; but he that can truly say with the prophet, 'I am a pilgrim and a stranger here,' such a one can never do that which may cause God to have a controversy against him. The reason why men do that which causes God to have a controversy with them, is because they look upon themselves as possessors of the land, and not as pilgrims and strangers." But this is too far off.

II. The pleading of God. A suit first is entered against a man; when the court day comes, there is calling for a declaration, the lawyer declares: God does so, and the prophet is God's lawyer, and here are three articles put in this declaration, "Because there is no truth, no mercy, no knowledge of God in the land."

Obs. 1. God contends not with a people without a cause. How many are there that strive and contend one with another without any cause at all! they vex and rage, contend and sue, and great controversies exist, great dust is raised; but if we sift the matter, we can see just nothing, they themselves know no cause, they can give no rational account of all their pleading one against another. As David said to Eliab, his eldest brother, 1 Sam. xvii. 29, when he came and wrangled with him, "What have I now done? Is there not a cause?" Eliab's spirit was up through his envy; but, saith David, Have not I a cause for what I did? Thus many have their spirits up, chiding and wrangling, but examine the cause, and they can show none at all. How many bitter spirits go about like mad dogs, snarling at every one, even at those they know not, with whom they had never any thing to do, yet railing upon them every where! Ask them, Do you know the man? can you prove any thing against him? The truth is, they are not able to make good what they say, only there is a general report that such and such men do thus and thus, and they bite and snarl, and rage against them, but after all they know no cause. Such men, they say, disturb the kingdom and trouble the people. The foundations of the earth are out of order, but what have the righteous done? You would think, when you hear such railings against such men, that they were the most monstrous men upon earth; but examine what it is that they have done, and there is nothing. God does not so with you; God never contends with man but for a just cause.

Obs. 2. God contends not against a people for little things. When God saith he "hath a controversy with the inhabitants of the land," it is not for trifles, for ordinary infirmities, for daily transgressions, but for great, notorious sins. Not that little things do not deserve a controversy, but it is from the virtue and fruit of the covenant that this comes to pass; in others that are not in covenant, little things make a controversy, but between God's children and himself little things make not a controversy. But men are of froward spirits, every trifle is enough to make a controversy between them. Yea, usually the greatest controversies between nearest friends is some trifle or other. Do a man and his wife live lovingly and sweetly many years, and yet fall out afterwards? Is there a bitter controversy? Examine it, it is but about some toy. I could give you examples in histories of bitter controversies between nearest friends on small and trivial grounds. Camerarius tells a story of two brethren, who walking out in a star-light night, one of them said, Would I had a pasture as large as this element; and the other, Would I had as many oxen as there be stars. Says the other again, Where would you feed these oxen? In your pasture, replied he. What, whether I will or no? Yea, said he, whether you will or no. What, in spite of me? Yes, said he. And thus it went on from word to word, till at length each sheathed his sword in the other's bowels. This verifies that saying of James, chap. iii. 5, "Behold how great a matter a little fire kindleth!" So it is in many families: sometimes a look is the beginning of a great controversy: one thinks such a one does not look lovingly upon him, and then he begins to suspect that things boil within him; afterward some words come forth that seem to argue discontent, and then that word begets another, and so a miserable breach arises in a family. It is an argument that these people have gunpowder spirits, when a little spark of fire so quickly blows them up. Truly, in the controversy here in England, the ground of it at the first beginning was little enough on our parts; and had there not been a desperate design in our adversaries, it were impossible that such a little beginning should ever have attained to such a height. But God does not so, they are great things for which he "hath a controversy with the inhabitants of the land."

But what is the declaration? "No truth, nor mercy, nor knowledge of God in the land." These three, but especially the first, very nearly concern us.

First, "No truth." God is a God of truth, he is true in all his ways. He justly pleads with them that have dealt falsely with him. "No truth;" no reality in their religion; that is something, but that is not all. God comes upon them for the breaches first of the second table; for they are more convincing, and more likely to affect the conscience of a natural man, than matters of religion. If you speak to them concerning sins in matters of religion, they will say they acknowledge the true God, and they worship him. Well, therefore the prophet here begins first with the second table, concerning the want of truth between man and man; as if he should say, Talk what you will concerning your worshipping the true God, there is "no truth" between one another, you deal falsely and cruelly, and are merciless to your brethren; never therefore talk of religion and of acknowledging the true God.

Obs. 3. That it is in vain for any man to talk of his religion, if he make no conscience of the second table as well as the first. For a man to talk of praying and hearing sermons, if he be cruel and hard-hearted, and false in his dealings, the Lord rejects all such, let him talk what he will.

"No truth" in your dealings one with another. First, there is abundance of flattery amongst you. You flatter one another in your sin, you do not deal unfeignedly one with another. You flatter your princes, and your princes have little truth in their courts. It was once said, All things were plentiful in the court except truth. And this is the unhappiness of great men, that those about them usually deal falsely with them, telling them that their bloodshedding and ruining of kingdoms is but the maintaining of their just honour and prerogative. I have read of Dionysius's flatterers, that when he spat upon the ground they would lick it up, and then tell him, that that spittle was sweeter than any ambrosia and nectar they ever tasted, merely to please him: and so you have many near great men, who, though they see them do things never so abominable, things that make never so great breaches between God and them, between them and the people, yet tell them, that they do more bravely than ever any of their ancestors did. "There is no truth."

"Truth" here some take for justice; and so it is sometimes taken in Scripture. Zech. viii. 16, "Speak ye every man the truth to his neighbour; execute the judgment of truth and peace in your gates." As if he should say, You do not execute judgment upon malignants that are in your power; you speak of raising arms to fetch in delinquents, but you execute not judgment upon those that you have in their hands; you will have God in a solemn manner to be blessed because he has delivered you from them, but judgment is not executed in truth as it should be. Nor "no mercy," that is, you show no mercy to the innocent; you talk of indulgence, but your indulgence to delinquents is cruelty to innocents. Oh how many of our brethren, in Oxford and other places, suffer most dreadful things because these here enjoy so much liberty and favour! So there is neither mercy to the innocent nor justice to the guilty.

But the special thing here intended is, That you are not true in your dealings, nor in the trust committed to your charge. There is no equity in your dealings. Isa. lix. 14, "And judgment is turned away backward," (it is turned upon those that it should be executed upon,) "and justice standeth afar off." If one be greater than another, the meanest shall come under the stroke of justice and be executed, and the greater not. And "truth is fallen in the street." How comes that in? Thus, as if he should say, It is true, they that are in authority will not execute judgment and justice, but are not the common people faithful in their dealings one with another? No, "truth is fallen in the street." This seems to refer to the multitude. "And equity cannot enter." The word here translated "equity," comes from one which signifies a thing that is just before one: as if he should say, Those very things that one would think the plainest and most evident, that are just before us, that have so much equity and reason in them; yet these things cannot enter into their hearts, nor be entertained, there is such a general confusion and corruption among the people. And is not this in a great measure our condition at this time?

There is "no truth," they are false in the trust committed to their charge. Oh, here is a controversy indeed that God may have against us. Was there ever a time, that either England or any other country knew, when there was so much falseness in men in the trust committed to them? All things in Israel at this time were come into such confusion, that, through the falseness of men, things of the greatest consequence were betrayed. It is a sign of God's fearful wrath upon our nation, that there is no truth in men, when people are left to the treachery and perfidiousness of others; that persons of whose truth we thought ourselves confident, nay, would have ventured our lives on it, yea, such as a long time before were faithful to admiration, yet at last, when they think they may suffer, they will betray all the trust that is reposed in them, and venture even their own undoing rather than endure further hazard. Such cursed selfishness is there in men that have not the grace and true fear of God to balance their hearts; they will even betray God himself, and a whole kingdom, for their own private ends. But what an unworthy thing is this, when so much mischief may ensue! It is as if a man should set a house on fire to roast an egg: what are men's own particular ends in comparison of a kingdom? not so much as an egg in comparison of a house. This was the complaint in Micah's time of Judah, as well as of Israel here: (Micah was contemporary with Hosca:) "Trust ye not in a friend, put ye not confidence in a guide: keep the doors of thy mouth from her that lieth in thy bosom. A man's enemies are the men of his own house," Micah vii. 5, 6. But though many of them are thus corrupt, and there is no truth in them, are there not some of them better? Mark the 4th verse: "The best of them is as a brier: the most upright is sharper than a thorn hedge." In evil times you find those in whom you most confide, so perverse in some of their ways, that if you go to them for shelter, they will prick you; even those men that you most esteem, and from whom you expect to receive most. And this, indeed, is the day of the perplexity of a kingdom; what shall we do in this case? Mark the 7th verse: "Therefore I will look unto the Lord; I will wait for the God of my salvation; my God will hear me." As if he should say, If I look to man I have little help or comfort there, the best of them is a brier; if I trust in men, I see what they will do, verily, every man is altogether vanity; therefore our condition is very sad and miserable; Lord, what shall we do? "I will look unto the Lord; I will wait for the God of my salvation: my God will hear me." Men cannot save me; God will hear me, though they will not.

God's controversy with covenant-breakers, with those that betray their trust, is very dreadful. I will cite an example or two out of the Scripture and out of history.

First, when there was a famine in the days of David three years together, David would know why it was, and God gave him this answer, That it was "for Saul, and for his bloody house, because he slew the Gibeonites," 2 Sam. xxi. Because Saul would not keep to the Gibeonites the trust that was promised them, God therefore brings a famine upon the whole land for three years together. I beseech you, mark the aggravation of God's displeasure against any that break trust. First, this promise was not made by Saul, but by Saul's progenitors, above three hundred years before this time: and to whom was it made? unto a heathenish people, to the Gibeonites; and this promise was obtained by craft, they deceived Joshua. Secondly, it was a promise made them without asking counsel of God, Josh. ix. 14. A promise, too, that was against the mind of the congregation; ver. 18, "All the congregation murmured against the princes." Thirdly, when Saul slew the Gibeonites, he did it not from a perfidious spirit, but with a good intent, for so saith 2 Sam. xxi. 2, "He sought to slay them in his zeal to the children of Israel," because he thought that the Gibeonites remaining amongst them would, perhaps, prove some hindrance to the good of Israel. Fourthly, this work of God comes not upon Saul then when he broke the trust, but upon his posterity afterward, and that shows the wrath to be greater. Lastly, it comes so upon them as that it will not be appeased till it has their lives: you may see then how determined God is to punish promise-breakers.

Another example as remarkable is in Ezek. xvii. 15. When Zedekiah the king of Judah had made a covenant with the king of Babylon, he broke it, and "rebelled against him in sending his ambassadors into Egypt, that they might give him horses and much people. Shall he prosper?" saith the Lord, "shall he escape that doeth such things? or shall he break the covenant, and be delivered?" This covenant was made with a wicked man, with a tyrant, and yet God calls it his oath and his covenant, ver. 18; and with what an emphasis does God speak this! "He despised the oath by breaking the covenant, when, lo, he had given his hand;" yea, ver. 16, God professeth it shall cost him his life: "As I live, saith the Lord God, surely in the place where the king dwelleth that made him king, whose oath he despised, and whose covenant he brake, even with him, in the midst of Babylon, he shall die;" yea, further, God swears against him, and that by his own life, ver. 19: "Therefore thus saith the Lord God, As I live, surely mine oath that he hath despised, and my covenant that he hath broken, even it will I recompense upon his own head;" further, God tells him, all the strength that he had got, and all his policy and cunning devices, should not help him: ver. 20, "I will spread my net upon him, and he shall be taken in my snare, and I will bring him to Babylon, and will plead with him there for his trespass that he hath trespassed against me;" and lastly, the wrath of God shall not only be upon him, but upon all those that joined with him and abetted him in the breaking of this covenant: ver. 21, "All his fugitives with all his bands shall fall by the sword, and they that remain shall be scattered towards all winds." I know not two scriptures more full for God's being set to contend with men for breach of promise. Oh! take heed, all you that are intrusted with any public charge, that you break not covenant.

And as you have examples of this in the Scripture, so there is also an example or two in history exceedingly to the point. Rodolphus set his hand to a covenant with Henry IV., which he afterward broke; and when his right hand was obliged to be amputated, his conscience accused him: "Oh," saith he, "this is that right hand that subscribed the covenant, and now God revenges the breach of it upon this right hand." But above all, that part in the history of the Hungarians is the most remarkable, concerning Udislaus the king of Hungary, and Amurath the Great Turk. In it we are told that Udislaus making war with Amurath contrary to promise, when the Turks were about to be worsted; Amurath having with him the covenant made between the king of Hungary and him, and seeing himself put to the worse, plucked the covenant out of his bosom, and with his eyes fixed toward heaven, spake thus. "This, O Jesus Christ, is the covenant that thy Christians have struck with me; O holy Jesus, they have done it in thy name, and sworn by thy Majesty, and yet they have violated it; they have perfidiously denied their God. Now, O Jesus, if thou art a God, as they say, and as we guess thou art, revenge this wrong that is done unto me and unto thyself upon these that have violated their faith and promise, and show unto us that know not thy name, that thou art an avenger of such as betray their trust, and then we shall know thee to be a God." Now upon this, God ordered it that the Hungarians, having the better of the day, broke off the fight, and, through covetousness of the prey, fell upon the laden camels, whereupon the Turks totally routed the Hungarians, Udislaus their king was slain, and a famous victory left to Amurath.

Thus you see how God will be avenged for the breach of trust, and how certainly he will follow those that have been guilty of it. If we have to deal with papists, how is it possible that we can confide in any thing they promise or agree to? for we know it is their very opinion, that fides non servanda hereticis, faith is not to be kept with heretics; that for the Catholic cause they may break all their trust, promises, and covenants. Certainly, that people are besotted who shall so depend upon and be carried away by papists, as to lay their lives, liberties, and outward comforts at their feet and their mercy, for certainly there is no truth in them. What will be our state, if we lie at the mercy of those who have no truth in them, when afterwards we find they break asunder all their bonds of agreement, and we knew that this was their opinion before, that they would enter into league with us merely to serve their own turns, and when they obtained power, make our estates, lives, and liberties a prey to them?

Secondly, "No mercy." The merciful God sets himself against unmerciful men, and has a dreadful controversy against them; and when this controversy is pleaded, unmerciful men will be confounded before the Lord; for God will lay his plea thus: What! you that stood in so much need of mercy every moment to keep you out of hell; you that lived upon mercy continually as you breathed in the air; you who are begging at my gates every day; you who are undone for ever if you had not mercy supplied every hour; and yet you unmerciful to your brethren? This plea will stop the mouths of all unmerciful ones. It was the controversy that God had with Sodom itself, because they were unmerciful; much more then hath God a controversy with the inhabitants of the land of Israel if they be unmerciful. In Ezek. xvi. 49, God lays his charge against Sodom, That they did not "strengthen the hand of the poor and needy." Unmercifulness is a sin against the very light of nature. Josephus reports of Herod, that wicked and ungodly king of whom we read in the Gospel, That when there was a great famine in Judea, he melted all his movables of gold and silver that were in his palace, he spared nothing of his plate, either for the preciousness of the matter, or for the excellency of the fashion of it, no, not so much as those vessels wherein he was daily served at his table, but he melted them all and made money of them, and sent it into Egypt to buy corn, which he distributed to the poor. He appointed bakers to provide bread for the sick; he provided raiment for the naked, because the sheep were likewise dead and the poor had no work; yea, he sent to his neighbours the Syrians corn, that might be seed-corn for them to sow. This was that wicked Herod, who yet in time of public calamity was thus merciful to the poor. Surely, then, God must needs have a controversy with Israel, with Christians, that have received so much mercy from the Lord, if they shall be unmerciful in times of common calamity. And if ever unmercifulness were a vile sin and provoked God against a people, it must needs do now at such a time as this, when there are so many objects of pity and commiseration daily presented before us: if this should but prove to be our charge, that there is no mercy in the land at this day, God must needs have a fearful controversy against us. The whole land cannot be said to be charged now as once it might have been. Not long since many were crying out of violence and wrong, those which ruled over us ruled with rigour and cruelty, according to that complaint, Ezek. xxxiv. 4, "With force and cruelty have ye ruled" my people. They have turned "judgment to wormwood," Amos v. 7. The courts of judicature, which should have been for right judgment, have been turned into bitter wormwood and have been full of cruelty. What have many of them cared for the lives or the comforts of thousands, or for the extreme misery they created, provided their own humours and lusts might be satisfied? as if all other men were but as dogs except themselves. The Lord at this day charges this upon some of them, and will charge it more. I remember a speech of a reverend divine in this city, now with God, whom you all honoured when alive; being brought before the high commission court, when he came home one day, speaking of what he observed there, I heard, said he, much crying out of Grace, and please your Grace, and much crying out of Peace, peace, if there were any noise; but I saw no mercy there, nothing but cruelty.

Antiq. B. S. c. 12.

In Jer. l. 17, you see what indignation God shows where men, though the greatest upon earth, are cruel to his people: "This Nebuchadrezzar king of Babylon hath broken his bones." Who was this Nebuchadrezzar? A mighty and great prince, yet God looks upon him with indignation when he sees him breaking the bones of his people. We have amongst us those who, as Psal. xxvii. 12, "breathe out cruelty," and indeed act nothing less; "cruel hatred" being in their hearts and ways, Psal. xxv. 19. No marvel therefore though heretofore our brethren left the kingdom, because they found such cruelty here, no mercy in the land; they did but according to that to which the church calls its members, Cant. iv. 8, "Come with me from Lebanon, from the lions' dens, from the mountains of the leopards." When they went from us, they went from the lions' dens, and from the mountains of leopards. No marvel now the Lord is so severe against our land, because there has been so little mercy in it. That is the second article against Israel, That there was "no mercy."

Thirdly, "Nor no knowledge of God." In the Hebrew it is, and no knowledge; but now Vau, rendered there and, signifies sometimes quia, as well as et; and so it may indeed be well rendered here, Because there is no knowledge of God in the land; the reason why there is no mercy, is because there is no knowledge of God. The knowledge of God will make wicked men merciful. Cruel men know not God. These two are joined together most elegantly, Psal. lxxiv. 20, "The dark places of the earth are full of the habitations of cruelty." The knowledge of God will make men civil and humane at least, but when there is no knowledge of him men grow cruel and savage. And do we not find this to be true at this very day? To what places are men that now rise up to plunder, to shed blood, to cruelly perpetrate the most desperate outrages, to what places are these men beholden for their assisters and abettors? Are they not beholden to places where they are in ignorance, where they have no knowledge of God, where there is no preaching? In the countries round about, observe those parishes, those towns, where there has been least or worst preaching, where they have had least knowledge of God, and there you see most malignants that are bloody and cruel. No marvel, then, that our adversaries are such enemies to the faithful preachers of the word of God; no marvel, then, they are made the butt of their malice; for indeed if they bring the knowledge of God into the land, they will bring humanity, civility, mercy, and love, and these will find few or none to aid them in their wickedness. Indeed they complain that the parliament sets ignorant men in places, but certainly this complaint is but a pretence, for it were better for their turns that all the congregations in England had but ignorant men, none to bring the knowledge of God amongst people; but they know well enough, notwithstanding what they say, that those that are sent are such as do bring the knowledge of God among people, and that nothing injures them more than this knowledge of God.

"No knowledge of God." This is a heavy charge indeed: "Pour out thy fury upon the heathen that know thee not," Jer. x. 25. Though they be heathens and yet know not God, the wrath of God is to be poured forth upon them; surely then God's wrath must be upon Israel that know not God. And Isa. xxvii. 11, "They are a people of no understanding: therefore he that made them will not have mercy upon them, and he that formed them will show them no favour." 2 Thess. i. 7, 8, "The Lord Christ shall be revealed from heaven with his mighty angels, in flaming fire, taking vengeance on them that know not God." What! no knowledge of God? what glory then can God have from such a people? God has done great things in the world, he has manifested himself an infinite and a glorious God, and his end in all his manifestations is, that angels and men might behold this, might adore, admire, worship, fear, and praise him; but where there is no knowledge of God, there all God's glory passes by and there is no notice taken of it. To what purpose is the world made? such a one can never sanctify the name of God in any duty, nor worship in the use of any creature. Where there is no knowledge of God, there all good is kept out, there the unclean spirit, a spirit of darkness, dwells. When the crow has picked out the eyes of the lamb, then it preys upon it. As in dark vaults there are toads and filthy creatures, so in dark souls there are crawling and filthy lusts: as in blind alehouses there is abundance of disorder, so in a blind heart there are distempers and disorders in abundance.

"No knowledge of God." The Septuagint render the word for knowledge, οὐδὲ ἐπίγνωσις by a word which signifies recognition or acknowledgment, there is no acknowledgment of God in the land. People should walk so in all their ways as to hold forth the glory of the great God whom they profess to serve. If they know God to be such as he is revealed in all his attributes and works, they should in their lives so walk as to hold this forth before the children of men. I appeal to you in this: perhaps some of you can speak concerning God, and tell us what he is, and concerning his attributes; yet, are your lives in your families, in your conversations, such, that one, beholding them, may see inscribed the glorious attributes of God? are they such, that in all your ways you carry with you the glory of the great God, holding forth your fear of him, your love of him, and giving up yourselves to this all-sufficient God, who is worthy of all? There should be this acknowledgment of God, as well as knowledge; and he has a controversy with a land, with a family, with a particular soul, when there is not an acknowledgment of him in all their ways.

"In the land." In the land, here is the emphasis. Oh this is a sad thing: What! in the land of Israel no knowledge of God? Psal. lxxvi. 1, "In Judah is God known: his name is great in Israel." God was not known to any people in all the world but Judah and Israel; and here ten tribes are charged for not having the knowledge of God in their land. Surely they refused to know the Lord, they shut their eyes against the knowledge of God, they say to God, "Depart from us, we desire not the knowledge of thy ways." Men may live where there is the means of knowledge, and yet be ignorant all their days. How many men of excellent parts, in respect of all outward affairs, are there both in the country and city, to whom, if you speak about matters of state, they will speak intelligently, and discover much acquaintance with state affairs; confer with them about merchandise or their trades, they will speak understandingly; but speak to them about God, about Christ, about the things of eternal life, how poorly, how weakly, how childishly, how sots-ishly, shall you have them speak about these things! Men of parts, and living under much means, may yet be very ignorant in the knowledge of God. However the want of knowledge may seem to be a little matter, even in places where there are means, yet let men know, that it is a fearful brand of reprobation for people to live under the means, and not to have the knowledge of God: 2 Cor. iv. 3, "If our gospel is hid, it is hid to them that are lost." And it is pronounced as a great curse for a man to live without knowledge, Job xxxvii. 12, "They shall perish by the sword, and they shall die without knowledge." Oh how many at this day do perish by the sword, and die without knowledge! It concerns us now to get the knowledge of God, because the sword may be nearer than we are aware of; and what will become of us if it fall out to be our portion to perish by the sword, and to die without knowledge?

But though they had some means of knowledge, yet their means did grow very short. And there are two special reasons why at this time there was no knowledge of God in the land of Israel.

1. Because that Jeroboam had, in the defection of these ten tribes of Israel, set up the lowest of the people in the place of the priests' office. Any man that desired to be a priest, though never so base and vile, Jeroboam would set him up. In 1 Kings xii. 31, you find "he made an house of high places, and made priests of the lowest of the people, which were not of the sons of Levi;" no marvel then they had not the knowledge of God amongst them. Thus it has been in Ireland, and therefore no marvel there is so little knowledge of God there: any tradesman that scarce understood right reason, less divinity, was set up there to be a priest, and what horrible cruelty has ensued! So in England: however some of them complain of ignorant men at present in the ministry, the truth is, they have set up men of far less understanding in former times: for a little money to a bishop's clerk, might not any tradesman, any cast butler or serving-man, get into orders, read their prayers, and so become a priest? This has been the cause of much ignorance. How many cast serving-men have been placed to do what they can do, whereas learned and godly divines must be cast out of the kingdom, and denied to have any liberty to preach the knowledge of God unto his own people! Here is the reason of our ignorance, even that which was Jeroboam's sin, the setting of the lowest of the people in the ministry; and now that there is an examination of men, we find what abundance of vile men there are in places, and the people in those places are like to them, such prophet, such people, and the truth is, people love to have it so. In 2 Chron. xv. 3, a complaint is made that for a long season Israel had been "without the true God, and without a teaching priest." (This Israel includes both Judah and Israel, as elsewhere in Scripture.) "Israel hath been," (saith he,) "without the true God and without a teaching priest." This was a sad condition indeed, and mark how they are joined, "without the true God, and without a teaching priest, without law." A people are without God that are without a teaching priest and without the law. If they have not means to instruct them in the knowledge of God, they are a people without God. But now, observe what follows this, ver. 5, 6, "And in those times there was no peace to him that went out, nor to him that came in, but great vexations were upon all the inhabitants of the countries. And nation was destroyed of nation, and city of city: for God did vex them with all adversity." Truly, our condition is almost like the condition of Israel at that time. And here we may see what the fruit of this controversy was, they were without a teaching priest and without law, and in those times there was no peace to him that went out, nor to him that came in, but great vexations, city destroying city, and nation destroying nation, for "God did vex them with all adversity." Oh how doth the Lord even vex us at this very day! and this as a fruit of God's controversy with us, because there is so little knowledge of God in the land.

2. Because the pure worship of God and his ordinances were shut out of doors, and men's inventions were introduced in their room. For after the ten tribes' defection from Judah, they left the right worship of God, ceased to worship in the temple at Jerusalem, and set up their calves in Dan and Bethel, and so brought in their own inventions instead of the true worship of God; and no marvel though there came dismal darkness upon the land when this took place. Be assured, my brethren, whenever the pure ordinances of God and the right way of his worship is shut out from a kingdom, there will come awful darkness upon that kingdom. The right knowledge of God vanishes, when men's inventions in his ordinances come to be honoured. As painted glass in your windows hinders the light, so the more inventions of men there are in God's worship, the less light comes into the hearts of the people. As some, not contented with ordinary plain letters, make such flourishes about them that you can scarce tell what they are; and write their names so that you cannot tell what to make of them; so, many men that will not content themselves with plain ordinances, with the ordinances of Christ, but must have flourishes of their own inventions, at length darken the right understanding of the mind and truths of God, so that you know not what to make of them. "To the law and to the testimony," (saith the prophet,) "if they speak not according to this word, it is because there is no light in them." If they will leave the law and the testimony, and will go according to their own inventions in Divine worship, it is because there is no light in them, they are in darkness, and they will bring darkness upon the people. In Col. ii. 22, it is said of the rudiments of the world and the ordinances of men, that they "perish with the using;" that is, there is no efficacy at all in them to do any good unto the souls of men. Our adversaries call images and pictures, books to teach laymen; but the Scripture tells us they teach a lie. And if they be laymen's books, they are full of errata in every page, yea, there are more errata than true lines. The best that we can say of any ceremonies brought into the church by men (because people would endeavour to excuse the first Reformers) is, that they thought at that time they were required because of the dulness of men; for so they say in the preface to the Common Prayer Book, that it was to stir up the dull minds of men. But mark, if it could possibly be imagined that there could be any use of them in the first Reformation (which indeed there was not, but rather they did hurt and made men's minds more dull, as I dare appeal to you who have lived continually under such inventions of men in God's worship); but if possibly (I say) there could be imagined any use of them at the first, they were at best but as horn-books and fescues for the childhood and infancy of the church. They say themselves that they needed such things, but they could have needed them only as children need horn-books and fescues. And is it seemly always to learn upon them? what knowledge will be acquired, if, when you set your children to learn to read, they shall be kept ten, twenty, or thirty years to their horn-books? Now thus would our prelates have debased people, to keep them continually to learn the knowledge of God by these their beggarly elements.

Now take these two reasons together, unteaching priests, and man's inventions, they keep out the knowledge of God from a people; and they are brought on purpose to induce blindness, because that is most fit and suitable to the design that men have to bring people under slavery. So it was here; Jeroboam, at the time when Hosea prophesied, designed to bring the people under slavery, to keep them from the house of David to be his slaves; and what course does he take? He first sets up the basest and lowest of the people to be their priests; and secondly, he introduces false worship, and that is attended by blindness and ignorance, and so by this means he knew he should soon bring them under slavery. And nothing is more clear, than that it has been the design of many that would have been rulers of the church, and that they have laboured with all their might, (in subservience to others,) to bring blindness and ignorance into the land, that so they might reduce the land under slavery; and nothing has vexed them more, than that there is so much knowledge in the land. Therefore their spirits were so enraged at people's flocking unto sermons; it was even matter enough to silence any minister, to have people crowding to hear him preach: and they were enraged, too, at people's repeating of sermons in their own private families, because it also was a way to bring in knowledge. Any thing that tended to that, their hearts were enraged against it. Why? Because they knew knowledge would so mould men that they would never bear servitude. And truly it is a very strange thing, that though in some countries, (as in Wales and other places,) where men have not knowledge, they are contented to become slaves; but that in these parts, where there is, though not so much as should be, yet some degree of the knowledge of God, one would think it impossible that men should suffer themselves to be brought into slavery here; and that they fear most. We read that when the Philistines had taken Samson, they put out his eyes, and then made him to grind in the mill. So these men would fain make us to grind in the mill; as it is said, some have threatened to make the dames of London work for a penny a day in bride-well. They would fain make you all slaves, but first they would put out your eyes; they would take away knowledge, and then they know they shall soon succeed in their object. Well, the Lord hath promised, Isa. xxv. 7, that "he will destroy in this mountain the face of the covering cast over all people, and the veil that is spread over all nations." And mark, ver. 9, "It shall be said in that day, Lo, this is our God; we have waited for him, and he will save us." O come, Lord Jesus, come quickly and destroy the covering, the veil that is upon the eyes and hearts of a great part of the people of this land. The work would soon be done if the Lord would but destroy the veil of darkness that is upon the eyes and hearts of people, and we should triumph in our God and say, Lo, this is our God, we have waited for him, and he will save us, yea, he hath saved us.

Ver. 2. By swearing, and lying, and killing, and stealing, and committing adultery, they break out, and blood toucheth blood.

You see what a catalogue of gross sins are here mentioned. And indeed when idolatry prevails in any country, there will be all manner of wickedness. We found it so here in England, that the more superstition prevailed amongst us, the more abominable wickedness was generally spread over the country.

First, For "swearing." The word here translated swearing, is שׁוּרַר and signifies to curse, to swear, and to be perjured, and likewise also signifies to howl out: as in Joel i. 8, "Lament like a virgin girded with sackcloth;" so that the same word which signifies cursing, swearing, and forswearing, signifies also to howl and cry, for God has a time to make such to howl and cry out. An oath is a sacred thing, a part of God's worship, and therefore the abusing of this is a dreadful sin; especially if it be abused to swear to that which is false. Paulus Phagius, in his comment on Gen. xlii.,

In Erypto siquis juret per caput regis et non punitur, proste plectitur, nec
permittitur ut auro
vel alicui re silium redimat.

saith, It is reported of the Egyptians, that if any man did but swear by the life of the king, and did not perform his oath, that man was to die, and no gold or any thing in the world could redeem his life:

so did heathens hate that sin of perjury. Yea, we have found others that have not had much religion in them, who yet have extremely hated the sin of ordinary swearing. Louis IX. of France, punished that sin by searing the lips of swearers with a hot iron: which law being executed upon a citizen of Paris, some said it was too cruel; which he hearing of, replied, I would to God, that by so searing mine own lips, I could banish out of my realm all abuse of oaths. He could be willing to sear his own lips with hot iron, that he might banish the abuse of swearing. Chrysostom, in some sixteen continued homilies, if not more, whatsoever his text was, always concluded against swearing, as being such a vile and notorious sin. And because some pleaded custom, he urges, If you would but punish it thus, that if there were an oath sworn in your house, the servant or child that swore the oath should not dine that day, that would in some measure put a stop to it; yet, saith he, the command of God is less efficacious. Divers other expressions I might name, but must hasten on. Jer. xxiii. 10, is remarkable and appropriate, "For because of swearing the land mourneth; the pleasant places of the wilderness are dried up. And their course is evil, and their force is not right."

It is a sin that has more malignancy in it against God by how much the less is the temptation to it. I verily believe, that if God had never made the third commandment, there would never have been so many oaths in the world; but it springs from a mere malignancy of spirit in men against God because he has forbidden it; for no profit can arise from the practice.

If men be guilty of this sin merely through a vain custom, what high indignity is this against God! what slighting and neglect of God is there! as if sinning against God were an argument of so little weight that a habit, senseless and unprofitable, could weigh it down. Custom, indeed, may prevail in things of no moment, as postures of the body, gestures, and the like, because in their very nature they are unimportant: but that custom should suffice to be set against the high displeasure of the blessed God, or against his solemn profession that he will not hold that soul guiltless that taketh his name in vain, this argues a most insufferable vilifying of his sacred Majesty.

Secondly, To swear that thereby the words of men may be graced, is more horrid impiety: as if the polluting of the holy name of the most holy God were the best ornament of thy speech; as if the dishonour put upon God were the best grace to thy language.

Thirdly, To swear out of a conceit that this argues braveness of spirit, as if according to the fulness of mousing of oaths, there were a spirit of valour and courage, is still more hideous wickedness; as if the courage and excellency of our spirits consisted in flying in the very face of God. Whence it is that many men, if angered, fall a cursing and swearing, that is, when others displease them they will fly in God's face; for this is your language, though you will not dare to say so; but this is the language of your practice. Others displease and anger me, and I to revenge myself will fly in the very face of God. A hideous wickedness there is in this, that you do not think of. When you passionate spirits come home, and your wives and children or servants anger you, and you fall to cursing and swearing, know you do no other than this; this is the language of your practice. They displease me, and to revenge myself I will fly in the very face of God. Many gentlemen and noblemen and those that belong to them are great swearers, because they imagine that it is an argument of some braveness of spirit, and that thereby they manifest courage of a higher strain than other men. Oh hideous and abominable wickedness! This is all the valour that many men have, that they dare sin against the glorious God and never be troubled at it: whereas a godly man is described in Scripture, Eccles. ix. 2, to be a man "that feareth an oath;" but for these, it is not for them to fear, it is for timorous, melancholy, poor spirits, but they are men of brave spirits, and they would have men know that they can swear and not be troubled at it, they have stronger minds than other men have. Thus is the blessed God dishonoured by this sin more than we are aware of.

Fourthly, There is a class more guilty than these, those who swear that they may not be accounted puritans, or of the number of such a faction; if they go into company where they think they may be suspected to be inclined to that party, what do they? to give evident demonstration to the contrary, they swear lustily, and rap out oaths one after another. Oh what horrible opposition to God and to the Spirit of Christ is this! Christ saith, "that our light must so shine before men, that they, seeing our good works, may glorify our heavenly Father." Now, they let their wickedness appear before men, that it may be known what they are; and hereby they give testimony that they can be brought to yield to any thing, for that is their intent; they do (I say) by that testify to the other party, that they can be brought to yield unto any thing and that they can serve their turns; and this is the reason why they would willingly entertain no other than such as these, for if they hear a man swear lustily, then they think, Such a man surely either has no conscience at all, and so is fittest for our turn, as he will not be a scrupulous fool, or if he had a conscience he has broken it, and now it cannot prevail over him; therefore let us put upon him what we will, if it suit with his own ends and with his own profit, this man will do it; but as for your puritans, that are so conscientious we cannot effect our objects by means of them, therefore we will have none of them. Hence the puritans are so much hated, and the others, that they might be entertained by them, and give full testimony that they are fit for their turns, therefore swear. Oh how black are men's mouths at this day by their cursed oaths, new execrations newly invented, that the world never before heard of! Wherefore then, though God might make these men as scorpions for a while to scourge us, yet if our spirits were up we need not fear them, for certainly they that are so full of curses in their mouths, are the people of God's curse.

"And lying." "By swearing and lying." These two go together: there is no man that makes not conscience of an oath, that will make conscience of a lie; though the world would think to part them, and say, Oh you will not swear, but you will lie; but God saith otherwise. Swearing and lying go together; those that will swear, certainly will lie. But for God's own people, God frees them from this sin of lying, though the world would cast it upon them, for no sin more offends against godliness. In Isa. lxiii. 8, God saith of his people, "Surely they are my people, children that will not lie." God engageth himself for his people, These are the people that will not lie. Are you in profession any of God's people? God doth engage himself for you in this, that certainly you will not lie. It is said of the devil, that he is a liar, and the father of lies. And women that carry false tales up and down and are slanderers, are in Scripture called devils, 1 Tim. iii. 11, "Even so must their wives be grave, not slanderers;" μή ἑαβόλους, not devils: a woman that is a slanderer, that carries false tales up and down to the prejudice of her neighbour, the Scripture there calls that woman by the name of a devil. And the word that signifies detractor, in Hebrew is שׂוֹנֵא and some think that from it comes our English word rakehell, one that makes no conscience to speak falsely.

This sin of lying is the breaking of all society, there can be no converse between man and man where it prevails. Augustine, writing to his friend that sent to him to have his judgment concerning an officious lie, (that is, a lie that tends not to the hurt of any but of him that tells it,) returns this answer: That a man must not tell a lie to save the whole world; if it were to save thy father or thy mother out of hell, if that were possible, thou must not tell a lie; if it were to save kingdoms from destruction, thou must not tell a lie. That is his opinion; and certainly it is correct, for God will never be beholden to the devil to do good through his means. Surely then thou must not tell a lie to gain a groat, or a shilling, or to procure a good bargain, or to prevent the displeasure of thy master or mistress; but rather willingly confess the truth than attempt to cover the fault by a lie. It is practical atheism that induces servants and children, when they have done amiss, to seek to cover it by a lie. God is exceedingly displeased with this sin, and has a controversy on account of it against nations, families, and against particular persons; and therefore, Prov. vi., you shall find if you read from ver. 16—19, that after the Lord has said, that six things he hateth, yea, seven are an abomination unto him, that amongst these seven he repeats lying twice, though under different terms; and that in Rev. xxi. 8, it is expressly said, that "all liars shall have their part in the lake which burneth with fire and brimstone." Take that home with you, you servants, and children, and tradesmen that will tell lies for gain: God ranks and chains up liars together with notorious sinners, that shall all have their portion in the lake of fire and brimstone, which is the second death.

There are none in the world that make such advantage of lying as the antichristian party, inventing all manner of lies, either to draw a party to themselves or to discourage those against them, inventing all manner of lies. And because the malignants invent so many themselves, if any thing is said against them, you presently hear them exclaim, That's a lie: they think all men are liars because they are conscious that they themselves are continually so. And no marvel that the antichristian party are so full of lies, for the very doctrine of popery, as a whole, is altogether called a lie: 2 Thess. ii. 10, 11, God gave men over, that did not entertain the truth in the love of it, "to believe a lie," that they might be damned. Do you ask the question, why so many learned men and persons of understanding turn to the popish party? Mark the reason here, "because they received not the truth in the love of it, God gave them over to believe a lie." A lie; what is that? that is the doctrine of popery. So the very quintessence of it is a lie. That lie of popery being therefore the great lie in the world, it must have a company of lesser ones, if I may say so, to underprop and uphold it. Isa. xxviii. 15, "They make lies their refuge." It is a text as suitable to our times as any I know, showing the practice now, that when men cannot get any thing by fair means, then they invent lies and make them their refuge. The maxim of the Jesuits is, Calumniare audeat, aliquid hæretic, Slander and lie fearlessly, and something will adhere; for every one that may hear the report, may not hear of the answer that may be given to it. And their policy is to spread abroad lies as much as they can, and especially of those that are most eminent and active in public affairs; and hence those strange inventions raised of such as are most active in parliament, in the city, and in the ministry; things so hideous, that if they were true, would render men altogether unfit to be entertained in a commonwealth. But you will say, What can they get by it when it proves to be false? Yes, because their lies spread a great deal farther than the refutation. And those in Jer. xx. 10, do fully set out the condition of these men: "I heard the defaming of many," saith the prophet. How? "Report, say they, and we will report it." This was their plot; We must defame Jeremiah; we see that he has got a great deal of credit and prevails with the people, and we know not how to help ourselves; only if we can but defame him, if we can but raise up something that may take away his esteem with the people, we may then have our end; therefore devise somewhat, report, and we will report it, we will spread it abroad. As now, if a company of malignants get into a tavern, there they will talk against this minister and the other, against this parliamentarian and the other, against this citizen and that: What shall we do? say they; we see they prevail, let us devise something that may defame them, report somewhat and we will spread it. To this day this has been the way of maintaining that antichristian party, that great lie. Jer. ix. 3, "They bend their tongues like their bow for lies;" and ver. 5, "They have taught their tongue to speak lies." They are now become practised in it, and they do it the rather because they know it will please some great ones. It was so in former times: Prov. xxix. 12, "If a ruler hearken to lies, all his servants are wicked." If any officer, or any about him, see that it will humour him to raise ill reports against God's servants, the servants of such a ruler will be wicked and invent lies enow. And amongst other places, Hos. vii. 3 is remarkable, where the text saith, "They make the king glad with their wickedness, and the princes with their lies." It is spoken of Jeroboam and the other kings that followed him, that set up false worship. Now there were a great many in Israel whose consciences would not give them leave to follow that way of false worship; whereupon the promoters, apparitors, bailiffs, and some courtiers, would invent lies against those that must needs go up to Jerusalem to worship, and would not content themselves with the calves that the king set up. Now these their inventions respecting some of the most zealous men amongst the people, they brought to the king, and said, Did your Majesty hear such a thing? There are such men in your Majesty's dominions dwelling in such towns, and they are forsooth so scrupulous that they will not be content with the law-established religion, but they must go up to Jerusalem to worship, yea, and there they privily commit such and such wickedness, and live in such and such vile practices: and thus they came and told the king tales of them, and the text says, "They made the king glad;" the king was pleased, and gave them encouragement. Certainly, amongst us there have not been wanting men that have endeavoured this, that would have accounted this their happiness, to get a tale, though never so false, to tell of a puritan, or of a godly minister.

"And killing." Murder is a provoking sin; God seldom suffers it to go unrevenged in this world. Whence are all those discoveries of murders; scarce any one but can tell strange stories of them. We have a vain distinction of murder and man-slaughter, as it is called, that, forsooth, if a man be angry, and in a passion kills another, this is man-slaughter, and no murder. God will not own that distinction; for if you shall by your passion make yourself a beast, and so kill a man, God will require this at your hand; for, Gen. ix. 5, God saith, that he will require the blood of man "at the hand of every beast;" much more at the hand of a man that by his passion makes himself a beast. The life of a man is precious to God, and God will not suffer any creature to have absolute power over it, but reverse dominion over men's lives to himself. Mr. Ainsworth on Gen. ix. 6, cites the Jewish doctors, affirming that a murderer, though it were possible for him to give all the riches of the world, yet must be put to death, because the life of the murdered is the possession of the most holy God; this is their argument. Certainly it is not in the power of any man upon earth, be he what he may, to save a murderer. The greatest man upon earth has no liberty, no prerogative, from God to save a murderer; "whoso sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed." God avenges the blood that Manasseh shed a long while after his death; 2 Kings xxiv. 4, "And also for the innocent blood that he shed; which the Lord would not pardon." Though Manasseh did repent, (and so we have cause to hope well in regard of his soul and his eternal estate, though Calvin seems to be of the contrary opinion,) yet the Lord came upon the nation after his days, and would not pardon his shedding of innocent blood. How much do we find in the law concerning the killing of a man! Deut. xxi. 1—9, when a man was found dead in the fields nigh unto a city, the elders of that city must come to the dead body, wash their hands over the heifer to be slain, and take a solemn oath that they had no hand in the murder, and so clear the city. This shows how precious the life of man is in God's esteem, and that God hath a controversy with a land for shedding of blood.

And if this be so, what a controversy, think you, has God against many in this kingdom at this day! How fearful is God's controversy against some that must feel it for the blood that has been shed in Ireland! There is upon record one hundred and forty thousand that have been murdered there since the beginning of this rebellion, and everybody will say, it is plain murder. And they, whosoever they are, that have participated in and abetted this, and strengthened the hands of the murderers, what will they be able to answer unto God? Shall the blood of one righteous Abel cry aloud in the ears of God, and never leave crying until it has had vengeance, and shall not the blood of one hundred and forty thousand innocents? (I mean innocents in regard of the cause for which they were murdered.) We now in England begin to be somewhat sensible what it is to have the guilt of murder lie upon a nation. In the last declaration of the affairs of Ireland, the parliament intimates some fear they have, that possibly the guilt of the blood of King James may in some way lie upon us. God has a controversy for murder wheresoever it lies, if it be not punished accordingly. And for all that blood that has been shed here of late, wherever the cause lies, God will find it out one day. Oh the blood that will be upon the head of some! Jer. li. 35, "The violence done to me and to my flesh be upon Babylon, shall the inhabitants of Zion say; and my blood upon the inhabitants of Chaldea, shall Jerusalem say." So let all Christians, (they may do it, and they have warrant from God to do it,) let all godly people in this kingdom that have had their husbands, their children, their apprentices, their friends butchered in these unhappy wars, let them say, The violence done to my flesh be upon the Babylonish, the popish party; and the blood that has been shed of our husbands, of our children, of our servants, of our friends, be upon the inhabitants of Chaldea, the popish party dwelling amongst us, that have risen up and shed so much blood. Oh how vile and cursed are men's hearts, that are so set upon their designs, that to attain them they will go through streams of blood that lie in their way, and care not for the lives of thousands of men so their desires may be satisfied! How are men vilified in this, that their lives and bodies must go to gratify the lusts of a few others! Certainly

God never made such a difference, never put such a distance between one and another.

But now, in the execution of justice we must not account the shedding of blood to be killing. God has not a controversy with a land for bloodshed in it; nay, on the contrary, the Lord has a controversy against a people when there is not shedding of blood that way: Jer. xlviii. 10, "Cursed be he that keepeth back his sword from blood:" such a case may be. And 1 Kings xx. 42, when Ahab let Benhadad go, the text saith, that a prophet came to him in the name of the Lord, saying, "Because thou hast let go out of thy hand a man whom I appointed to utter destruction, therefore thy life shall go for his life, and thy people for his people." So when we have men in our hands whom God has appointed to destruction, who are guilty of death, who have sought not the blood of some few, but the massacring of a city, if for private ends of our own we let them go, God may require our lives for theirs. And this perhaps is one of the reasons, that there is so much bloodshed amongst us at present, because there is no execution of justice upon offenders, and God requires the blood of many for many. It is true, papists are not to be put to death for their religion, that we acknowledge; but the Lord, because he intendeth the ruin of that party, will leave them to act so that they shall be guilty of death by the law of the land, and by the law of arms, and then the putting them to death is the execution of justice, and not the breach of the sixth commandment.

But some will say, Oh, killing is a grievous thing, we never were acquainted with it as we have been of late: were it not better we were all at peace, than that still so much blood should be shed?

God forbid any of us should be bloody men, or desire the shedding of blood. No, let us all labour to have peace that there may be no more bloodshed. This speech simply considered is good, and we are all I hope of the same mind. Cursed be that man, I say, that shall not yield to this. And certainly peace, though upon hard terms, were to be desired, if it would save blood; yea, though half our estates went to procure it: but what if it prove that that peace we talk of should be a means of more bloodshed? If you should let into your city such men as bloody papists, French, Walloons, and Irish rebels, and that merely upon their bare word that they would do you no hurt, do not you think if they were once admitted, that you would every night be in danger of being massacred? and would there not be much more bloodshed than has yet been? Therefore say not that those are bloody men that will not yield up their throats to men of blood, but will stand up to defend their brethren from being massacred; they take up arms, not to shed, but to prevent the shedding of blood: and certainly, if the city and country had in the beginning of these wars risen up as one man and gone forth, they might have saved much of the blood that has been shed. Many thousands that have now lost their lives might have been preserved, if you had resolutely taken up arms sooner than you did: but when every county looks to itself, and the enemy goes to one, and then to another, shedding blood, and you sit still and do nothing, God may require the blood of your brethren at your hands; and you cannot clear yourselves from being guilty of it, when you do not, to the uttermost you are able, strive to subdue the power of those that shed it. We cannot see any way to preserve the blood that is now in our veins, but by subduing the malignant and antichristian party that have already tasted so much of the blood of the saints.

And so with those rebels that in Ireland have tasted so much blood, and now are come over here to join with papists, you cannot possibly conceive any safety but by subduing that party. Is that a way to prevent the shedding of your blood, to lay your necks upon the block? for that peace proffered under a specious name, may be in truth no other but a laying your necks upon the block, and giving up your wives and children to be a sacrifice to their malice.

The Lord has a controversy for blood. We know, when we have to deal with papists, what they have been of old, and therefore we hope God has a controversy with that party, that as they have drunk the blood of the saints, so they shall at last swell and burst themselves in pieces. In the time of the massacre in France, when history tells us of more than ten thousand protestants that were murdered in one night in Paris, they were in as fair a way of peace as possible, and there was a marriage solemnized, and a great deal of rejoicing for the union of one party with another, and yet (I say) in that night so many were slain; and you may expect no other if the malignant party get power. You will say, They have not done so to other cities which they have taken. No, they have not got the day yet, their design is but progressing; but if once they get this city, then, having attained their chief object, you may expect all manner of cruelty from them. And this massacre in France went on to other cities, for within a few days after there were forty thousand more computed to be murdered. I remember that the history of France tells us of that King Charles IX., by whose commission this was done, that afterward God struck him with such a disease, that there issued out of his body at several places nothing but blood, so that in that sickness he would sometimes fall down and wallow himself in his own blood. Be men great or small, yet, being guilty of blood, at one time or other the Lord will manifest that he has a controversy against them.

"And stealing," God sets bounds, as to men's habitations, so to men's estates, and he will not have one to break in upon another; no, not so much as to covet that which is another's. Seeking therefore an increase of our estates in any sinful way, is, as it were, saying, God's care is not over me to provide needful things for me, and seeing I cannot have them from God, I will try if I can have them from the devil. This is the language of all kind of gain that we get by any unlawful way; you do not say so in words indeed, but this is the language of your actions. Saith a poor person, I am in want, I want bread for my family, and clothes, and many outward comforts, money to pay my rent, &c.; I see in God's providence he does not provide for me; well, I will go to the devil then, and will see whether he will do more for me than God: I cannot have it by God's allowance, for if so, I might get it by lawful means, therefore, saith he, I will have it whether God will or no. This is the language of all kind of stealing; and the curse of God is upon that which is gotten so unjustly, and all the repentance in the world is not sufficient for a man who has gotten his estate unjustly, unless he make restitution of it again to the uttermost of his power.

And this stealing refers not only to open robbery, but to all wrongful gain gotten by way of trade. If I were preaching of this argument at large, much might be said to those that live by trade. But for the present take that one scripture, Ezek. xxviii. 18, "Thou hast defiled thy sanctuaries by the multitude of thine iniquities, by the iniquity of thy traffic." Let merchants and tradesmen that have gotten any thing unlawfully, take this text home with them, "Thou hast defiled thy sanctuaries by the iniquity of thy traffic." It may be, by trafficking unjustly you have gotten an estate, and you come to God's sanctuaries as if you were very holy, and no one should suspect you for your false books and dealings; to you God saith in this text, that you defile all the ordinances by the iniquity of your traffic. Perhaps you think, out of your unrighteous gains, to give somewhat to adorn such a place as this: it is well enough, but you do defile them.

So for all kind of oppression, for that too is meant by stealing. Latimer, in one of his sermons before King Edward, saith, that the greatest man in the kingdom cannot so hurt an oppressor, as a poor widow may; and with what arms I pray? saith he; can he bring the judges to condemn? The arms are these, the tears of the poor, which run down their cheeks and go up to heaven, and there cry for vengeance. The text here speaks not of the meaneast, but of the greatest thieves. Calvin, on the place, saith, those that had the most power by their honour and riches, and were oppressors of the people, are the thieves here spoken of. And Isa. i. 23, "Thy princes are rebellious, and companions of thieves." And Isa. xxxiii. 1, "When thou shalt cease to spoil, thou shalt be spoiled." This is a text for our spoilers at this day: it may be God will let them go on till they have done their work, and then come upon them; and when they have done spoiling, they shall be spoiled. O! that controversy seems to be upon England, which was threatened and was upon the people in that place we read of, Isa. xlii. 22, "This is a people robbed and spoiled; they are all of them snared in holes." If they had come into the field, perhaps it had been better with them; but they crept into holes, and they are snared and spoiled: "They are for a prey, and none delivereth; for a spoil, and none saith, Restore. Who among you will give ear to this?" Mark what the text saith, "Who will hearken and hear for the time to come? Who gave Jacob for a spoil, and Israel to the robbers? Did not the Lord, he against whom we have sinned? for they would not walk in his ways, neither were they obedient unto his law. Therefore he hath poured upon him the fury of his anger, and the strength of battle: and it hath set him on fire round about, yet he knew not; it burned him, yet he laid it not to heart." We are a people robbed and spoiled; because we have not walked in the ways of God, nor been obedient to his law, therefore the Lord hath poured his fury upon England at this day, and his fire burneth; and who hath laid it to heart?" Nobody stirs; because the fire is not kindled in the city, you lay it not to heart, and you suffer your brethren in one county after another to be spoiled. Take heed, if you stir not more than you have done, as many of you may answer for the blood of your brethren, so for the spoiling of their goods, because you do not lay to heart this heavy judgment that is at present upon the land, the execution of this controversy.

But yet you must know, that the taking away of men's goods is, in times of war, no stealing, nor no breach of the eighth commandment; for it is against common sense and reason, that in such times we should be wholly tied to those positive laws of a state that are made for seasons of peace: but it accords with the law of nature, the law of God, and the law of arms, that our enemies should be deprived of what may strengthen them against us. Therefore let none cry out about stealing and robbing in these times; indeed, it is not fit that any should be suffered to rob, but yet it is just that those that will not be on one side should be taken as enemies to the other; and (I say) it is agreeable to the laws of nature, of God, and of arms, that in times of just war, (and regarding ours, I hope you cannot but be fully satisfied,) that what may strengthen the enemy may be taken away. Indeed, they plead for law who wholly break it themselves, because they would have all the privilege they can to strengthen themselves by our goods and the goods of others; but certainly God permits us, being in a lawful war, to strengthen ourselves by the estates and goods of those that appear our enemies, without breach of peace or of the positive law of the land, or of his own commandment. Thus much for the fourth charge.

"And committing adultery." The generation of a rational creature who must live to all eternity, is a work that God challenges a special hand in, to appoint it to all at his pleasure; therefore the breach of God's order in this, to satisfy the brutish lust of man or woman, is a most cursed evil, against which God carries on a most dreadful controversy. It is a breach of the blessed covenant of God, and a sin most opposite to his nature. And all you that are guilty of this; for perhaps many that are professors of religion, and live fairly amongst their neighbours, may yet be secretly guilty of it; all of you take this text home with you, "The mouth of strange women is a deep pit: he that is abhorred of the Lord shall fall therein," Prov. xxii. 14. Go thy ways, thou canst know no otherwise by thyself, but that thou art the man or the woman that art abhorred of God. Thou art beloved of thy whore, but the Lord abhors thee. And Tertullian, speaking on Eph. v. 6, "Let no man deceive you with vain words," uses an expression which I confess I would not dare to employ; He that preacheth of repentance to adultery, especially adultery in a forcible way, deceiveth men with vain words. You see his conception of the sin; we dare not justify what he saith, but it serves to show you how dreadful he apprehended the sin to be. And in Heb. vi., speaking of the sin that is unpardonable, he saith, We never read, nor ever knew, a second repentance promised to an adulterer or fornicator. He admitted but one repentance after baptism: see lib. de Penitentia, et de Pudicitia. These were his thoughts of adultery. The Athenians made a law, that if any man found his wife in the act of adultery, he might presently kill her. And I have read of a people among the heathen, that have punished this sin for its filthiness, by thrusting the adulterer's head into the paunch of a beast and keeping it there, and so stifling him. If heathens hated it so much, surely God must have a controversy, because of this sin, with those that profess themselves Christians; and the greater controversy because it is so little punished by men. And though many great ones can escape man's punishment, yet they cannot get beyond this controversy. I remember Mr. Cleaver reports of one that he knew, that had committed the act of uncleanness, and in the horror of conscience hung himself; that when he was about to hang himself, he wrote on a paper to this effect, I indeed acknowledge it to be utterly unlawful for a man to kill himself, but I am bound to act the magistrate's part, because the punishment of this sin is death. God would have that sin punished with death, but the magistrate did not punish it accordingly, therefore he, in horror of conscience, lays violent hands upon himself. We justify not his act, but it shows what a controversy God has with men that commit this sin. Thou committest that abominable sin, and thou hast some pleasure and delight in it; go thy way, thou art a dead man in God's eyes; look to thyself, one way or other God may bring death upon thee, and though man's law take not hold on thee, God's may, thou knowest not how soon. I have read of a king of Navarre, that by adultery had weakened his frame very much, and in consequence, his physicians caused his body to be wrapped about with a cerecloth dipped in aqua vite, and the party that sowed the cerecloth, having done, went to burn off the thread with a candle, which presently took hold of the cloth and consumed both it and the king.

And as God has a controversy for this sin, which is so little punished by man's law, but by God's law is death; so the rather has God a controversy for it, if it be committed by men of knowledge, by learned men, by men that are in public places, by men that carry a show of holiness, by men that are in the ministry; if they commit it, God has, in a special manner, a dreadful controversy with them. Jer. xxix. 22, 23, "The Lord make thee like Zedekiah and like Ahab, whom the king of Babylon roasted in the fire; because they committed villany in Israel, and have committed adultery with their neighbours' wives." It was a proverb, "The Lord make thee like Zedekiah and like Ahab, whom the king of Babylon roasted in the fire." This was not King Zedekiah and King Ahab, but two false prophets of the name, unclean wretches; and though it were the king of Babylon, a heathen, yet he so hated that sin of adultery, that he caused them to be roasted in the fire; for to burn or roast the offenders in the fire, was the punishment of that nation for capital offences. Therefore those that are ministers, that are learned men, that have any show of holiness more than others, if they be guilty of this sin God has a most dreadful controversy with them.

And see how we should have a controversy too against this sin of uncleanness, especially when forced. In Judg. xx. 17, you read there that there were four hundred thousand men, all men of war, that were raised up as one man, and they all said, ver. 8, "We will not any of us go to his tent, neither will we any of us turn into his house." And why did all these men rise? The cause was this: there was a Levite that had a concubine, which had played the harlot and gone from him, and he going to fetch her back, the men of Gibeah, a city of Benjamin, came in a violent way and abused her until she died; upon this the Levite took the dead body and divided it into twelve several pieces, and sent them into all the coasts of Israel. Upon this the hearts of all the men of Israel were raised as one man, and they covenanted among themselves, that they would none of them turn into their houses until they had brought the delinquents, that had committed that horrible offence, to condign punishment. Mark now, that the hearts of people should be so set upon it, and think it a sufficient reason to gather an army of four hundred thousand. Have we not heard of worse than this amongst us wheresoever the soldiers have come? what horrible villanies have been committed in this respect, taking not men's concubines and whores, but grave matrons, and purposely those whom they think to be most godly, and defiling them before the eyes of their husbands, and then murdering them! and yet we stir not for all this to fetch in these delinquents. Now we have rapes and ravishments of thousands amongst us, and yet our hearts stir not, though no question the same thing is intended against us here that is done to our brethren in other countries, for you can expect little else from such as these. In Judg. v. 20 the mother of Sisera saith, "Have they not divided the prey, to every man a damsel or two?" They aim as much to satisfy their lusts upon you as upon your goods; you must not think your lives will satisfy them, but their lusts must be first gratified. If you regard not your lives, and estates, and liberties, yet regard such horrible villany as this, which is committed in the face of heaven. These here resolved not to go to their tents nor to turn into their houses till this was done. Be content to shut up your shops for a while, and to leave your trades and to lie in the fields, until you have brought these delinquents to their just punishment. Be not discouraged with a little ill success; there were forty thousand of the better side slain here before Israel got the victory, until they had thoroughly humbled themselves, and then they succeeded. Though our adversaries meet with success in their ways, let us not be discouraged; they that stood to defend this horrible wickedness of the men of Gibeah, got the first and second days, yet they persevered till they had brought the offenders to condign punishment. We should resolve never to follow our business, nor regard our houses and private estates, until we have got this wickedness punished in this land, and wiped off its guilt from the kingdom.*

"They break out." That is, like the eruption of waters: as waters break over the banks when it has been kept in a while, so they thus break out and overflow all bounds. When sin is not mortified, though it be restrained for a while, it will break out: as many young men that have lived in good families and had good governors, and so have had their sin restrained, afterward, when they come to manage themselves, then break out, sin grows to a strength that nothing can restrain; like that man that had an unclean spirit and lived among the graves; "no man could bind him, no, not with chains," Mark v.

Obs. Breaking out is a great aggravation of a man's sin. It argues strength, impudence, and desperateness in sin. And this breaking out of sin is not merely as the overflowing of water at some times or tides, but rather like the bursting out of fire, or, if you will, like water gushing forth from some fountain: now you know, if water break out of a fountain, not a diminution, but rather an increase ensues; and when a house is on fire, it will smoulder a long while, but when it bursts out at the roof or elsewhere, then it flames the more and increases with more violence. So it is no diminution to sin that it breaks out; as many foolish people that will speak horribly wickedly in their passion. I will let it go, as good out as in; foolishly concluding there is so much less corruption within, and that is a diminution of sin, whereas it is an aggravation, and denotes impudence in sin.

"And blood toucheth blood." That is, as some will have it, one gross and abominable sin, accounted a bloody sin, follows another. But some understand it thus, one murder follows another, one oppression succeeds to another: "Blood toucheth blood;" now thy wickedness is broken out there is no end of it, but one murder follows another. Pareus thinks it refers to the same times as 2 Kings xv., where you may read what murders there were, and how blood touched blood; as if the prophet here said, They being used to murder, there is now nothing else, you hear of murders every where. Thus, if the Lord raise not up means to control and subdue the rage of ungodly men, if it get head and overcome the opposition it meets, blood will then touch blood, one messenger shall not have done his relation of one horrid and cruel murder, before another messenger will be at his heels to tell you of another, still more horrid and more vile. So it is in some countries, there comes one and saith, In such a place such a man and all his family were murdered; and presently another comes and tells you, In such a town such a friend of yours was murdered; thus the messengers rapidly succeed one another, and relate of blood touching blood. So some interpret it.

But I rather thus, They defile themselves incestuously, (so that this is somewhat more than bare adultery,) not regarding the nearness of blood, but "blood toucheth blood;" they that were nearest in blood mingled themselves one with another in filthy and abominable lusts. So the Septuagint translate it, μίσγονται, they mingle: and Jerome, sanguis sanguinem tetigit, they mingle and touch blood with blood, those that are near of kin come near one another in filthy lusts. Now this was a sin for which God cast the very heathen out of Canaan, that good land, and therefore well may he have a controversy with the people of the land now; as you may find Lev. xviii. 6, "None of you shall approach to any that is near of kin to him, to uncover their nakedness: I am the Lord." And so afterward goes on to show what degrees of consanguinity we must observe; and then, ver. 24, 25, "Defile not ye yourselves in any of these things: for in all these the nations are defiled that I cast out before you: and the land is defiled: therefore I do visit the iniquity thereof upon it, and the land itself vomiteth out her inhabitants." The rather still has God a controversy with a people for this sin, because it is so little punished. I ask, what punishment is there at this day amongst us for incest, or for any uncleanness, except that the man must support the child; and as to the ancient punishment of coming into the court and being enjoined to wear a white sheet, they could dispense with it for a very little money. Hence we may fear that God's controversy is so much the more against us, and pray to him that speedily the land may deliver itself from this guilt by having severe laws for the punishment of this horrible wickedness, lest God come and punish it himself, and then woe unto us!

Ver. 3. Therefore shall the land mourn, and every one that dwelleth therein shall languish, with the beasts of the field, and with the fowls of heaven; yea, the fishes of the sea also shall be taken away.

You have heard that God in this chapter commences a suit against the ten tribes. He puts in his action, and he declares, and then judges. The articles of his declaration or charge against them we have discussed. Hereupon judgment is passed, "Therefore shall the land mourn."

"The land." How can the land be said to mourn? As when the land is fruitful it is said to laugh and sing, and meadows that are green to rejoice; Psal. lxx. 13, "The valleys also are covered over with corn; they shout for joy, they also sing;" so when a land is desolate and God brings famine, then it is said to mourn. Jer. xii. 4, "How long shall the land mourn, and the herbs of every field wither, for the wickedness of them that dwell therein? the beasts are consumed, and the birds; because they said, He shall not see our last end." And likewise a place, when left desolate of people that were before the beauty of it, is then said to mourn: Isa. iii. 26, "Her gates shall lament and mourn." Lam. i. 4, "The ways of Zion do mourn, because none come to her solemn feasts." As now in time of plague, the streets of your city may be said to mourn because they are deserted and look desolate, when the grass grows between the stones; "Her gates shall lament and mourn." The expression here is designed to upbraid the hardness of the hearts of the ten tribes. As if God should say, Notwithstanding all their dreadful sins, that should break their hearts and make them howl and cry out, yet they will not mourn; therefore their land shall mourn. When God will upbraid men for stopping their ears and refusing to hear, and to obey, he calls to the heavens, Isa. i. 2, "Hear, O heavens, and give ear, O earth;" to upbraid the deafness of men that will not hear: and Jer. ii. 12, "Be astonished, O ye heavens:" because men will not fear, therefore, to upbraid them, God calls to the heavens to be astonished; so, because men's hearts are hard, therefore God calls to the land to mourn, yea, saith it "shall mourn." The deformity of your sin, that is the meaning, shall appear in the miserable desolation of your country. There is an ugly face of sin, and it were well if you saw it as it is in your own hearts, the guilt that you have brought upon your own spirits; but seeing you will not apprehend sin as in your own hearts, you shall see the sad effects of it in all things of the land. God will have sin appear vile to us one way or other. The Lord this day is making our land mourn because we have not mourned, because we do not mourn. Many countries know what this expression means, their country mourns, their land mourns. The very sight of the dreadful effects of sin upon many parts in England is sufficient to break any man's heart. As in Germany, persons that have travelled there, and seen towns and places, formerly of great riches and traffic, now overgrown with nettles, it breaks their hearts, they see the land to mourn; and it begins to be so amongst us in many places of England, in Yorkshire, and in the west. Oh that we all could mourn in the bitterness of our spirits, that our land and cities might no further mourn! But we must not give liberty to ourselves in pathetic or affectionate ways, but keep as near as we can to an explicatory course.

"And every one shall languish." The word translated languish here, signifies the withering of a flower, or the withering of herbs and trees: and so in Nah. i. 4, "The flower of Lebanon languisheth;" the same word occurs as here, "every one shall languish," and the signification of it suggests this useful note.

Obs. 1. All the glory and pomp of the men of the world, is but as a flower; and even as soon as a flower withereth, so soon do they pass away.

Obs. 2. Times of affliction take down the jollity and bravery of men's spirits, and make them fade, wither, and pine away.

The word here is translated by some, and they shall be made weak. When wicked men are prosperous, their hearts are stout and strong to sin, they can stand out against God and against all threats; but when the hand of God is upon them, then their spirits are poor, they are weak and presently cast down. Oh the difference between the brave, stout spirits of wicked men in their prosperity against God, and their poor, weak, withered, and dejected spirits in the time of their adversity! Psal. xxxix. 11, "When thou with rebukes dost correct man for iniquity, thou makest his beauty to consume away like a moth: surely every man is vanity. Selah."

And a notable expression we have of the withering, the languishing, of the spirits of wicked men in the time of their adversity, that whereas now in their prosperity their tongues are their own, and they must and will ask, Who is the Lord? they are then loud in their oaths and blasphemies; but mark them now in their adversity; Isa. xxix. 4, "Thou shalt be brought down, and shalt speak out of the ground, and thy speech shall be low out of the dust, and thy speech shall whisper out of the dust." This is the fruit of the languishing of their spirits in the time of their trouble. As a riotous and boisterous gallant, that would so mouth it when he was in prosperity, yet let God but lay his hand upon him in sickness, and his conscience then accusing him, he whispers and speaks low out of the dust. Then follows, "With the beasts of the field, and with the fowls of heaven; yea, the fishes of the sea also shall be taken away."

Jerome allegorizes this, and would take it to mean several sorts of men. But we must not stand to that, but rather take the words as they are literally. Only as to the reading of them a word or two first.

"With the beasts of the field, and with the fowls of heaven." In the Hebrew,  $\kappa$  which is translated with, is sometimes equivalent to for, "for the beasts of the field" as in chap. v. 5, "Israel and Ephraim shall fall in their iniquity," or, for their iniquity. So if here we translate it, for the beasts of the field, and for the fowls of heaven, then we have this note.

Obs. 3. We may here see the poorness of our condition, that when but the beasts of the field and the fowls of the air are destroyed, our comforts are forthwith gone. The comforts of natural men depend upon poor things, on the beasts of the field, the fishes of the sea, the fowls of the air; if God's hand be but upon them, and the cups be taken from their mouths, and the full dishes from their tables, presently they languish. It is otherwise with a gracious heart: Hab. iii. 17, 18, "Although the fig tree shall not blossom, neither shall fruit be in the vines; the labour of the olive shall fail, and the fields shall yield no meat; the flock shall be cut off from the fold, and there shall be no herd in the stalls: yet will I rejoice in the Lord, I will joy in the God of my salvation." A gracious heart does not languish because the beasts of the field and the fowls of the air are taken away: let them be taken away, yet he can rejoice in God, his spirit will be sustained.

"Shall be taken away." The word in the Hebrew is  $\text{סָמַח}$  they shall be gathered, for it is observable both in fowls and in fishes, that when they perceive any thing noxious unto them, or that they are in any danger, they gather themselves together: and that is the reason that fishes at some periods of the year are in such shoals; going from one place to another, and finding them noxious and hurtful, or perceiving some danger, they gather together. And so fowls migrate in the winter time. I have heard many in Holland say of the storks, that they gather themselves in the space of a week or thereabouts, and so take their flight together from that country. Thence I take the word here, they shall be gathered together, to mean, that there shall be such times of danger, and such infection in the air, and in the very waters of the sea, that the fishes and fowls shall perceive it, and so shall be gathered together (as they use to be gathered when they perceive any such thing) to go away; and being so gathered together, they shall be destroyed. It is good for men, like these creatures, in times of danger to gather together and to join one with another, and not be scattered one here and another there. This only for the reading of the words.

The scope of the Holy Ghost here, in threatening to take away the beasts and the fowls and the fishes, is this, To show the severity of God's wrath against the ten tribes; that as a king not only executes a traitor, but pulls down his house and burns all that is in it; so the great wrath of God shall so be upon these ten tribes, that he shall not only destroy them, but for their sakes bring destruction even upon the creatures. And this seems to be a threatening of greater wrath than God let out when he destroyed the world. In that destruction, we do not read of any hurt unto the fishes of the sea; but here the beasts of the field, the fowls of the air, and the fishes of the sea, shall be taken away. It refers to some fearful plague, wherein not only the air, but the waters are pestilential, and the cattle and the fish die. So it has been in other countries, and even in England, in the time of Edward the Third, such a pestilential quality was in the air and water, that birds and fishes were found with infectious blotches. And then in one church-yard. (I think about the Charter-house,) in one year's space, fifty thousand were buried of pestilential diseases. Such power has God over us, that he can let out his wrath by such ways as these, and such plagues are very fearful fruits of his wrath upon a country. What cause have we to bless God that he has delivered us from the infection of the air! If God had but brought a plague upon London last year, it would have been the heaviest calamity brought on any kingdom in the world; if we had had but such a plague as would have caused men to have fled and the parliament not have sat, its dissolution would have reduced the whole kingdom into a lamentable estate at this day. Let us bless God for that.

I remember upon this text a Jesuit that wrote but very lately, Cornelius a Lapide, has a most audacious lie. Since Scotland and Ireland, saith he, have departed from the catholic faith, (that is, from popery,) God's judgments are out against them; and whereas they were wont to be such plentiful countries for fish, God has cursed their very waters, and now their trade of fishing is nothing like to what it was formerly. He includes not England in this observation, for he was one that wrote lately, and had it seems some hope that England was coming to them again. But through God's mercy both Ireland, and Scotland, and England, have found it otherwise in this respect.

Hence,

Obs. 4. The good or evil of the creature depends on man; because it was made for man, man is punished or blessed even by the creature, and the creature comes to feel good or evil, according as man's behaviour is towards God. Let then mercy and pity toward the creature be an argument to keep us from sin. If you have not cruel hearts towards the creature, abstain from sin, for you do not only undo yourselves, but the creation, by your sin. And when at any time we see the hand of God out against any creature, let us reflect in our own hearts, My sin is the cause that this creature feels that evil which it does: and as Judah said unto Tamar, "She is more righteous than I;" so do you say of the creature, Indeed God's hand is out against it, but the creature is more righteous than I.

Obs. 5. God, when in a way of wrath, can cause his wrath to reach to those things that seem to be most remote. As the fishes in the sea seem to be most remote, therefore they are named here; "yea, the fishes in the sea also:" as if he had said, My wrath shall burn fiercely, and shall reach not only to yourselves and houses, your cities, and land, and cattle, but to the very fish in the sea. God can let out his wrath as far as he pleases.

Obs. 6. No creature can help man in the time of God's wrath; why? for every creature suffers as well as man. How vain then are the hearts of men, who solace themselves in hope of comfort from this or that creature, in the day of God's wrath! If you cry unto the mountains and hills, and say, Help us; they will echo back, Help us; for they need help as well as you; for the wrath of God is upon the creature in the day of his wrath, and therefore they are unable to aid.

Ver. 4. Yet let no man strive, nor reprove another: for thy people are as they that strive with the priest.

"Yet." The Hebrew word is,  $\text{וַעַן}$  Vere, as if he should say, Truly it is in vain for any one to stand striving or reproving his neighbour, or seek to convince or admonish him, it is in vain for one friend to meddle with another; for they are so violent in their wicked ways, so far from hearkening to private admonition, that they will contend with the priest, even with him that is set by God, and designed by special office, to teach and reprove. Some interpret it thus, They are so vile, and their wickedness so general, that no man is fit to reprove his brother for his sin. But I incline to the former interpretation, which imports thus much to us in the general.

Obs. 1. Sin cannot be got from men without striving. Such is the perverseness of men's hearts, that they take fast hold of deceit, Jer. viii. 5, and you cannot get them away without striving; like men in a frenzy, you cannot get them off from that which will injure them without struggling with them. When you admonish and reprove men for sin, you must expect beforehand that they will contend against you, yet afterwards, perhaps, they will bless God for you; at first you may be hardly used; What! you come to judge us? as they said to Lot, "Who made you a ruler?" So you generally receive very ill language from men at first when they are reprov'd, yet be not discouraged, they may bless God for you afterwards, they may say as David unto Abigail, "Blessed be God, and blessed be thy advice, and blessed be thou for thy counsel."

Obs. 2. Even private men, (as implied in the former note,) so long as there is any hope, should strive with their brethren, by way of admonition and rephension, to bring them from their sin. We must not say, Are we our brother's keepers? that is the language of a Cain. There is much striving and contending one with another for our own ends; oh that there were more striving and contending for God and his glory! It is a sign that the glory of God and the souls of our brethren are not precious in our eyes, when we can so strive and contend to have our own wills, and though God loses his glory, and our brother's soul is like to perish, we cannot strive and contend there, not even those of us that are full of strife otherwise.

Obs. 3. It is a great aggravation of sin, and a forerunner of destruction to a people, not to regard the strivings, admonitions, and rephensions of others. "Let no man strive;" It is in vain to strive now (that is the meaning); indeed, so long as there was hope there might be striving, but now they are past striving. This was the height of wickedness that they were grown unto, and the forerunner of that wrath of God which was now ready to fall upon them, that they were now past all rephension and admonition. I will cite two or three notable texts of Scripture to fasten this upon your hearts, that it is a most fearful thing for people to stand out against admonition and rephension. In 1 Sam. ii. 25, the text saith of Eli's sons, that they hearkened not unto the voice of their father; why? "because the Lord would slay them." O you children, hearken to this scripture, turn to it, read it over, you that are stout and rebellious, whose parents are reproving you for your sins and admonishing you, but you will not hearken to them; and in the pride of your hearts and stoutness of your spirits you refuse admonition; but if you read that scripture, and believe that it is the word of God, O tremble at it; "They hearkened not unto the voice of their father, because the Lord would slay them." Another text you have in 2 Chron. xxv. 16, a speech of the Lord's prophet to Amaziah; when the prophet came to rebuke him for worshipping the gods of that people whom he had overcome in battle; (here is the infinite vanity and sottishness of idolaters, Amaziah falls to worship those very gods that could not deliver themselves nor their people out of his hands;) when the prophet (I say) came to reprove him for it, in what a rage was he! one would have thought that it was reasonable for his spirit to yield to the prophet's reproof, but saith the king, "Art thou made of the king's counsel? forbear;" it may be he has other plans and intentions, what have you to do to meddle? The prophet did forbear indeed, but mark what he said, "I know that God hath determined to destroy thee, because thou hast done this, and hast not hearkened unto my counsel." Here was his inference, because the king would not regard admonition and reproof, certainly God purposed to destroy him. And it is observable of this king that he should now stand out so; for in the chapter before, he seems to be of a yielding spirit, though a wicked man: when he had hired a hundred thousand out of Israel to join with him in battle, and had given them all pay; yet, when God did but command him by the prophet to send them back with the loss of the hundred talents which he had paid the soldiers, on the very word of the prophet he sends back a hundred thousand of his soldiers, and loses all their pay; and yet this Amaziah, so yielding then, how stubborn was he against the prophet at another time! and therefore when he did so yield to God, God prospered him in the battle, and he overcame his enemies gloriously; but when, after that victory, he fell a worshipping the idols he had overcome, and was stout against the prophet, soon after he was destroyed. The last scripture is that in Prov. xxix. 1,

"He that being often reprov'd hardeneth his neck, shall suddenly be destroyed, and that without remedy." It is a dangerous thing to stand out against reproof and admonition.

Obs. 4. Sin increases where it is let alone. Let no man strive, nor reprove another. You may see that this people were become worse than they were before, for in the second chapter of this prophecy, "Say to your brethren, Ammi; and to your sisters, Ru-hamah." The godly amongst them are there admonished to speak to their brethren and to their sisters; but now it is come to such a pass, that there must be no more striving, no more admonishing. Those that once were capable of admonition, going on in sin and hardening their hearts, grow quickly past all reproof.

Obs. 5. There is a time when men may, yea, men should give up striving with, admonishing, and reprov'ing others, when they should let them alone. Especially in these two cases; when those they admonish scorn their admonition, when they trample their reproofs under their feet as swine, or turn again on them and rend them as dogs. There are two sorts not to be admonished or reprov'd, swine and dogs. When they become such, then you may leave, yea, you ought to leave admonishing them. For admonitions and reprehensions are precious things, pearls, that must not be cast to swine; Matt. vii. 6, "Give not that which is holy unto the dogs, neither cast ye your pearls before swine," they are holy and precious things: for I do not take that place to be meant of the sacrament only; it may, by an argument a minori ad majus, be applied to it, but it is primarily meant of admonition and reprehension. So that admonition is to be looked upon as a holy thing, as a pearl, you are to prize it, and therefore not to be angry when we come to admonish you; but you are to look upon the holiness of God in it, and so reverence it, and regard it as a mercy of God, and bless him for it. There are many in heaven now blessing God for the admonitions which they have received from others, as David blessed God for Abigail and her counsel. Many think it a great happiness to them that they can reject admonition and counsel; and when they are gone from such as have admonished them, and are among their companions, they can boast and say, Oh, such a one came and reprehended me, but I said thus and thus to him; and so they rejoice how they have rejected admonition. But if they knew all, they have cause to mourn; it is a great misery for them when it comes to that, that God shall bid those that have to deal with them to strive no more with them: when you have so rejected the admonitions of others, that you think you have succeeded in stopping their mouths, and that you have fairly rid yourselves of all their reproofs, oh, your misery is the greater. For,

1. You have deprived yourselves of a special ordinance of God. Admonition and reprehension, even brotherly admonition and reprehension, is an ordinance of God.

2. Those who strive thus, who admonish and reprove you, must give an account to God what is become of their admonition and reprehension. You must give an account to God one day, and so must they also; yea, they should do it at present, thus: after they have admonished, they must go to God and tell him how it has succeeded, for they have done it in his name if they have done it right; and if their admonition and reproof have prevailed with you, they are to return to God with blessing, to bless God that he has been pleased to bless their admonition. And on the other hand, if you reject their admonition, they are to tell that too, and to lament your condition, and to entreat of him to look upon you, and to say, Lord, I have been thus and thus admonishing such a one in thy name, but, Lord, he contemns and rejects it. When you are laughing that you have rejected such a friend's admonition, then he that has been faithful to you, he is telling God of it; and do you not think there will come somewhat of this one day?

3. You are left to God's striving and rebuking, and "it is a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living God." It is better when God strives with you by men, than that he should come and strive with you himself. As now, if a father send his servant to go and fetch in a child, to receive a rebuke, and he return and tell the father, He cares not for what I say; then the father goes himself, and it is worse for the child; so God sends thy brother to rebuke thee, and to fetch thee in, and thou carest not for him, but regardest him as thy fellow creature; and so thy brother goes to God, Lord, he regards not what I say. Then, saith God, I will rebuke him myself; and God's rebukes in this case will be "furious rebukes;" Ezek. v. 15, "When I shall execute judgments in thee in anger, and in fury, and in furious rebukes." Mark it, "furious rebukes;" the rebukes of a brother are loving rebukes, but if thou reject them, God's rebukes may come, and they will prove furious rebukes. The rebukes of a brother are out of love, but, Amos vii. 4, "The Lord called to contend by fire." When Job's friends strove with him they could not prevail, but, chap. xxxviii. 1, 2, "The Lord answered Job out of the whirlwind, and said, Who is this that darkeneth words without counsel?" The Lord out of the whirlwind calls to contend with Job, and so overcomes him. If thou regardest not friends contending with thee, the Lord himself, out of the whirlwind, may come and contend with thee. Take heed how thou rejectest the strivings of a brother with thee, for God may not only say he shall strive no longer, but, My Spirit shall no longer strive with thy soul.

"For thy people are as they that strive with the priest." That is the reason why they must not strive one with another. Here, only these two things require explanation:

1. Why it is said "with the priest," rather than with the prophet?

2. Why it is said, "For thy people are as they that strive with the priest?" Did they not strive with the priest? why then is it not said, This people are a people that strive with the priest?

To answer these two briefly, observe,

1. It is said that they "strive with the priest," rather than with the prophet, though the prophet did rebuke and strive with them, for this reason; because the priest was a standing office in the church of God, whereas the prophet was an extraordinary office, and they could not be sure whether he were a true prophet or no, but according to the event of the prophecy; but the priest they acknowledged to be an officer of God, and hence he is here named rather than the prophet.

2. It may be, the priests, being Jeroboam's, scarce strove at all, but rather joined with them in their wickedness; therefore he could not say they actually strove with the priests, but yet so vile were their hearts, that God saw that if there were priests to strive with, they would strive with them. Or, it may be, because indeed those priests of Israel at this time were not such as were called of God, for in 1 Kings xii. 31, the text saith of Jeroboam, that "he made priests of the lowest of the people, which were not of the sons of Levi;" and chap. xiii. 33, "Whosoever would, he consecrated him, and he became one of the priests of the high places." But the people received them as priests still, for they thought that the king's authority was a sufficient reason for their reception, as if the king had absolute power to make all church officers. So it was then, and this may be the reason of the expression, "as they that strive with the priest."

Obs. 1. It is the work of the priest to contend against men for their sin. That is the proper work of a priest, to strive with men against their sin. They are the salt of the earth, and so they should have some acrimony in them. In 1 Tim. iii. 3, it is said, indeed, of the minister of God, that he should be ἀμαχον, no striver. A minister of God should in office look to the souls of people, and be no striver; how will you say then that he should strive? It means, he should never strive with men for his own ends, or for his own ways; he should be no brawler, but one of a quiet and gentle spirit, willing to pass by wrongs done unto himself: but when he stands up for God he should be a striver. All faithful ministers should be strivers when they come in God's cause. Œcolampadius, writing to his fellow ministers. I remember, has a notable expression; "Let not our zeal and anger burn when we are scorned and reproached ourselves; but when the truth and the name of God are in danger, then let our heat arise, then let us strive." This, indeed, is the character of a true godly minister, that he is in his own cause gentle and yielding, but when it comes to the cause of God, zealous and fervent, ready to strive and contend with men in the ways of their sin.

Obs. 2. When ministers do reprehend and strive with people, they must expect to be striven withal by people. These are "as they that strive with the priest;" they have such vile hearts, that, had they never such faithful and godly officers set over them by God, they would strive with them. And indeed all faithful ministers must expect, that if they strive with men for their sins, men will strive with them. If there had ever any faithful ones been sent among them by God, they would have been ready to have cried out against them and told them, You are the cause of our misery, for you are so strict and precise that you will not yield to Jeroboam: you threaten us that judgments will come upon us, but you are the cause of our misery; were it not for you we should have all the people yield to what the king has set up, but you stir them up against it and so disquiet us. Thus no question but they would be ready to strive with the priest at that time. And thus they did with Amos, chap. vii. 12, "Go to Judah and prophesy there." They strove with Amos, who was contemporary with Hosea, prophesying at this time unto this people, and the land say they cannot bear Amos's words, let him go to Judah; he tells us we are a superstitious people, and that we do not worship God in the right manner and in the right place, let him go thither, we wish he were out of the country; he, and such as he is, raise a fire in the land. Thus when ministers discharge their consciences, showing people their sins and the mind of God, this is ordinarily their recompence. Thus it was with Jeremiah; chap. xv. 10, "Woe is me, my mother, that thou hast borne me a man of strife and a man of contention to the whole earth! every one curseth me." Jeremiah, a grave and holy prophet, yet a man of contention to the whole earth, and every man cursed him! A strange thing, that he should meet with such hard dealing; and yet he appealed to God in the matter of his sincerity, he desired not the evil day, and he prayed for the people until God bid him pray no more; when they were railing on him, he was praying for them. This was his unhappy situation; and so it was with other prophets besides him. I might name other texts in Jeremiah, as chap. xx. 7, 8, "I am in derision daily, every one mocketh me. For since I spake, I cried out, I cried violence and spoil; because the word of the Lord was made a reproach unto me, and a derision, daily." After I threatened that there should come some judgment upon the nation, I cried out of the violence and spoil that they for the present made in the nation, and then they mocked and scorned me. The like we have in Isaiah, he had the same dealings from the people: chap. xxviii. 13, "But the word of the Lord was to them precept upon precept, precept upon precept; line upon line, line upon line; here a little, and there a little; that they might go, and fall backward, and be broken, and snared, and taken." You will say, How do they strive against the prophet in this? I take it this scripture is often mistaken, and the intent of these words is, to show how the people jeered and mocked the prophet in his preaching. But the word of God was to them "precept upon precept," that is, they scorned at God's word; What! we have nothing but precept and precept, one precept after another, and commandment one after another, and one prophecy after another, a line upon line, and now you would have a little more: it is spoken contemptuously. I take this to be the meaning, because the threatening follows after, "that they might go, and fall backward, and be broken, and snared, and taken. Wherefore" (saith the text in the very next words) "hear the word of the Lord, ye scornful men." They manifested a scornful spirit in such kind of expressions, retorting upon the prophet in such a manner; and God's anger riseth, "Wherefore hear the word of the Lord, ye scornful men." It is usual with many scornful men, that if they can lay hold of any thing that ministers speak, by their manner of pronouncing it, or otherwise, to express their contempt: so did they with Isaiah, who was one of the most eloquent of the prophets, a man that spake in his time so as never man spake, for he spoke in a most high style, being himself of the kingly race, and a great man by birth; yet, when he came to prophesy to this people in the name of God, they thus jeered and scorned him. And Isa. xxx. 10, "Which say to the seers, and to the prophets, Prophesy not unto us right things, speak unto us smooth things;" tell not us of such and such things as these are: thus they contemned him. Yea, and in Christ's time we find, that when Christ himself preached, once, as soon as he had done his sermon, the people got him up to the brow of a hill that was upon the side of the city, and would have thrown him down and broken his neck; that was the reward he should have had. And of Paul, one of the best of preachers, whom Austin wished he could but see in the pulpit, when he came to preach, "What will this babblers say?" and, "He is a pestilent fellow," one that is of a furious spirit and an incendiary, and wherever he goes he turns the world upside down. Such kind of entertainment had the apostles. And Luther, I remember, has such an expression, Quid est predicare evangelium? What is it to preach, unless it be this, to turn all the fury of people upon oneself, if one would preach conscientiously? And in Matt. v. 12, Christ tells his disciples what revilings and persecutions they were likely to meet with; "For so," saith he, "persecuted they the prophets which were before you." And Acts vii. 53, "Which of the prophets have not your fathers persecuted?" Thus those that by their office are sent to speak to the people, must expect, if they would be faithful in their administrations, to be striven withal.

But though wicked men do strive, yet, as Samson said to the men of Judah that came to bind him that they might deliver him into the hands of the Philistines, "Do not ye fall upon me yourselves," it were well if faithful ministers were not often striven with by those that are godly. It is not so much for a faithful minister to have wicked and ungodly men to strive with him. Though they bind them, O brethren, do not you bind them. After that, in conscience of their duty and love to your souls, they have hazarded all the hatred and malice of the adversary, even to stand in the forefront of the battle; yet, in requital for all this, even many that are godly, if they see them grow troublesome, are ready to strive with them; because wicked men are exasperated by the word of God preached, therefore even such as make profession of godliness could wish that such ministers had never come amongst them. Is here a requital of the hazard that faithful ministers undergo? I appeal to you, Are there any people in the kingdom that stand as a butt against the malice of the adversary so much as godly and faithful ministers? Do not think that, from precipitancy or rashness, we do not consider what danger we stand in, in doing what we do. Yes, we consider it beforehand; but from a conscientious regard for our duty, and in faithfulness to your souls, we hazard our lives, we hazard all the rage and malice of the enemy. Now, when we have done all this, we expect a far better requital from many people than we find. When Moses and Aaron came to the people of Israel, when they were in Egypt, to deliver them, (for that was their message,) because for the present their bondage was increased, and the wrath of Pharaoh more incensed, therefore they were weary of Moses and Aaron, and fell to striving with them, as if they were the cause of their misery: Why, it was better with us before than since you came; if you had never come amongst us it would have been better with us: so now, because those that are faithful, out of conscience, labour to declare to you the mind of God, and to draw you to those duties that God requires; you are ready to think they have brought us into this state, they have kindled the fire, telling us it is the cause of God, and exhorting us to come in with our estates; and now the king is exasperated against us, and our adversaries are enraged, and we are likely to be in some misery: and so all the strivings of even the better sort are ready to devolve upon the ministers, and they strive with them as the only incendiaries and troublers of the places where they come. Well, however ministers may meet with hard dealing from some, even professors, yet their way is with the Lord, and their judgment is with the Almighty. There is a most admirable promise to help those that have been most forward to rebuke sin, and zeal for God, though men are enraged against them, in Isa. xlix. 2, "He hath made my mouth like a sharp sword; in the shadow of his hand hath he hid me." This text is true of every faithful minister. Mark, "He hath made my mouth like a sharp sword;" why, if I did speak smooth things, I were not like to be in so much danger; but if I speak sharp things, do not I hazard myself much? I shall incur the rage and anger of all kinds of people. But mark, "He hath made my mouth as a sharp sword;" but "in the shadow of his hand hath he hid me." Ministers whose mouths are as sharp swords, are in a great deal of danger; yea, but let such be comforted, here comes a promise presently; "in the shadow of his hand hath he hid me." So that those ministers whose mouths are sharpest in the name of God, and who speak but the truth of God, are under his protection more than those who have held their peace, they are in more safety, hid in God's hand, "in the shadow of his hand." So God comforted Jeremiah, chap. xv. 11; after he had cried out, Woe is me, I am a man of strife! Well, saith God, "Verily it shall be well with thy remnant; I will cause the enemy to treat thee well in the time of evil and in the time of affliction." It may be, many of you think it is a weakness in ministers to endanger themselves so much, and that they cannot be quiet as others are. Many of more moderate spirits, and who deal more wisely for themselves, keep in and say nothing, and so may escape, whatever side prevail; and may not they escape? No, they are in more danger than the other, for the former are under a promise, the latter not; they are so studious for themselves and for their own safety, that God will take no care of them. Our Saviour Christ takes care to encourage his disciples against the strivings of people with them: we have in Luke vi. many blessings pronounced; "Blessed are the poor; Blessed are they that hunger and thirst after righteousness; Blessed are they that mourn," &c. But they that understand the original shall find the word "ye" is not in, only blessed are the poor, and blessed are they that mourn, &c. But when he comes to his disciples, ver. 22, he addresses them more particularly: whereas people shall speak evil of them, and cast out their name as filth, then there is, "Blessed are ye," with an εστε, more than there was in all the other blessednesses; μακαριοι εστε. that shows God has a special care of his ministers when men speak evil of them and strive with them. But on the other side, "Woe to you when all men speak well of you!" is true indeed of all Christians; but I take it, that the scope of Christ in that place concerns ministers that were to go and preach, and woe to them when all men speak well of them! The word that is translated "well," is καλως, that speak of you so as to commend you as a curious, neat teacher; there are such and such fiery men, but here is a preacher, a quaint, refined man, a man that uses fine language, and such they will never persecute. The others are pronounced blessed when they are reviled and cast out as evil.

Obs. 3. To strive with those who come in God's name to reprove, is a great aggravation of sin and a hastening of judgment. God expects when he sends his ministers, that you should obey them in the Lord, and not strive with them. In 2 Chron. xxxvi. 12, God took it ill that King Zedekiah did not humble himself before Jeremiah the prophet; and in ver. 16, of the same chapter, it is said, They mocked the prophets, and contemned them, until the wrath of God arose against his people, and there was no remedy: no remedy when once they strove with those that God sent amongst them. Those that are sent by God, they are the special witnesses of God. Rev. xi. it is said of those two witnesses, that if any do them hurt and contend with them, fire shall go out of their mouths and devour their enemies. Those that are sent by God, and come in God's name, have the power of Jesus Christ with them: Matt. xxviii., "All power is given to me," &c.; "Go and teach," &c. As if he should say, Know, as I have all power given to me, it shall go along with you, to do good to those that obey your doctrine, and to execute vengeance upon all those that strive with you. The apostles were to shake off the dust of their feet in contempt of those who contemned their doctrine.

But you will say, May we not in any case strive with the minister?

I confess, in popery they would so exalt their priestly office, that all people must be brought into a blind obedience to them, and the people must receive whatsoever doctrine they preach; the priest's lips only must preserve knowledge, the people must not so much as examine it, but implicitly obey. It is one of the pope's canons concerning himself, that though he should carry down with him by heaps souls to hell, yet no mortal man must presume so much as to rebuke him or find fault with him; for he, being spiritual, as they say, (for so they abuse the Scripture,) judgeth all men, and no man judgeth him: and in a proportion, all their priests would fain claim some measure of the same power. And this certainly has been the policy of our priests of late, to bring the people into ignorance, so that they might not be able to contend with them, let them do what they would. They cry out, There was never such a time, when every tailor and every shopkeeper had so much knowledge that they can contradict their minister as now, and try their doctrines. They rage at this, that poor men have so much knowledge as to be able to try the doctrines they preach; they would fain teach, that you must be led, like a company of sheep, what way they would lead, and believe whatever they preach. Certainly, so many

*Nullo mortalium
presumat redi-gere, quia cunctorum iudicaturus a terrene est iudi-candus. Lex Canonica.*

gross errors and doting conceits of popery could never have prevailed, but by the people rendering blind obedience. Therefore there may be some striving with ministers, and that according to God, though here striving is forbidden: as thus; Christ requires that his sheep should know the difference between his voice and the voice of a stranger: yea, we know that there is a charge, that if any preach any other doctrine he should be accursed; even people should regard those that come to them to preach any other doctrine as accursed; therefore they are required to know; and they are commanded to try every thing, and "not to believe every spirit," yea, not to bid them "good speed" who bring other doctrines. And they are to "say to Archippus, Take heed to thy ministry, which thou hast received, that thou fulfil it." So far the people are empowered: yet still it must be done with respect to them. If they look upon them as true officers, (whether they be or no, yet, if they regard them as such,) the rule will apply, "Against an elder receive not an accusation, but before two or three witnesses;" you must not be so ready to strive with those that you look upon as officers. And "rebuke not an elder, but entreat him as a father:" it must not be in a malapert way, but with respect and reverence. And when you have done that, contended by witnesses, and spoken to them with reverence as owning the place wherein they stand, you have liberty then, if they bring strange doctrine, or their life be bad, to strive and contest with them in the name of the Lord, and not to suffer yourselves to be under such bondage as to believe whatever they would have you, without calling them to any account at all. There was wont to be crying out against people if they went from their parish churches, (as they called them,) Oh, it could not be suffered; and yet they themselves would be away a whole year together; as if the relation were not mutual, and they bound as much to continue with their people as the people tied to keep unto them: if the minister may have leave to go away, certainly the people may enjoy the same freedom; whereas, indeed, neither ought to go away, so long as the one is looked upon as an officer, and the other as under that officer. But I speak of that bondage into which they would have brought you, whereby in time they would so wholly have freed themselves, that you should have had nothing to do with them in church power. And then they would be the clergy; whereas it is an absurd thing that they should be accounted the clergy; for the Scripture, speaking of the people in distinction from the ministers, calls the people the clergy, 1 Pet. v. 3: Let them not lord it over God's clergy, τῶν κληρῶν, which in the same verse is called the flock. But they would be accounted the church and the clergy, as if the people were no part of the church at all, and all church power should come into their hands. And then they endeavoured to free themselves, as the papists you know do, from all civil power too, and were going many steps to it; therefore they would send forth things in their own names, and in time they would have wrought themselves free from all civil power, and have had all church power in their hands, and so, indeed, you could not strive with them. Bless God for the deliverance he has now given you.

Obs. 4. If public means prevail not, there is little hope of private. Why should one man strive with another? these "are as they that strive with the priest." Though they had never so good public means, they resisted, surely then they will resist private. Therefore, public means are to be preferred before private; when a man can speak as an officer to another, that is more to be regarded, and will be more efficacious to those God has a love unto, than private means. If this be so, let parents take heed how they teach their children to deride public means: when you have been at a sermon, perhaps you will despise what you have heard: it is just with God they should despise your admonition and reproof, for you have taught them to despise public means.

Obs. 5. To reject those that we look upon in office, though their calling be not good, is yet a wickedness that God will revenge. I say, though their calling be not right, so long as you regard them as true officers, and yet despise what they do according to God's will, so long God will avenge it. If they come in God's name, you must not oppose them, so long as you have any apprehensions that they are true officers: though, perhaps, if they were examined, they have no true calling; yet, if you cannot see but they have a true calling, you are to have such a reverence and respect unto them, that you are to be subject to them.

Ver. 5. Therefore shalt thou fall in the day, and the prophet also shall fall with thee in the night, and I will destroy thy mother.

Mark, though private men are here bid not to strive one with another, or reprove one another, yet Hosea goes on in his striving and reproving. "Therefore shalt thou fall in the day, and the prophet also shall fall with thee in the night." Hence,

Obs. 1. Those in office must go on though they be striven against; as long as they remain in office they must still go on, though people strive against them. I remember, Latimer saith in one of his sermons, Many ministers will not preach; and if they be asked the reason, it is this, because they can do no good to people. Oh, this (saith he) is a bad answer. Certainly, as long as you continue in that place, whether you do good, or whether you do not, you must go on in your work.

Obs. 2. When a threatening comes to individuals, then it works. "Therefore shalt thou fall." He directs the judgment to the individual, thou, every one of you, in the singular number. Perhaps some might think, Well, though the generality suffer, I may escape. No, look to yourselves, every one of you.

יִשְׁלַח translated here, "thou shalt fall," is a word that signifies the falling of a man by stumbling in the dark; a punishment suitable to their sin; they had no knowledge, therefore they shall stumble in the dark.

"In the day." Thou shalt stumble as a man in the dark, but it shall be in the day to thee; and yet thou shalt stumble. "In the day;" that is, first, in thy prosperity, for in the latter times of the second Jeroboam, (which was a little before the destruction of the ten tribes,) they were in a better situation than they had been in before, yet from thence they began to fall. I say, not long before their ruin, they were in more prosperity than they had been in many years before, therefore it is here said, "thou shalt fall in the day," even when thou art in a prosperous condition. Or, secondly, "thou shalt fall in the day," that is, you shall see your misery before you, yet you shall fall, you shall not be able to prevent it; it shall be in the day time, at noon-day, and you shall see plainly where your misery lies, yet shall you, as if you were in the night, stumble and fall.

O my brethren, this is a scripture that nearly concerns us here in England. If England fall and perish now, it falls and perishes in the day. We see, apparently, our evil before us; we see means to prevent it. God does not bring night upon us in this sense, that is, he does not bring misery so upon us, that we do not know how it comes, or by what means, or how we should prevent it. No, we are not so in the night, but in the day; we have seen the misery that has come upon us by a continued design, we know almost the very source and origin of that design, how it has gone on by degrees, step by step; we see now the reason of its breaking out, because the stream is stopped it bursts forth violently: we know who are the causers of our evil, what their counsels, intentions, what their ways are, notwithstanding all their protestations; we see what we are like to be brought into, if we do but yield a little, and do not appear to quit ourselves like men; and we see clearly what God would have us to do; we see ways and means to help us if we will, we have power to help ourselves, and direction too; we all of us know, or may know, clearly what we should do, and what, in an ordinary course of providence, would relieve us. Yet, Lord, how do we fall! notwithstanding this, we fall even in apparent day-light. So that if this kingdom be brought into slavery, it will be the heaviest wrath that ever fell upon a nation. Never any nation fell in a clear, open sunshine, as we are like to do if we perish now, having such means for our help.

Again, "Thou shalt fall in the day," hodie, that is, soon, presently, your destruction shall not be long.

"And the prophet also shall fall with thee in the night." There seems to be some difficulty in this. How comes this in. "thou shalt fall in the day, and the prophet also shall fall with thee in the night?"

Obs. 3. The falls of the prophets are falls of the night. "The prophet also shall fall with thee in the night." The blind lead the blind, and they both fall into the ditch. You gave yourselves up to false prophets to be guided by them, and here is all the good you shall have, both you and they shall perish together; the prophet also shall fall as well as ye.

Obs. 4. It is a most sad judgment for a people to be in affliction, and to have no prophet at all amongst them; no prophet to tell how long it shall continue, or to declare to them any part of God's mind. In the captivity of the ten tribes, they had no prophets, nor have had since. Judah was carried into captivity, yet in their misery they had prophets among them, Ezekiel, and Zechariah, and Haggai, to direct them. But Israel shall be carried into captivity and shall have no prophet to help them. Look to yourselves that you regard the prophets of God now; otherwise, when brought into misery, under the power of your adversaries, you shall have no minister among you, none to show you God's mind, or to open up to you his will. It was so with Israel, they never had any prophet since the captivity to tell them the mind of God.

Thus the prophets shall fall, but why "in the night?" Some, because they think hard of the different expression, read it thus; You shall fall in the day with the prophet, in the night your mother shall be destroyed: and it may fairly be so rendered. But I had rather read it as we have it, "thou shalt fall in the day, and the prophet also shall fall with thee in the night," for these two reasons:

1. Because God would inflict a greater darkness upon the false prophets in his just judgment, than upon the people. Those who abuse most light come into the grossest darkness, and therefore it is a usual expression in Scripture when prophets are threatened, to threaten that darkness shall be upon them: Micah iii. 6, "Therefore night shall be unto you, that ye shall not have a vision; and it shall be dark unto you, that ye shall not divine; and the sun shall go down over the prophets, and the day shall be dark over them:" over the prophets in a special manner. And Zech. xi. 17, "His right eye shall be utterly darkened;" the chief understanding that he has, his pregnancy of parts, shall be besotted. Do we not see it even at present, that the prophets fall in the night? There is more darkness now on wicked ministers amongst us, than upon ordinary people. Ordinary people understand more of the will of God than wicked ministers. God besots them in their very parts and abilities, and they do nothing but cry out still for that which will bring themselves and us into slavery. Were it not for them, people would see sufficiently well what to do, and the great darkness that is upon them comes from the prophets; they bring darkness on the people, therefore their own darkness is the greater. In divers towns are there not many people who know the mind of God, and see need of, and desire, a reformation in God's worship? and yet, notwithstanding, their ministers will see no need.

2. The distress that shall be on the prophets shall be greater than on other people, it shall be night to them indeed; not only shall there be more darkness on their understandings, but more darkness in regard of their afflictions; they shall be in greater horror of conscience and distress than any other people, for they shall see that they have brought you into all misery. And the truth is, that the great present misery on England is through false prophets, through wicked ministers, and their doctines. We had never been in such a condition as we are, had not they flattered at court, and told there that all was at the king's power and pleasure, and there ought to be no resistance, and to refuse whatsoever he would have was rebellion. Had they not taught such things as these, we never had had such times. Now if this kingdom be destroyed, it may be God may bring horror on their consciences, and however they may desire to throw the blame on others, yet, those that have any light remaining in them, the Lord may cause horror and distress in their minds, as the cause of all that evil that shall be upon us. They shall fall in the night, a black, dismal night shall be upon them when judgments come. Therefore in times of public judgment, God's ministers are to look on his hand as especially against them, and more horror and distress of conscience shall be upon them than upon others.

"And I will destroy thy mother." They boasted of their mother, as the papists do of their mother the church; but "their mother," that is, their church state and civil state, shall be destroyed; and so there shall be no hope of this people, both children and mother being destroyed: it seems to have some allusion to that in the law, where we are forbidden to take the dam with the young ones, because of the preservation of succession; but here, saith God, my wrath shall be so hot, that I will not only take the young ones, but the dam; they shall be destroyed together with their mother.

The word ררמתי here translated destroyed, signifies, shall be brought to be silent, for indeed this word signifies silence, as noting thus much, in times of God's judgments wicked men shall have nothing to say for themselves, but shall be forced to lay their hands on their mouths and be silent.

Ver. 6. My people are destroyed for lack of knowledge: because thou hast rejected knowledge, I will also reject thee, that thou shalt be no priest to me: seeing thou hast forgotten the law of thy God, I will also forget thy children.

"For lack of knowledge." As if he had said, If they had the knowledge of God they might have prevented all this, but they were ignorant and sottish people, and this was the forerunner of their misery and destruction. The heathens were wont to say, if their god Jupiter would destroy one, he would first besot him: so these people were first besotted and then destroyed. Ignorance is not the mother of devotion, but rather the father and mother too of destruction. How diametrically opposed is the language of the Scripture and the doctrine of papists! Ignorance is the mother of devotion, say they: Ignorance is the mother of destruction, saith God; they perish "for lack of knowledge." In the beginning of this chapter we have the sin of ignorance set forth, here we have its danger. There we had the charge, that they had "no knowledge of God in the land;" here we have the judgment, that they "are destroyed for want of knowledge."

Ignorance is not only the deformity of the soul as blindness is the deformity of the face; though a man or woman have never such a comely visage otherwise, yet, if they be blind, or have but one eye, it mars their beauty: so ignorance takes away the beauty of the soul; and not only so, but is dangerous and destructive, and that in these respects:

1. The rational creature is very active of itself, and will always be in motion, always working; and it is surrounded by pits and snares; if then it be blind, how dangerous will it be for it! as a mettled horse that is in the midst of deep snares and pits, and will be curvetting and dancing, and will not stand still, in what danger will he be, if blind! No creature is so full of activity as the rational creature is, he will be active in the world; and then, wanting knowledge, how dangerous is his situation!

2. Man's way is for eternity, and there is but one way that leads to an eternity of happiness, and that lies in the midst of a hundred cross-ways and by-paths. If he have not light, if he want knowledge, what shall become of him?

But you will say, Though he be dark himself, yet he may have some others to guide him, and so he may do well enough.

3. Therefore consider in the third place, That man is not only going onward through dangers and by-ways, but he must go on with his own light. All the light of all the angels in heaven, or of all the ministers in the world, cannot help a soul in his journey to eternity, except this light be conveyed into his own eyes. It is true, a man physically blind may have help, though it be but by a dog; but the soul that is ignorant, no angel in heaven can help, except as an instrument of God to bring sight into his eyes.

4. The work we are to do about our souls and eternal estates, is the most curious and most difficult piece of work, and we must do it by our own light. Surely, if a man were engaged in a work requiring ingenuity, as a curious watch or the like, he need have light: put such a one in the dark, and what can he do? The work of grace, God must enable us to do; but we must work together with God. God enables a man to make a watch, by giving him skill; but he must work with God: so it is with the work of grace, we must have light in our own souls; therefore ignorance is dangerous.

5. Blindness in this world makes men objects of pity and compassion, but this ignorance and blindness make men to be the objects of the hatred and curse of God. When you see a poor blind man here, is he loathsome in your eyes because he is blind, do you hate him? No, you pity him. But now the blindness of your souls makes you abominable in the sight of God, and God will be avenged on you for it. But you will say, How can we help it? We have put out our own eyes; God gave us light at first, and we brought ignorance upon ourselves.

If ignorance then be so dangerous that people perish for "lack of knowledge," how vile is it to deny the means of knowledge to men, merely to satisfy the humours of others! How many hundred congregations are there that have been deprived of their ministers, for a surplice, or a cross, or some such thing!

But you will say, Obedience to a church is an important matter.

The answer is, Therefore it is the fault of a church, or governors, to require such things as God never required; and after requiring them, it is a greater fault for them to insist so much on them, that many thousands must perish rather than their humours not be satisfied.

If this be the ground of perishing, then, though divers countries have felt the hand of God most fearfully, yet we hope that England shall not perish, for the knowledge of God is begun to shine among us, and never since the world began has it shone more brightly on a kingdom than upon us. We hope, therefore, though God intends to chastise us, we shall not perish.

"Because thou hast rejected knowledge." Only let us take heed that we do not reject knowledge, and despise it. The word מַחֲסֵר signifies to reject with despite and contempt; it is ignorantia non mera negationis, sed prava dispositionis, affected ignorance. "Thou hast rejected knowledge" two ways. First, when the means of knowledge are rejected, then knowledge is rejected. Secondly, when the directions of our knowledge are rejected, when we refuse to be guided by it, upon this our knowledge decays, and eventually is contemned.

Now this is a great sin in any, but especially in the priests. When others think that the knowledge of God and his truth is too slight, too mean a thing to engage their thoughts, this is vile. When merchants and tradesmen think they must busy their heads about some other matters, but as for this knowledge of the Scriptures, it is no great matter, they may be happy without that; let them have their tradings, and bargainings, and houses, and receipts; let them have their tables spread, and their dishes full; but for this Scripture, and these points of religion, these are things too mean for them. These men now despise knowledge, for so the word here signifies, reject it, as undervaluing its importance. But, I say, when the priests shall reject knowledge, the priests that should have laboured to have filled their souls with knowledge, if they shall seek to gratify the lusts of the flesh, and care not either to have the knowledge of God in their own souls, or to bring it to the people, but look upon it as nothing worth, this is in a more special manner a most grievous sin. How many are there amongst us at this day, that study to get preferment, &c., and then sell their books, and never after pursue knowledge! And others, if they have knowledge and learning, and prize it in some respects, yet in this they contemn it, they prize knowledge merely as serviceable to their lusts. It is not for the beauty and excellency of the knowledge of God, nor for the sweetness that they find in Christ, that they so laboriously study; but that they may be accounted scholars, men of understanding and learning. When we thus seek knowledge merely to subserve our lusts, we may be justly charged with despising knowledge.

But further, These priests, and such as were eminent in Israel, rejected knowledge, because they had their houses, and goods, and revenues amongst the ten tribes. (I beseech you observe it, for this concerns us.) I say, the priests that were amongst the ten tribes were settled there, and had their houses, incomes, and estates there; but now this was taught, that we must worship God at the temple in Jerusalem, and they rejected this knowledge especially, for they saw that if they embraced that truth of worshipping God in his own way, then, Farewell our incomes, farewell our livings, farewell our houses, we must leave our brave dwellings, and all our maintenance, and go from Samaria, and we must go to Judah; and how shall we live there? Upon this they shut their eyes against the knowledge of that very truth that should have brought them to the true worship of God; rather than they would lose their estates, they would reject that knowledge. And that I think to be the meaning of the Holy Ghost here; they despised, as other knowledge, so that knowledge of the true worship of God; so it is rendered by some, scientiam illam, that kind of knowledge they rejected. For they knew that those truths were suffering truths. Now suffering truths are truths that will hardly go down with either people or ministers, they had therefore rather be ignorant of them; as the Holy Ghost in Ezekiel speaks of men that shut their eyes against the sabbath, so they shut their eyes against those truths which should have brought them to the true worship of God. And in this case it is not enough for a man to say, God knows I go not against my conscience; if my conscience were convinced that such and such things must be in the worship of God agreeably to his word, I would obey it. But the reason they see not this to be the word of God is, because they have no mind to know it, they reject that knowledge, it is against their ease and preferment, and it is suffering truth, and therefore they shut their eyes against it. This is no excuse. Mark the judgment that follows.

"I will also reject thee." You despise knowledge, I will despise you; so the words may be read, as well as reject you. God scorns wicked men as much as they scorn him; "with the froward he will deal frowardly," and with the scornful he will deal scornfully, that is, he will laugh them to scorn. What! do you look on God's ways and worship as a vile thing? are the truths of God vile in your eyes? You are vile in God's eyes, he looks upon you and your spirits with as much contempt as you can regard his worship, his saints, and his ordinances. You despise knowledge, and I will despise you, saith God.

And "I will reject thee." The word רָשָׁתִי here translated reject, has a letter in it more than it has in any other place in all the Scripture; and Tremelius from thence observes, there is a letter in this word in the Hebrew that is redundant, and it denotes the extraordinary manner of God's rejecting them, he will cast them out of the hearts of his people, as he does apostate ministers, whom, above all others, God rejects with contempt, pouring shame and contempt upon them more than on any in the world. That is his note upon this; he will reject them with contempt; yea, for ever. You heard before, in Luke vi., that Christ pronounced his disciples, faithful preachers, blessed, when their names were cast out as evil, when they were vilified by men. But now mark, when a minister goes on faithfully in declaring the mind of God unto people, and there be shame cast upon him, that minister is blessed; but if the minister be wicked, and there be shame cast upon him, that shame is a part of the curse, for then he is cast out as unsavoury salt, and men tread upon it, saith Christ. Wicked men would cast out the godly, but God and God's saints embrace them, and bless God for them; but if you be wicked, and men cast you out as unsavoury salt, then men condemn you, then you are trodden upon; yea, so rejected, as never to be received again. In Ezek. xiv. 13, the priests that did forsake the Lord, when Israel forsook him, must never again come near unto God, no, not so much as near unto the priest's office: a notable text, which it concerns you to know for your direction about receiving in persons who have wickedly apostatized in evil times. Perhaps now they preach good sermons, but you are to inquire what they were when others were superstitious and evil; and although we are not utterly to reject them, yet, until there be further evidence of their repentance, they are not to be received. God threatens an utter rejection of those Levites that forsook him when Israel forsook him.

Now the observations that I would derive from hence, are,

Obs. 1. Unfaithfulness in service provokes God to cast us out of service. I cannot stop to set an edge on this.

Obs. 2. It is a great judgment to be rejected from the priest's office, from the office of a minister: "I will reject thee, that thou shalt be no priest to me." To be rejected from any employment is a great judgment: Neh. v. 13, "So God shake out every man from his house, and from his labour, that performeth not his promise." It is a judgment to be shaken out of our labour, but to be shaken out of such an office, whereby we draw so nigh unto God as to be the mouth of God to the people, and the mouth of the people unto God again, is a sore evil.

Again, whereas it may be said, Israel had no true priests, therefore it was no judgment for them to be rejected out of that office; but yet to be cast out of what we seem to have, is likewise a judgment of God, Luke viii. 18.

"Seeing thou hast forgotten the law of thy God, I will also forget thy children."

"Seeing thou hast forgotten the law of thy God." You live so as to show that you never think of the law, of its holiness, equity, and authority, and the threats annexed unto it, for if you remembered these you could not go on so quietly in a course of sin; but you have cast off all the remembrance of the law, it is even worn out of your memory. The book of the law of God was lost for a long time in Judah, surely in Israel much more.

"I will also forget." Etiam ego, Eten I. It is a sad thing to be forgotten by our friends when we are in misery, Oh that such a dear friend, such a father or such a mother, should forget me! but how sad a thing is it for God to forget you!

"Thy children." That is, there shall be no succession in the priestly office. This was threatened against Eli's house, 1 Sam. ii. 20. It is a blessing for the godly children of godly ministers to succeed them in the office, and the contrary is a judgment. Your children shall not succeed you in this office, but they shall be forgotten by me. The families of wicked ministers, through God's judgment, are many times forgotten. You have forgotten me, I will also forget you and your children. I will not here speak how the child may suffer for the father's offence, we often meet with it; only now, as it concerns the posterity of wicked ministers, they are, through God's judgments, often forgotten. But let not the families of godly ministers, especially if their children be godly too, oh let them not be forgotten. It is a judgment threatened upon these wicked priests, that God would forget their children, therefore it is not so evil though men forget them; but if there be any that have been faithful ministers, God forbid their children should be forgotten after they are dead. This city has been honoured for its respect to godly ministers; but have you never forgotten their children, their families that have been left behind? When they were with you, and preached among you, you seemed mightily to respect them; but are there not many that belong unto their families that live now with you, in a hard condition? yea, their children and families that are godly, their widows too, how are they forgotten! If the godly children of pious ministers should go unto God and complain thus, would it not be a sad thing? Lord, thou didst threaten idolatrous priests that forgot thee, that thou wouldst also forget their children; but, Lord, my father was in the city a faithful minister, he remembered thee, and was a faithful remembrancer for thy people, yet we are forgotten; is this according to thy word? shall the judgment threatened on the children of idolatrous priests be the judgment upon us that are the children of faithful ministers? are we to be thus forgotten though our fathers forgot not thee? Look, therefore, into the families of godly ministers, look after their children, and as their fathers did not forget God, do not you forget them; let not the judgment threatened on the children of wicked ministers be upon them, but let there be a distinction made between the children of faithful and godly ministers, and the children of idolatrous priests.

Ver. 7. As they were increased, so they sinned against me: therefore will I change their glory into shame.

The Lord is here further charging these ten tribes, but especially their priests, at them he aims most. They had before rejected the knowledge of the Lord, and the Lord threatened rejection of them. The knowledge, הדעת, that knowledge, scientiam illam, that knowledge of the true worship of God, that he was to be worshipped at Jerusalem alone: that truth was a suffering truth, therefore that truth they did especially reject; and in this seventh verse there is some ground for their rejection of the knowledge of God, "As they were increased, so they sinned against me." God had increased them, they were become a great multitude, and as their number increased, so their sins increased. But that which I especially conceive to be the meaning of the Holy Ghost here is, As their prosperous condition increased, so their sins increased; they were grown up to a height of prosperity, and that made them sin against and reject the knowledge of God.

The first is not to be rejected, viz. As they increased in multitude: so the Seventy, κατὰ τὸ πλῆθος, according to their fulness. And it may be understood both ways, fulness of number, or fulness of their prosperous estate.

Obs. Where there is an increase in number, there is usually an increase in sin. The more meat there is in the pot, the more scum arises. So in great cities, what a great deal of filth is there, filth of sin, moral filth! Where there is any confluence of people, as at fairs and markets in the country, or in any corporation, what abundance of defilement is there continually! In churches, at their first beginning, a few, called saints, can agree well together, and go on sweetly in their way; but, ordinarily, as they increase in number they begin to corrupt and increase in sin. They should increase so much the more in godliness; but this is the corruption of man's heart, every one bringing in some evil, therefore as the number, so the sins, increase.

But because the second appears the true interpretation, to speak to that a little: As they increased in their prosperous estate. At this time the ten tribes were in a very prosperous condition, grown rich and great, and so increased, especially the priests; for they had the favour of Jeroboam and of the princes; for their main design was to uphold their false worship, and the priests served for their turns best, therefore they countenanced those priests of Dan and Bethel, the priests of the calves, and they flourished at this time in the court and in the country, and were much increased in their prosperous estate; and "as they increased, so they sinned." This is man's vile disposition, that increase of mercies should be the increase of their sin. Thus was it with the church; when in a lower condition, then there was more holiness and more sincere love to the truth, but when it began to flourish in outward prosperity, it began to decay in true piety. And, therefore, ecclesiastical history tells us, that when the church received from Constantine great donations, then there was heard a voice in the air, Hodie venenum infunditur, &c., To-day poison is poured forth into the church: when great livings and great estates were given to the ministers of the church, then poison was poured forth into it. And so when Boniface, the martyr, was asked whether it were lawful to receive the communion in wooden chalices, he well answered, Time was, when in the church there were wooden chalices and golden priests; but now, there are golden chalices, but wooden priests. And on Innocent the Third showing Aquinas a table of gold and silver, and saying, We have no need to say as Peter once did, "Silver and gold have we none!" Neither, replied Aquinas immediately, can ye say, "Arise and walk;" as you have more money than they had, so you have less gifts, and not so much of the Spirit of God. It was so in the increase of the prosperity of the church, and is generally the case. As with the spleen, the greater it grows, the less the body is; so, the more prosperity, the leaner and weaker are the spirits of men. Deut. xxxii. 15, "Thou art waxed fat, thou art grown thick, thou art covered with fatness: then he forsook God which made him, and lightly esteemed the Rock of his salvation." How many, when they were low and poor in their estates, were more holy and gracious, and more spiritual, than now! It is true in particular persons, in churches and countries, but most true in ministers. It was a complaint once made to a prelate here, that he had a kinsman, a very zealous preacher in the country: Well, said he, I will silence him: and his mode of silencing was this, he gave him two livings, and that stopped his mouth: when he came once to have fattened livings, then his zeal quickly abated. And Jerome, in the life of Malachus, saith, When the church came to Christian princes, and there had countenance, we may well say of it, that indeed it was fattened with riches, but diminished in virtue and godliness.

Quando ecclesia ad principes Christianos venit, factam fuisse opulens pleniorum, sed virtutibus minorum, ait Jerom.

God threatens here, that seeing they abused their prosperity, he therefore would turn their glory into shame. God loves to stain the pride and haughtiness of men. He would turn the glory of the people, and the glory of the priests, but especially the glory of the priests, (for so it is meant, but we must include all,) into shame: either, first, he would instead of glory bring shame; or, secondly, he would make that wherein they most gloried, to be their shame.

1. That he would bring shame instead of glory. So God is wont to do. Women that glory in their beauty and splendour, should mark well Isa. iii. 16—24, "Moreover, the Lord saith, Because the daughters of Zion are haughty, and walk with stretched-forth necks, and wanton eyes," &c.; therefore, "instead of well-set hair, there shall be baldness; and instead of a stomacher, a girding of sackcloth; and burning instead of beauty." If any will glory in parts, the Lord justly brings shame upon them, blasting their gifts. As is reported of Albertus Magnus, that great scholar, that for five years before his death he lost his faculties so completely that he could not read. God can soon blast men's parts when gloried in, and turn them to shame. If any glory in riches, God can soon turn that into shame also. History tells us of an earl of Exeter, that married the sister of King Edward the Fourth, of whom yet Philip de Commines reports, that he was seen barefoot, and begging his bread, in the Low Countries. God can soon take away the riches of men, and turn that, their glory, into their shame. And then, if any glory in honour, God can soon turn that into shame, as in the case of Herod, who gloried in the applause of the people when they cried out, "It is the voice of a god, and not of a man;" and presently was he consumed by worms.

And much shame comes to men that glory in these things. Mark, according to the glory of men in external things, so is their shame when God takes them away. Here is the difference between the saints and the wicked when they lose these outward things. When the saints lose them, much shame comes not to them, because they gloried not in them when they had them; but carnal hearts, because they know no higher things than these, when they are taken from them, much shame accrues to them, for they gloried in their possession.

2. God makes the very things they glory in to turn to their shame. He not only takes away their parts, and brings ignorance and dotage instead of them, but makes their very gifts to be their undoing, and uses them to bring them to shame. He makes their very riches and honours, and their glorying in their success, to turn to their shame. As now, when men glory in this, that they had such success and such a victory at such a time; and thence infer, Surely God is with us, and blesses and owns us; in this they glory: well, God turns this into their shame, when he appears against them, and, blasting their success, makes it manifest to all, that though they have all outward means, yet they avail nothing: now, where is the argument of God's owning their cause, and their reason for glorying, if success be the test. Those that shall make that the only or principal argument that God is with them, how does God turn their glory into shame, when he apparently denies them success, and that when they have most outward means for its attainment! The saint's shame is turned into glory, but the wicked's glory is turned into shame. When the saints suffer any shame for God, they can glory: the apostles, Acts v. 41, rejoiced that they were accounted worthy to suffer; that they had the honour to endure dishonour, so the words properly signify; they gloied that they bore about them the marks of the Lord Jesus. Thus, what the world accounts their shame, is their glory; and that which the world judgeth to be their glory, is their shame.

But it is especially meant of the priests, for the prophet is speaking of them. God will turn "their glory into shame." The priests, though they did reject the knowledge of God and their duty, and never regarded that wherein the true glory of their office consisted; that blessed knowledge of God, which might have made them glorious indeed, was despised by them, and the faithful administration of their office neglected: yet they would glory for all this, they would bear it out as if they were the men: why, they were countenanced at court, had good livings, and they could lord it over their brethren; and in that they gloried. It is usual with wicked priests, if they can have but countenance from them that are in public places, and can have but estates and livings, though they be never so negligent of their office, and never so ignorant, yet to glory. How has it been thus amongst us of late! How have they carried their heads on high, and accounted themselves the triumphant church, and all must be made to yield to them! The land was not able to bear the pride of prelates and prelatical men. Cyprian saith, Ambition and pride sweetly sleep in the bosom of priests. And there are none indeed so much puffed up with vain pride as they are, especially the more ignorant they are, and the more they neglect that in which the true glory of their office consists. On such God delights to pour shame and contempt, therefore, in Isa. ix. 15, saith, "The prophet that teacheth lies, he is the tail," the very meane; and Mal. ii. 9, "Therefore have I also made you" (speaking of the priests that had been partial in the law and had not kept the ways of God) "contemptible and base before all the people;" and Rev. iii. 16, "I will spue thee out of my mouth," as loathsome; and Matt. v. 13, "If the salt have lost his savour, wherewith shall it be salted? it is thenceforth good for nothing, but to be cast out, and to be trodden under foot of men," as a contemptible and vile thing. Thus God casts shame upon wicked priests.

Ambitio et superbia
suaviter dormiunt
in sinu sacerdotum.
Cypri. de Jejun. Sc.

Ver. 8. They eat up the sin of my people, and they set their heart on their iniquity.

"They eat up the sin of my people." There is some difficulty in these words. To eat up sin, to eat up the sin of people, what is that? There is much in this to be learned.

The word חַטָּאת here translated sin, has in Scripture three acceptations.

First, It is used for that which is properly sin, the transgression of God's law: for that I need not cite any scripture.

Secondly, It is used for the punishment of sin: "He shall bear his sin," his punishment of sin. Christ "was made sin." And,

Thirdly, It is used for the sacrifice that was offered for sin: Lev. x. 17, "Wherefore have ye not eaten the sin" (that is, the sin-offering) "in the holy place?"

The observation from hence (by way of allusion, at least) is,

Obs. 1. Ministers should eat the revenues they have by their office in a holy place; that is, their houses, in which they spend their income, should be holy places; for the offerings of the people were what the priests had in return for their services, and they were to eat them in a holy place: so ministers now should eat the means they have coming in, in holy places, their houses should be sanctuaries. Let those priests that spend their time in play, in pleasures of the flesh, in taverns, and make their houses very sinks of vice, let them hearken to this.

But where lies the charge here, "They eat up the sin of my people?"

First, in that they flattered them in their sin, and so got advantage thereby. So Gregory: Why or how are they said to eat up the sin of people, but because they nourish the sins of delinquents for their own advantage? So all your court flatterers and others, that flatter men in their sin for their own advantage, may be said to feed on the sins of the people.

Cur peccata populi comedere dicuntur, nisi quis peccata de-linquentium, &c.

Secondly, Because they were negligent in their office, and took all the profits and advantages resulting, but neglected their charge, let people go on in their sin, and cared not what became of them in that respect, provided they received their tithes and revenues; such ministers may be said to live upon, or to eat, the sins of the people, and to wear their sins; their very backs may be said to be covered, and their tables spread, with the sins of the people. A writer on this place relates a story of a prelate in Charles the Fifth's time, that, inviting his friends to his house, and preparing good cheer, they did not eat of it: What, saith he, will you not eat of dainties that are bought at so dear a rate? this meat which I have prepared for you, and you will not eat, is like to cost me the pains of hell. He was convinced in his conscience of the neglect of his duty, and so regarded the very food on his table as the sins of his people, and that which was like to cost him eternal misery.

But further, to open it far more clearly, "They eat up the sin of my people;" that is, the sacrifices which were offered for sin.

But you will say then, How is this so deep a charge, that they should eat of the sacrifices that were offered for sin? for God allowed the priests to eat the sin-offering, as that place, Lev. x. 17, shows.

In this, therefore, consisted the evil, that they were greedy of the people's sacrifices, not that God might have honour, but that they themselves might gain advantage. It is true, God had honour by the people's offering of sacrifice, but they looked not to that so much as to their own profit. Hence, they urged people as much as they could to sacrifice, teaching them to rest in their sacrifices, and indeed making light of their sin; Though you sin, come, and I will offer for your sins, and they shall be pardoned. Just as the papists at this day teach the people, though they sin, yet by so many masses, and Pater-nosters, and indulgences, and dirges, they shall be delivered; and by this means they get the wealth of kingdoms, and eat up the sins of the people. The priests in those times were apt emblems of the papists now.

Again, They were glad when people did offend and sin against God, because then their sacrifices must be multiplied, and so their gains increased: and so it is a rebuke of the covetousness of priests. It is a most abominable thing for those that are to watch over souls, to regard their own profit and carnal gratification, more than the good of souls: just like your chancellors' and commissaries' courts of old, they cared not what offences there were, they rejoiced at long presentments, all brought grist to their mill. And, it seems, there were such priests in Bernard's time; in his 77th sermon on the Canticles, he quotes this place, and saith, They eat up the sin of my people; as if he should say, they exact the price of their sin, but take not due care for the sinners. And again, Give me any one of those that are governors in the church, that does not watch more to empty people's purses than to save their souls.

Obs. 2. It is a most cursed thing to desire or rejoice in the sins of others because of our own advantage. How many are there that watch for the falls of their enemies, and rejoice in their sin! I appeal to you: had you an enemy and you heard of his fall, though it were a sin against God, yet, if it tended to his disgrace, would you not rejoice and be glad of it? because the more an enemy is disgraced, the more you think yourself justified and honoured. This is truly horrible! O, be humbled before the Lord for it, and seek unto God, that, if it be possible, he may pardon the thoughts of thy heart in this thing. What! to rejoice that the infinite, blessed God is dishonoured because thou thyself hast an advantage! it is most horrible and accursed. How many are there, that, looking on the professors of religion, whom they think to be their adversaries, rejoice when they see them fall! Why? because they think by their disgrace they themselves are justified. This is to feed upon the sins of people. You shall have vermin and swine rooting in filth and in dung; so there are many that feed upon the defilement of others, on the filth of their sins. It is a vile and cursed wickedness, to be glad, for our own advantage, of the afflictions of our neighbour, much more to rejoice at his sin. When thy neighbour falls into affliction, thou shouldst not rejoice at his affliction, though thou art advantaged by it; but when thy neighbour falls into sin, to be glad of it for thine own advantage, is a most cursed thing indeed. Were a surgeon to rejoice at another man's wounds, and to prolong the healing of them, because he thereby received some profit, would not every one cry out against him? and truly this were wicked. So for soldiers to love war, and willingly to lengthen it out, and care not what becomes of the lives of men, and the woeful miseries of a kingdom, that they may have continued pay, this you will all account a great wickedness; but this is not so bad as to be glad of the sins of people for our own advantage. Certainly, as surgeons may be said in such a case to feed upon the matter and stuff of the wound; and those soldiers may be said to drink of the blood of people; and those cups of wine that go down so merrily, and those dishes of meat that they are so jovial with, may be said to be the flesh and the blood of people; yet, all this is not so bad as to feed upon the sins of others. Thou that feedest upon the sin of thy brother, dost thou not know that this diet of thine must needs breed diseases? It is not wholesome food, but such as will one day breed the worm of conscience, and create such remorse as humiliation and repentance will hardly purge thee of. It was once wittily said of a prelate that was very fat, that he became so by so often eating his own words; and no marvel, though men grow to have fat hearts that feed upon the sins of people. As this is the ordinary diet of many, so especially of ministers: and for ministers to feed upon the sins of people, so as to keep them alive by their flatteries and connivance, is surely evil; but if by their faithful preaching they did first slay the sins of the people, and then receive maintenance for their work, this is allowed by God, and this they may do. When God bade Peter, Arise and eat, he first bid him slay, "Arise, Peter, slay and eat." so ministers, if first they would arise and slay the sins of the people by their preaching, may eat, that is, may then comfortably receive maintenance and allowance for their work; but, if they keep their sins alive, then their diet is evil, for they feed upon their sins.

What! is there such wickedness in the hearts of men as to rejoice in the sins of others for their own advantage? Oh how much more then should the saints rejoice, for their Master's sake, in the graces of God as manifested in others! In Ezek. viii. 17, you have an expression which seems hard to be understood. God charges the people there, as with other notorious evils, so with this among the rest, that "they put the branch to their nose." I conceive the meaning to be this; The people are there charged with idolatrous service, rendered to either the sun, or Vesta, the goddess of the earth, because they believed that by them the sweet flowers and branches of trees came forth; and when they worshipped either of these, in acknowledgment of the honour due to them they took a branch and put it to their nose, thereby showing their respect and homage unto them, as rejoicing in that good and sweet fruit which was caused by this, their god or goddess: so that God charges them here for so rejoicing in these creatures, as to worship the sun or the earth as their cause. To apply this to our purpose; As idolaters, because they looked upon the sun or the earth as the cause of such flourishing plants, and sweetness of branches and flowers, put them to their nose and delighted in them, and thereby showed their reverence for their idols; so should we take the graces of the Spirit of God in our brethren, that are the fruits of the Sun of righteousness, and put them to our nose, smell at them, account them fragrant, and so do honour unto Jesus Christ as their sole author. Thus much for that phrase, "They eat up the sin of my people."

"And they set their heart on their iniquity." The words are נפש ישיב עליהם they lift up every one his heart, נפשיהם their hearts.

Calvin.

It may be interpreted either of the heart of the priests, or the heart of the people, according to the scope of the Spirit of God.

First, The heart of the priests, they lift up their hearts to the iniquity of the people. This phrase, lifting up of the heart to a thing, intimates in Scripture, the earnest desire that there is in the heart to attain such a thing; as in Deut. xxiv. 15, speaking of poor men, it is said, "He is poor, and sets his heart upon his hire." A poor man that wants provision for his family, sets his heart upon his wages; and the word used in this text is, he lifteth up his heart to his hire, Oh my hire, that it might come! And Jer. xxii. 27, "To the land whereunto they desire to return, thither shall they not return;" that is, the land whereunto they lift their hearts, for which they have an earnest desire. And Ezek. xxiv. 25, "When I take from them their strength, the joy of their glory, the desire of their eyes, and that whereupon they set their minds, their sons and daughters." it is applied to their love unto their children, they lift their minds, or their hearts, to their sons and their daughters: so that then it signifies the earnest desire the priests had unto the sins of the people, that they might have the greater advantage by them: as some who are of poor, servile spirits, and whose greatest means arise from burials, are said to be glad and rejoice when they hear the bell ring; and are ready to desire the death of men out of regard to their own fees, because the more and the richer that die, the more advantage accrues to them. So the priests at this time desired the multiplying of the sins of the people, that they might thereby have the more sacrifices.

But I rather think, according to other interpreters, the passage to refer chiefly to the lifting up of the hearts of the people; that is, that the priests might have the more advantage by their sacrifices; they encouraged the people in their sins, lightening and lifting up their hearts above their guilt, persuading them that if they offered up sacrifice all should be well, they should be fully cleared, and need not be further troubled; whereas, indeed, the priests ought to have convinced men's consciences of the evil of their sins, and when they came to sacrifice, showed them how they deserved death for them, and that the death of the animal, and their laying their hands upon the head of it, signified that their sins deserved the death eternal of their souls; and they should have instructed the people how the sacrifices typified the blood of Christ, and have told them, You come now to offer sacrifice, and to have the blood of beasts shed, this shadows forth the Messiah that is to come into the world, the Son of God, that is to be made man, and to shed his precious blood to pacify the wrath of God for your sins; and you are to exercise your faith upon this Messiah that is to come. They should have told them that no sin could be pardoned but by the blood of Christ; they should have burdened their consciences with their guilt, and made their sins heavy; but they lightened their minds by persuading them, that if they did but offer sacrifice all would be well, they might indulge themselves; and though they committed sin again, yet still a sacrifice could atone for it.

This was a most abominable sin of the priests. Calvin, on this place, introduces Plato inveighing against the absurdity and ridiculousness of people's offering sacrifice, thinking thereby to pacify their gods, and gain a liberty to sin again: thus even a heathen thought it an abuse of a heathen god, for people to think it enough to offer sacrifice. And yet, do not many amongst us commit sin, and take liberty to themselves to satisfy the lusts of the flesh, and then they will pray to God to forgive them? and some go so far that they will fast, and then sin, and then pray and fast, and return to their sins again, thinking to put off God with such kind of sacrifices as these are; and so making repentance, that should be the death of their sins, a means to nourish their sins. The priests here abused the type, the sacrifices, lightening the hearts of people by telling them that there remained a sacrifice to expiate their sin. And have you not at this day many that abuse the Antitype as much, that tell the people thus; Sin as fast as you can, there is a sufficient sacrifice for sin; it is but to believe in Christ, who has shed his blood for the greatest of all sins; you may then sin as fast as you can, the penalty is paid. There may indeed be truth in the words, that there is a sacrifice for the greatest sin, but there is a manner in declaring it that either encourages or deters people from sin. I appeal to you, whether you have not many that do so reveal Christ, and open the rich and glorious free grace of God in Christ, as an encouragement to people to sin. It is true, when examined they deny it: No, God forbid; they encourage not men to sin, they only tell them of God's free grace. Yea, but they tell them of it in such a manner, without such cautions as prudent, wise, conscientious ministers use: and therefore you find that all your lewd and looser sort of professors follow them.

It appears that in Jerome's time there were such people, for he saith, When they saw any to live wickedly they would say thus to them, You sin and offend, but God requires of us nothing else but only to abide in the truth of the faith; to believe, and that is enough. And again, Which faith, if you do but keep, God regards not so much what your lives are, only looks that you do believe. And by this means (saith he) men repent not, neither are they humbled, but walk up and down with a stretched-out neck, in proud security, because they think they hold the true faith, and so take liberty to sin. The church has been continually troubled with this generation, and no marvel there be such men now amongst us; for the reformation being yet incomplete, some kind of liberty is for the present permitted to such, and therefore I say, no marvel that we have such amongst us; men who abuse the free grace of God, and lighten the hearts of sinners continuing in their sin, by telling them there is a sufficiency in Christ's sacrifice to atone for all transgression.

Ver. 9. And there shall be, like people, like priest: and I will punish them for their ways, and reward them their doings.

The Lord, threatening the ten tribes, especially directs his denunciations against the priests, as the great cause both of the sin and punishment of the people; evil ministers in a country being often a chief cause of its guilt and misery. Divers of God's threats against them we saw before, and still there follows,

"There shall be, like people, like priest." Here is a mixed threat both against priest and people. They have made themselves like one another in sin; God will make them resemble each other in punishment. They join themselves together in sin, and were alike there; God will join them in judgment, and they shall be alike there too. There is a likeness between people and priest on two grounds, I mean in evil especially.

First, They generally are like in sin one to another, from the just judgment of God. When people dislike the powerful ministry of the word, and their hearts cannot bear its spirituality and force, God, in just judgment, sends unto them ministers according to their very lusts, ministers that shall be suitable to harden them in that very disposition of their hearts. And this is a fearful judgment on a people. They may rejoice, and bless themselves in it, and think themselves now quiet and secure, and say they have got a very honest and peaceable man amongst them; but while they are rejoicing, the wrath of God is in a most dreadful manner let out against them, in sending them a minister according to their lusts. As God threatens in Ezek. xiv. 4, "If a man set up an idol in his heart, God will answer him according to his idol;" so, when people set up idols in their hearts, and are bent on such and such lusts and wicked ways, God, in his just judgment, will answer them according to their own hearts' lusts, and they shall have such ministers sent amongst them as will harden them in their wickedness.

Secondly, They come to resemble one another in evil from the great influence they mutually exercise over each other: sometimes from the people to the priests; if the people be malignants, superstitious, loose, and vain, the priests among them, being carnal, will seek to humour them; loving to be praised by them, they will preach things agreeable to them. But this is very vile, and an extreme dishonour to the ministry of the word, to subject it to the lusts of men. It is this that makes it so contemptible in the eyes of the wicked, though they be pleased with it. How is that? you will say. They are pleased with it, commend such men, and like them well, while they do so; yea, like what they say; yet they condemn the ministry, because they come to see that even it is subservient to and aims to please their humours: hence they look upon themselves and their lusts as above the ministry, and so despise its authority. They are pleased with the suiting of it to their lusts, but they despise it in regard of any authority, for they see apparently it is under their humours. In Rev. xix. 10, when John did but fall down to worship an angel, the angel came to him and said, "See thou do it not;" why? "I am thy fellow servant, and of thy brethren that have the testimony of Jesus." What! you a minister that have the testimony of Jesus, to fall down to an angel? An angel! what is an angel? their glory is to be fellow servants with you, and to have the same testimony of Jesus that you have. A minister must not in his ministry fall down under the lusts of any man living, because he has the testimony of Jesus with him. It is true, ministers, with regard to themselves, should be willing to be under all; servants unto all for Christ: they should, I say, be willing to put their persons under every man for Christ, but they should keep their ministry above every man. Their ministry, and its authority, are to be kept above the greatest, and that for Christ's sake.

Again, A great influence, as from people to the minister, so from the minister to the people. Look, how ministers are, so usually the people are: "Like priest, like people;" especially in evil, they have a great influence. You know that in almost all places where you have malignant, superstitious ministers, you have likewise such kind of people. Jer. xxiii. 10, "The land is full of adulterers," saith the text; then in the next verse, "For both prophet and priest are profane;" that is the reason. And again, ver. 14, "I have seen also," saith God, "in the prophets of Jerusalem, an horrible thing: they commit adultery, and walk in lies: they strengthen also the hands of evildoers, that none doth return from his wickedness." Here we see how they harden others in sin; they walk in lies, they tell people we need not be so strict, we may take more liberty, it is but the fancies and humours of such and such men; they walk in lies, and so they strengthen men's hands in wickedness, and none returns from his wicked ways. And then ver. 15, "From the prophets of Jerusalem profaneness is gone forth into all the land;" if they be profane and wicked, they have an influence quite through the land to make the whole country wicked and profane. And on the other side, there is often a great influence in the ministry of the word upon people for good. If ministers continue painful, faithful, conscientious, it is very rare but that they bring people to some kind of obedience or other. Very few such ministers have lived any time in any place, but have left some savour of their spirits discoverable afterwards in their people. It was wont to be said, Da Ambrosios et habebimus Theodosios, Let us have Ambrosios, and we shall have Theodosios. Let us have godly ministers at court, and we shall have godly princes. The reason why the emperor Theodosius was so good, was because he had an Ambrose. So we find it in 2 Kings xii. 2, that Jehoash, so long as Jehoiada the priest lived, did that which was right in the sight of the Lord: so long as he had a godly minister with him that instructed him, he did that which was right in the eyes of God. No marvel, then, so much evil at court and other places, because we know what kind of ministers they ever have had. And because of the influence that a minister exerts on the people, the evil and malignant party ever desire to cherish such; and the force of their rage and malice is directed against godly ministers, for like minister, like people, they think: and, indeed, supposing their principles these, they act prudently to attain their ends, for godly ministers discover to people their evil and wicked ways, and cause those to whom they preach to cleave to the truth, and their spirits vex and rage when they see the ministry of the word to prevail thus with the people. With such policy Xerxes acted when he was in straits by reason of Agesilaus, who prevailed much in his country. He sent men with good store of money to gain over the towns in Greece, and they went and corrupted Athens and Thebes, and so caused such great disturbance in Greece, that Agesilaus was sent for home, to look to his own country. They went especially to the universities, Athens and Thebes, and there corrupted the orators. And it has been the policy of our men in these days to corrupt the seats of learning, thinking by scholars and others there to prevail most. It is fabled, that when the wolves would make a league with the sheep, they insisted chiefly on one article, which was that their shepherds should be delivered up to them, and then they would be at peace with the sheep, and do them no hurt. I make no question but if our adversaries should come to covenant with us, there is no one thing on which greater stress would be laid than the delivery up of faithful shepherds. "Like people, like priest."

They are like in evil, and they shall be like in punishment; they shall be involved in the same punishment. I will make the priests as contemptible and as miserable as the vilest of the people; their places exalted them above others, but their sin has abased them, and so they shall be dealt with accordingly. You will say, What great judgment is here threatened, that, "like people, like priest?" Certainly to them the judgment was very bitter and grievous, for the priests have at all times been puffed up with their callings, so that they looked upon themselves as far above the people, whom they regarded with scorn and contempt. Thus the Pharisees in John vii. 49, "This people who knoweth not the law are cursed;" this same vulgar sort are they that are accursed: so these priests here, though the truth is, they themselves were of the vilest of the people, (for Jeroboam's time is spoken of,) yet, being once raised into that place, they were puffed up as if they had been of another kind of mould than the people. It is usual for wicked ministers, though never so base and vile, either in birth or breeding, when they get up a little, and are come to preferment, to regard others with great contempt. It is a master-design in popery to raise the priesthood high above the people; and we know, that of late in this kingdom our gentry were nothing but slaves and vassals to the popish priests, especially the prelates. And if we did not look at the hand of God in his dreadful judgment besotting men, we could not conceive why the gentry should desire to have prelacy come in again, knowing how they were contemned and despised by them before. There was scarce a vicar in the country, but if he were filius ecclesie, (as they called him,) a child of the church, but wanted himself as superior to the gentry; and it was an evident argument of the coming in of popery upon us, that whilst the priestly office was too much extolled, that wherein the true honour of the office consisted, the faithful preaching of the word, was not regarded. To give you an instance or two of their pride and their assumption of authority, as here of late, Riconius saith, The priest excelleth the king as much as a man a beast; yea, as much as God is above a priest, so is a priest above the king; these are his very words. And Pope Innocent II. would have Lotharius the emperor painted in his palace as a vassal lying down at his feet. And so Beccanus calls the pope the chief priest, the shepherd; and emperors and kings are their dogs and curs, saith he; and if they will be faithful and ready to obey the call of the shepherd, they must be caressed, but if lazy and troublesome, they must be removed. Is it possible now that kings and great ones should ever love popery, and attempt to introduce it with a view to their own honour, when they thus advance their priesthood far above them? No; only for the present they would incite them to strive for an arbitrary government, with the hopes that that government should be under their own control. There is a spirit of fornication (as follows afterward) upon men, else were it impossible they should be so besotted as they are.

But though they thus lifted up themselves above the people, yet, saith God, I will make them in punishment like to the people. God is no respecter of persons, to spare any above another for their place; so neither should we: we should not say, Oh it would be a disgrace to the calling, therefore it must be passed over; but rather, Because he is a priest or magistrate, or in some exalted situation, yet, proving to be a delinquent and an enemy to the state, he must certainly be dealt with, and made an example in judgment. For the meaner sort to be punished, and the high to escape with impunity, God forbid ever such a thing should be. He is no acceptor of persons, neither should men be.

Yea, but perhaps you will say, "Like people, like priest;" one would rather think that God should say, I will make their judgment greater than the judgment of the people, for the sin of the priests is far greater than the sin of the people.

To that I answer, first, It is true the sin of the priests is greater than the sin of any of the people, but it is not greater than the sin of the whole congregation. In Lev. iv., compare ver. 3 with ver. 13, and you shall find that the same sacrifice that was offered for the sin of the whole congregation, is offered for the sin of the priest; so that the sin of the priest is accounted equivalent to the sin of the whole congregation. So there is a parallel here, "like people, like priest," that is, I will deal with the priests as with the whole congregation.

Yet further, for a second answer, As the condition of the person aggravates the sin, so the condition of the person aggravates the judgment. It is a greater punishment for a man of a high condition to suffer the same thing that a man that is of a lower condition suffers.

"And I will punish them for their ways." וְפָקַדְתִּי וְיָסַדְתִּי וְיָסַדְתִּי וְיָסַדְתִּי and so it is, I think, translated in some of your books, Super vias ejus; I will visit them upon their ways, or visit their ways upon them. Hence we may

Obs. 1. God has his days of visitation, wherein he will narrowly inquire into the ways of men, and call them to an account for sins long before committed. Exod. xxxii. 34, "In the day when I visit, I will visit their sin upon them;" I will spare them for the present, but I have a day to visit, and then I will come upon them even for this sin. God spares sinners now; why? because the day of his visitation is not yet come; but when that is come, then look to your old sins; look that now your repentance be thorough, for otherwise you may be spared a while, but when the day of visitation comes, then all your old sins shall be called over. In some late visitations by men, the more conscientious and godly persons were, the more were they aimed at, and it always went worst with them; but it shall be otherwise in this visitation of God's; God will visit the visitors, and visit them for their visitations, and then, as Isa. x. 3, "What will ye do in the day of visitation?" You knew what to do in the day when you yourselves did visit, but what will you do in the day of God's visiting of you? As Micah vii. 4, "The day of thy watchmen and thy visitation cometh; now shall be their perplexity." Certainly those visitors did begin to be in perplexity, for their day was coming, and we hope their day yet cometh.

Obs. 2. In the day of God's visitation men's own ways will come upon them: "I will visit their ways upon them." Men may have shifts to put off God for a while, but when God shall visit, then they shall see that all the evil that is come upon them is from their own ways; and that will be the very torment of the damned in hell, that they shall clearly see that all the evil that is upon them, is but the fruit of their own ways. As birds are sometimes snared by materials which they themselves supply, so out of men's sins doth God make his lime-twigs to take them withal; that is, the judgment that comes upon them is no other than the fruit of their own ways, they have procured this unto themselves.

"And reward them for their deeds." וְיָסַדְתִּי here translated deeds, signifies cogitationes, studia, their studies, their thoughts, as well as opera, their works: from whence there may be these two observations.

Obs. 1. First, That God will call men to account for their thoughts; the uncleanness of your thoughts, their vanity, envy, and malice. You must look to your thoughts, they are not free before God.

Obs. 2. That studied wickedness, thoughtful wickedness, is the worst wickedness: when men shall plot evil in their thoughts God will especially come to visit it.

"And reward them." There is a great elegance in these words, which in your English you pass over very lightly. "Reward them their doings;" we know that God will reward every one according to their doings; but I say the original וְיָסַדְתִּי וְיָסַדְתִּי signifies properly Redire faciam, I will make to return your doings, I will make your doings return back upon you. Whence

Obs. 1. Sin passes away in the act of it with much sweetness, but God will make it return back again in the guilt of it with much bitterness. As Gideon said, in Judges viii. 7, to the men of Succoth, "When I return I will tear your flesh with the thorns of the wilderness, and with briars." How many have passed over the act of their sin very pleasantly, but within a period of long, it may be, or short duration, God has made their sin return upon them; and it has returned as Gideon did upon the men of Succoth, and torn them with briars and thorns, that they have lain roaring in the anguish of spirit for the horror that hath been upon them for their sins. You sinners, that have not returned unto God in the way of repentance, remember that all those pleasant, delightful sins of yours will one day return upon you, and that in the way of terror.

Obs. 2. The good works of the saints shall return upon them with comfort and peace. I will "reward them their doings," that is, I will make to return their doings, I will make their doings return back upon them. It may be you have some troublesome afflictions in the flesh in some of your works and services, yet know they shall return with abundance of peace and joy. Do not think that what you do for God shall be altogether lost: never in your own, nor in the times of your forefathers, was there a more full opportunity to glorify him than at this day; I refer to the calling in of our brethren the Scots into the nation; it is such an opportunity of serving God as you never had, nor probably ever will have the like as long as you live; for it is not the bringing in of so many men into the kingdom, but the engaging of a kingdom for us; and not only so, but the greatest testimony of the goodness of our cause before all the surrounding nations: for though now the nations about us know not which part to take, there having been such protestations on both sides, yet when they shall hear that a kingdom that heretofore carried themselves so loyally, that the king himself by proclamation declared them to be his faithful and good subjects, when, I say, they shall hear that these, having an army in England for the king, yet went away in peace, and that they now espouse our side, certainly this will be a strong testimony to all the surrounding nations, and undoubtedly gain many amongst ourselves. Therefore I say, it is the highest and fullest opportunity for the service of God and good of your country, that you or your forefathers have ever had; and though you have done somewhat, nay, much already; yet you never had such an opportunity as this, which you may bless God that he has afforded you. And do not think now that what you do is quite gone and lost: O no, the Lord will make it return, you shall have a good return for it. You that are merchants, are you not willing to venture your stock at sea, upon the expectation of a good return? you will rely in this on winds, and waves, and seas, and servants that may prove unfaithful. You never ventured any thing in all your lives in which you could have such assurance of a good return, as what you venture in such a case as this. It is not adventured, for God will certainly make your good works to return, as he will make the doings of the wicked return upon them.

Ver. 10. For they shall eat, and not have enough: they shall commit whoredom, and shall not increase: because they have left off to take heed to the Lord.

“For they shall eat and not have enough.” Some would interpret these words, They shall still grow worse and worse in eating the sin of my people; and so would refer to the eating of the sin of the people in that sense which you heard before, that is, they shall never think they have advantage enough from the sin of the people: they desire the sin of the people for their own advantage; well, they shall eat their sin in that respect, but they shall never have enough, they shall never be satisfied, but still desire that people may sin more and more, that they may gain more by their sacrifices.

But I rather take it, and evidently more according to the words, thus, Howsoever they think to provide for themselves by that which they get in such a base, sinful way, yet they shall find no satisfaction to themselves in it, they shall be deceived. The truth is, if they found satisfaction, it were of little consequence, seeing they must answer for it afterwards; but they shall not only be judged for it hereafter, but for the present they shall find no satisfaction in that in which they promised to themselves satisfaction; they will get an estate, perhaps, acquire money and riches this way, and prosper in the world, but I will curse that which they have gained. Even in goods lawfully gotten there is a vanity, a vanity in goods gotten even by fair means; though we have them, we cannot enjoy them except God give us the power. God is the God of all consolation, and it is his mercy and goodness conveyed through creatures that can alone bring comfort in the use of them. If a man should think to satisfy himself with wind, it were an idle expectation; but it were worse if he should open his mouth wide to fill himself with plague-infected air: when thou thinkest to satisfy thyself with goods never so well got, it is but opening thy mouth to the wind, but when thou thinkest to satisfy thyself with goods unlawfully acquired, it is opening thy mouth to draw in pestilential air, there is no satisfaction, but ruin in them: “He that loveth silver shall not be satisfied with silver,” Eccles. v. 10. Howsoever men think with themselves, that if they had such an estate they would live happily, when they have it they find it otherwise. Those that hunger and thirst after righteousness shall be satisfied, but they that hunger and thirst after any thing in the world shall find it to be an empty thing unto them. It is true, there is a kind of satisfaction which God gives sometimes to wicked men, but it is accursed in its nature, a fearful judgment of God. “The backslider in heart shall be filled with his own ways,” Prov. xiv. 14; that is, they shall have enough of them; as when a man will go on in his own ways, although he suffer much in consequence, we say, What! have you not enough of such a course? So the wicked shall be satisfied, he shall have enough of his own ways, that is, he shall find such attendant plagues and miseries that he shall be satisfied, he shall be filled with them. It is spoken of an apostate, a backslider in heart, one that will apostatize from God, and think to provide for himself better in the ways of his apostacy, he “shall be filled,” but it shall be “with his own ways.”

“They shall commit whoredom, and shall not increase.”

If we understand this of bodily whoredom, then the sense is, that God will cross them even in that, “they shall commit whoredom, and shall not increase.” You will say, What great judgment is that? whoremongers care not for increasing. It is true, they desire only to satisfy their lusts; and in this respect, as much as in any, resemble evil and wicked ministers, who desire only to please the fancies of their auditors, and never look after begetting children unto God. But when the prophet prophesied, increasing in a numerous offspring was a special thing that all gloried in; therefore they sought it, not only by marrying many wives, but by their concubines and strange women; but God threatens to send out a curse upon them, that they shall not increase. And hence we may in general

Obs. Whatsoever a man undertakes unlawfully, he can never expect to prosper in. This is remarkably exemplified in Solomon: you know he had seven hundred wives and three hundred concubines, a thousand in all; yet we read but of one son that he left behind him, Rehoboam, whom the Scripture calls a child when he was above forty years old, 2 Chron. xiii. 7. When Rehoboam was young and tender-hearted, he had a childish and foolish, though a rugged and churlish heart. Solomon was not blessed with a numerous progeny, notwithstanding he indulged himself in so much carnal liberty. But on the contrary, we read that Isaac, from whom came the promised seed, that were to be as the stars of heaven and as the sand of the sea-shore for number, had but one wife; he took not that course which many of the patriarchs did, to marry many wives, but contented himself with one, and yet from him came the promised seed, so many as the stars and the sand for number. From which we may infer, that it is the best way for us to keep to God’s ordinances; we shall prosper more in what we would have, to keep to God’s ways, than to go out into our own sinful courses.

“They shall not increase.” The words are read otherwise by some: Jerome renders it, They have committed whoredom, and have not ceased; and his note upon it is this, They have committed fornication and whoredom, till they have spent all their strength, yet have they not ceased, their hearts are still that way: just as it is with many long habituated to carnal indulgence, they have committed uncleanness, and spent their strength in impurity, yet cease they not, their lusts still boil within them notwithstanding. And if you read the words so, and then take it for spiritual whoredom, They have committed whoredom, and have not ceased, that is, they still go on and on in the ways of idolatry, idolaters seldom come in and return.

Tarnovius reads it otherwise, They shall not break forth, for so יִרְצוּ may well signify; they think to take liberty in their whoredom and idolatry, they break forth from God’s laws and punishments, and think still to escape laws and punishments, to break forth from all bonds whatsoever. No, saith God, they shall not break forth; I will lay fetters upon them. This is good, but, however, I take the former to be the legitimate interpretation, and so we shall leave that expression, "they shall commit whoredom, and shall not increase." Here follows the reason.

"Because they have left off to take heed to the Lord."

There is a great deal of elegance in this expression; They have left the Lord to take heed, so you may translate לשמור ad custodiendum, to keep themselves within any bounds of the commandment of God; as if the prophet should say, They run wild, and have left off to take heed of God, or any of his ways. Perhaps they have not left the Lord wholly, for they will render God some external worship, but he cares not for that, they have left the Lord to take heed of him. Though we think to follow the Lord in any external duties, if we cease to take heed of God in all his ways, he notices it not: that may be one note.

But the thing specially meant is, though at first a temptation prevail against a professor of religion, yet he having an enlightened conscience, the truth of God will continue working in his conscience and in his heart; but now if he still give way to that lust, at length it will so far prevail that he will wholly leave minding and regarding the truth of God, which opposes his sin, and give himself fully up unto the ways of his own heart: and this man's condition is very dangerous. Oh take heed of this, take heed of this not taking heed! You that begin to decline, and find some secret lust prevailing in your heart; you yet have the truth of God working in your souls, and it will not let you go on quietly; but yet your lusts strive against this truth: well, if this lust be not mortified, if you give way to it, that it continue a while, you will come to be weary of that truth which opposes it, and you will turn your eyes from it, and leave off to take heed further to think of that which makes against your sin; and when you are come to this pass your condition is truly dangerous. Hence we may especially

Obs. 1. The way to keep the heart and life in order, in the paths of obedience, is "to take heed to the Lord;" to take heed to the infinite, glorious, blessed Majesty of the holy and great God; to mind God in his sovereignty, in his authority, in that infinite worthiness which is in him of all obedience from all his creatures; to look upon God the only Jehovah, the high and eternal God. This is the way to keep our hearts and lives in order, to "take heed to the Lord" thus, to have him in all our thoughts and hearts, and to observe diligently him and his ways.

Obs. 2. It is an evil thing for any, in matters that concern the worship of God, not to take heed to God's word. That they did leave off to take heed to God in point of worship, is the thing that God especially charged them with: that kind of worship which they thought most suitable to their own reason and politic ends, that worship they set up; but now to take heed to God, and to look up unto him, that whatsoever they had in his worship should be according to the rule he prescribes, that they left off to regard, and were altogether intent on their own ends. And it is an evil thing in any kingdom that men should leave off so to take heed, as is now almost come to pass with us. I make no question but that at first, for the government of the church, the primitive Christians had a special eye to the rule, to apostolical institution; but, I know not how, it is now almost a general conclusion amongst men, yea, amongst good men, and even good divines, that we can scarce have a rule of institution, they think we need not directions, and can find no such thing at all in the word, and so have altogether ceased even to examine it on this point. But though in civil things we are left to prudence and reason, when we come to matters of worship, in every particular properly ecclesiastical, properly church work, we must, I say, in every such thing take heed to the word of God. On this point Luther forcibly remarks, In religion we ought not to look so much at what is commanded, as who commands it: and he cites Seneca, who gives this rule, Observe not who commands, but what is commanded: so in the church, saith he, and in matters of religion, we should adopt this, and regard not so much quid, but quis, qualis, and quantum; but the devil changes this into quid, quale, quantum, that is, he changes this Who, and what manner of a person, and how great a one, commands, into, What, what manner, and how great a thing. Many thus despise some ordinances in the church, Why, what great matters are there in these things? they look to the thing, and not to the institution; whereas, did we look to Christ, the Institutor, as we should, we would have more regard to the institution than to the thing itself. Let the thing commanded be never so low and poor, never so mean in itself, yet the institution must be honoured. Let us take heed to God, especially in the point of worship.

Ver. 11. Whoredom and wine and new wine take away the heart.

The Holy Ghost still especially addresses the priests; for their whoredom, their wine and new wine, did take away their hearts. "Take away;" the words קח-לב may be translated diversely; either, "take the heart," or, "take away the heart."

"Take the heart;" so some render it; meaning, these lusts do take possession of their hearts. It is one thing for a man to be overtaken with a lust, and another thing for a lust to take a man. It is said of the godly, that they are overtaken; but it is said of these, that their lusts take them: and now when it comes to this, that you not only yield to a temptation, but a temptation takes you captive, then whoredom and wine and new wine have taken your hearts.

But I rather understand it thus: these lusts "take away the heart." It is true, there is not one lust harboured in the heart of a man, but in time will take away his heart, will eat out all the juice, and strength, and vigour of any grace in him. That is the reason why many professors grow so sapless, so heavy, so dull, so dead in the way of religion; there is some secret lust or other that they have a desire after, and that takes away their hearts, and they become like vapid liquor, all their spirit and life quite gone, their lust has eaten them out: that man is indeed in a sad condition, whose vigour and strength are gone and eaten out by some heart-lust.

From the context we remark, that they left off to take heed to God in point of his worship, and now it seems they are left to the sins of whoredom and drunkenness. Hence,

Obs. 1. It is just with God, that they that will not seek to satisfy their souls in himself, shall be given over to base and filthy delights of the flesh, that they shall never have any other comforts but those. Let them have those comforts, saith God, that is all the comfort they shall ever find. So we read in Rom. i., that when they did not glorify God as God, he gave them up unto unnatural affections and sins of uncleanness.

But to speak of these two sins as they are here set forth to us, whoredom and drunkenness. I shall not discuss their nature, as I have somewhat enlarged on that in the beginning of the chapter, but I shall follow here the dictations of the Holy Ghost, and endeavour to show you briefly how these "take away the heart."

First, Both the sins, in general, are sins of sensuality. Hence,

Obs. 2. Sensuality is a besotting sin, sensuality either in whoredom, or intemperance in drinking. You know how it took away the heart of the wise Solomon, as his concubines turned him from God, to worship idols. And so with Samsen, who was so strong, when Delilah had first taken his heart then she took it away; for you know, in the story, though she sought his destruction many times, and he saw plainly that she designed to give him up into the hands of the Philistines, yet for all that his heart could not be taken off from her. The Scripture speaks of the sin of lust most fully in this respect, Prov. ii. 19, "None that go unto her return again, neither take they hold of the paths of life." None that go unto "the strange woman" return; or, as some would read it, interrogatively, Do any return that go unto her? It is a rare thing for any one to return whose heart is thus insatiate, or ever to enter into the paths of life. The Holy Ghost speaks this, make of it what you will. And again, 2 Pet. ii. 14, "Having eyes full of adultery, and that cannot cease from sin:" when eyes come to be full of adultery they cannot cease from sin, their hearts are so alienated from all good. And Prov. xxiii. 27, "A whore is a deep ditch; and a strange woman is a narrow pit:" it is hard to get out of a deep ditch, especially if the mouth be narrow too; those that are got in there, are like to Jeremiah who was put in the dungeon where there was no water, but filth and mire, so that he sank in the mire; and except the Lord send from heaven long cords of his mercy, it is improbable they should ever come out, but they must die and perish: and how many thousands do so die and perish! Nothing ever deadened David's heart more than that sin of adultery; Psal. li. he cries out, "Uphold me with thy free Spirit;" as if he should say, Lord, I was wont to have more power over temptation, but now I am weak and quickly overcome; Lord, "uphold me." And as the sin of uncleanness takes the heart away from God and from truth, therefore 1 Pet. ii. 18, speaks of professors who were allured "through the lusts of the flesh, through much wantonness," even such as had escaped, "clean escaped," the pollutions of the world, and separated "from them who live in error." So drunkenness, that likewise takes away the heart; wine takes away the heart exceedingly. When Solomon gave himself "unto wine," he "laid hold on folly," Eccles. ii. 3; though somewhat of his wisdom remained, yet wine in a great measure took away his heart. He gave himself liberty, as appears by that scripture, though we read not of drunkenness, yet he gave himself liberty to satisfy himself with wine, and then he laid hold on folly. Those that indulge themselves in drinking wine and strong drink are besotted in their very intellects, as you know by experience; they are as a snuff of a candle in a socket, drowned in the tallow; a while since it spread a good light over the room, but now there is nothing left but a little smoke and snuff, and little or no light: so many men, when young, were like a candle upon the table, diffusing light to all about them; but now, having given themselves up to that filthy and vile lust of drinking, all their parts are become extinct, drowned in the fumes of intoxication. Or rather, they are become as a quagmire: if the husbandman sow never such precious seed there, what fruit will it bring forth? Austin saith, Just as when the ground has too much rain it grows miry and dirty, and is not fit for seed, so are those that indulge themselves in drink. Therefore in Ezek. xlvii. 11, it is said, the waters of the sanctuary did not heal the miry places and the marshes: drunken hearts are seldom healed by the waters of the sanctuary. Basil, in a sermon on intemperance, compares drunkenness to the idols spoken of in the Psalms, that have ears and hear not, and eyes and see not, and feet and walk not; it takes away their standing and their understanding likewise, their very intellects are debased, and they are left at liberty to indulge in all kinds of wickedness. How many are there that were excellent when young, yet being taken with that lust, how are they grown like Esau, who sold his birthright for a mess of pottage! these will so sell heaven for a cup of wine; yea, they are more profane than

Esau, for he was in a strait, he had come out of the field and was very hungry, and thought he should die if he had not the pottage; so he might plead that he sold his birthright for a mess of pottage out of a kind of necessity; but these will sell their souls, and heaven and all, merely to indulge that humour: for that lust, they will venture the health of their bodies, the waste of their estates, the loss of their friends, the shaming of themselves, the ruin of their names, and the damnation of their souls. Oh how does this besot men of otherwise excellent parts!

Well, but these two are applied here unto the priests, and so we must make special use of them: That whoredom and wine and new wine did take away their hearts, for these priests (as before we have heard) rejected the knowledge of God, and so left off the work they were appointed to do, the instruction of the people, therefore the people were brought up in ignorance; now they, leaving their office, their duty that they should perform in the place they were set in, gave themselves up to sensuality, to whoredom and to wine. From hence we may

Obs. 3. Ministers, when they are negligent in preaching, usually grow sensual. We find it so by experience, we need not go about to prove it. Have there not been many that in their younger time have been forward preachers, and when they have gotten livings and preferment, never minded their study and preaching any longer, but gave themselves to satisfy the flesh in uncleanness, filthy lusts, and drunkenness? Do we not know some such? People are but in an evil case when they have such ministers. Isa. lvi. 9, "All ye beasts of the field, come to devour, yea, all ye beasts in the forest." What is the matter? The 12th verse shows what kind of priests and prophets they had; "Come ye, say they, I will fetch wine, and we will fill ourselves with strong drink; and to-morrow shall be as this day, and much more abundant:" such kind of priests they had; and then, "All ye beasts of the field, come to devour," for they lie open to all kind of misery. Paul would have Timothy, when he was weak, drink a little wine for his stomach's sake and often infirmity; he, good man, though he were but weak, out of conscience it seems would drink only water, yea, for fear lest it might do hurt, he would drink but water till he had a commission from Paul; he was fain to exhort him to drink wine, and yet but a little, drink a little wine. Those in public places especially should take heed of intemperance. I have read of some heathens, who made it death for a king or a magistrate to be drunk.

Ver. 12. My people ask counsel at their stocks, and their staff declareth unto them: for the spirit of whoredoms hath caused them to err, and they have gone a whoring from under their God.

There is a little more difficulty in these words than in the former. First, however, the connexion affords this useful note.

Obs. 1. Bodily and spiritual whoredom are wont to go together. "Whoredom and wine and new wine take away the heart;" and then, they "ask counsel at their stocks, and their staff declareth unto them." First they are besotted with these lusts, and then they fall into the grossest idolatry, for the words in this verse seem to express idolatry of the grossest and most stupid kind. "They ask counsel of their stocks, and their staff declareth unto them," when they had given up themselves to the lusts of their hearts, then they grew most sottish in their idolatries. Therefore we are not to marvel, though men, apparently of understanding, yet will worship stocks and stones, as your papists; why? they give themselves up to their lusts, and then the grossest idolatry in the world will meet with their sanction. I remember to have read of one, who, seeing a person go to mass, and presently after to a house of ill fame hard by, exclaimed, A lupanari missam tantum esse passum; that is, There is but one step from the mass to uncleanness. Spiritual whoredom and bodily go together; their hearts are taken away by their whoredom, and they "ask counsel at their stocks." Jewel, in his Apology, relates, on very credible report, that search being made, in the year 1565, for harlots belonging to the stews in Rome, there were found in that city alone twenty-eight thousand. Thus you see how bodily and spiritual whoredom go together; twenty-eight thousand such women found in one city, in that city which we know is called in regard of spiritual whoredom, idolatry, "the great whore," Rev. xix. 2.

Now to explain this, "My people ask counsel at their stocks, and their staff doth teach them."

"Their stocks;" that is, their images, God puts that contemptible name upon them; they ask counsel of them. And that is to be observed too, "my people," there is the emphasis; mine by profession, not wholly cast off yet, yet these "ask counsel at their stocks," their images, which, although perhaps beautified with silver and gold, yet God calls "stocks."

"And their staff teacheth them." Here is a peculiar form of idolatry, to be taught by their staff. Vatablus and others interpret it of the false prophet, upon which they leaned, as upon a staff; but I rather think it is to be understood literally. There was a kind of idolatry which the Jews had, a way to ask counsel by the staff, and with this the prophet here charges them. The Romans likewise, after this, practised the same, calling it ραβδουμαντεια, or βιδουμαντεια, divinatio ex virgis, divination by rods, sticks, arrows, or staves; and there were four ways by which they did divine by these. The first was to put arrows or staves into a closed case, having the names written upon them of what they divined about; and then drawing out one or two, they determined their business according to what they found written; thus their staff declared to them either good or bad; and thus Nebuchadnezzar seems to have done, Ezek. xxi. 22. Interpreters there show, that Nebuchadnezzar, being in doubt whether he should war against Philadelphia or against Jerusalem, took two arrows, and wrote the name of Jerusalem on the one, and Philadelphia on the other, and so divined which way he should go. And this is the first mode of declaring by the staff. A second was by casting up staves or arrows into the air, and according as they fell, on the right hand or on the left, before or behind, so they divined their good or ill luck, as they called it. A third way was this, they used to peel off the bark of some part of a stick, and then cast it up, and divined according to which part of the pith, either black or white, appeared first. A fourth was, as we find in the Roman antiquities, that their augurs or soothsayers used to sit upon the top of a tower or castle in clear and fair weather, with a crooked staff in their hand, which the Latins call Lituis, and having quartered out the regions of heaven, so far as to answer their purpose, and offered sacrifices and prayers to their gods, they stretched it forth upon the head of the person or thing they would divine for, and so foreboded good or ill luck, according to what at that time they observed in the heavens, the birds flying, &c. This was the custom of the Romans, and perhaps derived from the Jews.

By all this we may see what poor ways idolaters have had to know the minds of their gods. When men forsake the right way of knowing God's will, what poor expedients have they recourse to! Oh how should our hearts be raised up to bless God, that we have such a way to know his mind, as the word; and that we have his Son, who came out of his bosom, to declare to us the eternal counsel of his Father!

Now follows the ground of this miserable condition of idolaters; "For the spirit of whoredoms hath caused them to err, and they have gone a whoring from under their God."

"For the spirit of whoredoms." Some would understand it thus, that as there are particular sins, so there are particular devils to attend upon them; one especially to attend upon idolatry, another on whoredom, another on drunkenness, another on envy, pride, and the various evil passions; and so "the spirit of whoredom" (say they) is the devil that especially attended upon this sin. But I think this not to be the scope, but rather, that impetus of "the spirit of whoredoms" that was in them; there is an impetus, a strong inclination, of their spirits to such a sinful course, which carried them on, and caused them to err. The Scripture often speaks of different sorts of spirits, as sometimes the spirit of perverseness, Isa. xix. 14; in your books it is translated, "a perverse spirit," but the words are רוח עייני a spirit of perverseness; there is an impetus of spirit that has caused Egypt to err in every work thereof. So the spirit of uncleanness, Zech. xiii. 2, translated in your books, "the unclean spirit," but the words are רוח הרע the spirit of defilements, or uncleanness. So the spirit of lying, 1 Kings xxii. 22; "the spirit of error," 1 John iv. 6: "We are of God: he that knoweth God heareth us; he that is not of God heareth not us. Hereby know we the spirit of truth, and the spirit of error." That is, there is an impetus, a strength of spirit, which carries men on to such erroneous ways. And the consideration of that will be of marvellous use to us. Let us look to our spirits, my brethren, and consider what spirit we are of; especially when carried impetuously to any thing we desire, let us take heed to ourselves: when you find, I say, your spirits very eagerly and strongly set upon a thing, examine well that it be not a spirit of lust, of envy, of malice, such as sometimes exists in men's hearts, when they are carried to any object with more than ordinary strength. Many people find themselves hurried on with such a fervent impetus, that they cannot endure to be crossed, no, they must have it: as in Samuel, they that desired a king, when they heard all the reasons that could be urged to persuade them against it, would return none other answer than, "Nay; but we will have a king." So a man that has such a spirit will rush upon a thing without due examination, and even if there appear any truth against it, he presently slights it; why? because he has a spirit which impels him to it, and if the truth come even so strongly that he is convinced by it, yet his spirit carries him on, and though he meet with many difficulties in the way, he will break through them all. Oh, it is a dangerous thing when men have a spirit of error, or a spirit of bitterness. You will find some men that have much of antichristianism remaining in them; do but speak to them of any thing that concerns an ordinance of Christ, of Christ's institution, of the will of Christ in the word, as soon as it is but mentioned, you hear no answer to the argument, but may perceive immediately arising a spirit of bitterness and aversion. So you find men, and sometimes good men, with whom if you but discourse of some things which you know are in accordance with the mind of Christ, yet having been brought up otherwise, and imbibed other principles, they have a spirit of bitterness, anger, and vexation, which presently will appear in them to reject any truth suggested.

But let us labour, on the other side, rather to be actuated by the Spirit of God; the children of God are "led by the Spirit of God." And it is true, that as wicked men have a spirit of uncleanness in them, so God's children are carried on with a spirit of holiness; the love of Christ has taken hold of their hearts, and perhaps they are weak, and cannot reason out the case with some subtle sophists; yet they have "the Spirit of Christ," an impetus of his spirit which carries them on. But take heed, the Spirit of Christ is joined with much humility and holiness: do not say you are impelled by the Spirit of Christ, when bitterness and pride are mixed with it; but if there be humility and holiness, then perhaps, though you cannot answer every objection of every sophist, yet the Spirit of Christ dwelleth in you. As wicked men, then, have a bias on their hearts, influencing their judgments, so the godly have a bias on their hearts, the truth and love of God, which swaying, carries them on with strength in the ways of God: as the poor man, the martyr, who said, I cannot dispute for the truth, but I can die for it. There was a spirit of love in him to Jesus Christ, that impelled him onwards, and made him relish and love holy things, though he could not dispute for them.

We are to pray to God that he would satisfy us not only in body and in soul, but in spirit, that that impetus of spirit may be sanctified, for great things depend upon it; almost all things in the world are carried by the impetus of men's spirits. Hence it is that men, although very wicked, will, on their death-beds, hearken to your words, and listen to reason; why? because then their affliction abates the impetus of their spirits, the activity and keen fervour of their minds, and you may say any thing unto them.

"And they are gone a whoring from under their God." Drusius renders it, by a periphrasis, thus,

They have cast off the yoke of God. In the Hebrew, if rendered word for word, it is, "from under their God;" and so the Septuagint translate it. And it denotes these two things.

First, They have gone from under the command of God. The pride of their hearts refused to be under the command of God, especially in his worship. O my brethren, we should look to this, to God above us, and be willing to lie under the command and authority of God, especially in his worship. Take heed of the rising of your thoughts in the matter of God's worship.

Secondly, They are gone from under the protection of their God. From under the command of their God, and consequently from under his protection. As wives, so long as they keep themselves under their husbands in due subjection, are under their protection also; but when they will forsake their husbands, and refuse to obey their commands, they at the same time put themselves from under their protection. So do my people, saith God, they will be from under my commands, and so are from under my protection. Hence two observations.

Obs. 1. All false worship puts a people from under the protection of God. No marvel that miseries befall a people who corrupt the worship of God. Oh, we were in a sad case not long since, even from under the protection of God, and things ran on at riot with us; and even now, because the people of this land have not yet hearts to entertain the true worship of God, we may fear lest we should not enjoy his wished-for protection. Would you have the protection of God? then keep close to the rule of his worship.

Obs. 2. So far as we are from being under God's command, so far are we from being under his protection. Obedience and protection are conjoined. In sin, you wander from under God's command, and from under his protection too. But he watches over us for good when we are in his ways. Keep close, then, to God's commands, and although troubles befall you, yet still you are under God's protection. The difference between a man that is under the command of God, and will closely observe it, and another that will have liberty, is as a deer in a park: so long as it is within the place, it is under the care of the keeper, who watches that no dogs or any thing else injure it, and in snowy weather, when there is no grass to be got, provides it with sustenance; but if the deer will wander forth, it may indeed enjoy more liberty, but then every dog pursues it, and it is subject to a thousand dangers more than when within the pale. So it is with a man that is willing to be within the pale of God's command, there he enjoys the watchful care of God; but if he will have more liberty, and transgress, let him not expect the protection of God in his wanderings. Oh that those that are gone astray from God would observe this! It may be, the consciences of some here tell them that they have wandered from under God's commands: there was a time that they trembled at his word, and their hearts fell down under the dreadful authority of those commands, then was it well with them; but now you have got from under this, you do not fear God's word as before, you will not tremble at his commands, you now go astray in your own ways. Poor wanderer, whither art thou gone? thou art gone from under the protection of the Lord.

Ver. 13. They sacrifice upon the tops of the mountains, and burn incense upon the hills, under oaks and poplars and elms, because the shadow thereof is good: therefore your daughters shall commit whoredom, and your spouses shall commit adultery.

In the former verse the prophet, in the name of God, had charged Israel with having the spirit of fornication, and accused them for going a whoring from under their God, and now he shows to them wherein they had so offended.

Obs. 1. General accusations, without particular specification, will not prevail with stubborn hearts. Above all, idolaters must be convinced wherein they have committed idolatry. They will stand it out stoutly if you charge them only with idolatry in general, of going a whoring from God, except you demonstrate wherein. It is so with many sinners. Ye have despised my name, and yet "ye say, Wherein have we despised thy name? Ye offer polluted bread upon mine altar: and ye say, Wherein have we polluted thee?" Mal. i. 6, 7. Stubborn hearts will stand it out with God a great while, until the evils they have committed be particularly specified, wherein they have done such and such evils. And it is wise, therefore, for all God's ministers not to deal in general accusations, if they would have their ministry a convincing ministry. Instancing preaching is the most convincing preaching.

Now the prophet instances that kind of idolatry which seems the most specious and fairest of any in the world, and in which one would have thought that as little evil as possible existed. Why, what great matter is it? they might say. You accuse us for going a whoring from under our God; we only offer sacrifice upon mountains, and burn incense under trees; is that so great a matter? It is sacrifice, and you cannot say but we sacrifice to the true God; we do not sacrifice to idols, how then do we go a whoring from God? This is very specious, that they should sacrifice thus upon mountains, and under trees, and in this they pretend to be more devout than Judah was: the people of Judah sacrificed only in one temple, and as it were confined and limited God to that place, and they sacrificed only upon one altar; Now, say they, we think God worthy of a great deal more than this; we think it is fit to sacrifice to him every where, in every place, and especially upon mountains, for it is to the high God that we sacrifice. Just as the papists at this day will have their images in every place, and their crosses in every highway as they travel, that by them they may be reminded of God continually. What a specious pretext is this! Yet the Lord, by the prophet, charges them with going "a whoring from under their God," and establishes the accusation by instances taken from services which they considered, if not meritorious, at least excusable.

Obs. 2. What seems most specious in our eyes, if it be not according to the rule, may prove most abominable in the eyes of God.

Obs. 3. Ministers should especially labour to present to the people the foulness of those things in which they think there exists the least evil. To exclaim against wickedness which they themselves cannot but acknowledge to be notorious, will never so convince as thoroughly to humble : but to close with them, and to open the evil of their ways in those things in which they most bless themselves, and to show how, even in these, they make themselves abominable unto God, that is the way to make our ministry a convincing and a humbling ministry indeed. Thus the prophet, You sacrifice upon the mountains and high places, and under the shadow of every tree. Jerome upon this place remarks, Israel loveth high places, for they have forsaken the high God; and they love the shadow, for they have left the substance. It is thus with men, when they have left the high God, then they have somewhat or other that they set up high in their hearts; they forsake the shadow of the wings of God, and then seek after vain shadows to be their protector.

But to open this scripture yet more clearly, to show wherein their sin lay here, that they sacrificed upon the mountains, and hills, and under trees. We are to know, that in former times, before the ark, and the tabernacle, and the temple were built, it was lawful to sacrifice in any place, and God approved of sacrificing in mountains, directing Abraham to go and sacrifice his son on mount Moriah, Gen. xii. 2; and in Gen. xxi. 33, we read of Abraham's planting a grove when he called upon the name of God; so that their forefathers did sacrifice upon mountains, and planted groves and trees by the places where they sacrificed; there was no hurt then in such things. But afterward God prohibits this: "Take heed to thyself that thou offer not thy burnt-offerings in every place that thou seest: but in the place which the Lord shall choose in one of thy tribes, there thou shalt offer thy burnt-offerings," Deut. xii. 13, 14. God would limit them the place of his worship. When the ark and the tabernacle were made, they were bound to come and sacrifice there, and no where else; and so when the temple was built, that became the sole appointed place. Yea, then the Lord commanded them to pull down the high places, and to cut down the groves and trees: "Ye shall utterly destroy all the places wherein the nations which ye shall possess served their gods, upon the high mountains, and upon the hills, and under every green tree," Deut. xii. 2. When once God had appointed a place of worship, then they were to destroy the other places where the heathens were wont to serve their gods. Hence,

Obs. 4. When God chooses a place or thing, he stamps it with peculiar holiness. If God appoint a way of worship of his own, this forbids all other. If God consecrate a place, this forbids to make any place holy but that. So of things, and ceremonies, if once God sets upon them the impress of holiness, we must confine ourselves to them, and not think to imitate God, by dedicating any thing of the same kind. It was now a sin in them, and God, we see here, stands much upon circumstances in his worship. Many plead, Why should men be so strict and scrupulous about circumstances? what, must we have every circumstance commanded in the word of God? My brethren, that which is natural and moral, and but likely to subserve religion, may, indeed, be left to prudence; but where religion is directly involved, though it be but a circumstance, God insists much upon it, and we must have for it the sanction of a Divine rule. Here they are not accused for sacrificing things they ought not to sacrifice, doubtless they offered what was commanded, sheep, and beees, and the like; but only with respect to the circumstance of place, they did not sacrifice where God appointed, therefore he charged them, that in this they went "a whoring from under their God." It is true, we read of some godly men's sacrificing elsewhere; Gideon under an oak, Judg. vi; and Samuel on a high place, 1 Sam. ii; and David in the threshing-floor of Araunah, 2 Sam. xxiv. Now, to all these instances the answer generally given by divines is, that they could not lawfully have done so, but by some special dispensation of God himself; else it could not but have been sin. For the kings of Israel and Judah are also charged with their sacrificing in the high places; even of Solomon himself, when, in 1 Kings iii. 3, he is commended for loving the Lord, and walking in the statutes of David his father at first, yet the text saith, "Only he sacrificed and burnt incense in high places." And amongst other high places, we read in 2 Chron. i. 3, that Solomon went to Gibeon, which was a great high place. And though some excuse him, because it is said the tabernacle was there, and therefore he might go to sacrifice, yet Austin, in his Questions on Judges, thinks Solomon is to be blamed, though the tabernacle was there, for it seems he put a more than ordinary respect upon that high place; wherefore else is it called the great high place? and he went there, not only for the sake of the tabernacle, but because it was that great high place; and therefore is to be blamed. So that if we go to the ordinances of God where yet there are other mixtures, and we do the rather go and esteem them because there is some addition of man's inventions, this is a sin against God. And further, it is observable, though Solomon were blamable for going thus, yet we find that God revealed himself unto him, in a wonderfully gracious manner, even in that place, and bade him ask what he would. So certainly many of God's people have found, that though sometimes they have been in the use of ordinances where there have been such mixtures that they have been polluted to them in consequence, yet the Lord has been so gracious to them, that he has accepted of the uprightness of their hearts, and they have had, even in them, many sweet manifestations of his favour: they can remember when they have been at sacrament, and they have known that they have offended against God by reason of some pollutions, yet they have, notwithstanding, found God shedding abundance of mercy on them, and refreshing their souls with comfort and joy in the Holy Ghost. This was God's mercy. Do not think, therefore, that there was no evil in it, because God was so far gracious unto you. There was evil in Solomon's respecting this high place, yet there God favoured him abundantly. Other kings there were, who were exceedingly blamed that they did not take down their high places, which were the same as the mountains here spoken of.

Yet there were some of them that were very careful in this respect. Amongst others, Hezekiah and Jehoshaphat. So, in 2 Kings xviii. 22, Hezekiah is charged by Rabshakeh with taking down the high places, "Is not that he, whose high places and whose altars Hezekiah hath taken away?" God approves of it, though Rabshakeh thinks he has done ill; O, saith he, do you trust in Hezekiah? he has taken down the high places. He thought that Hezekiah had therefore been an enemy to religion, and to the worship of God. Thus it is with ignorant people at this day, who understand not the way of God's worship; because some in the parliament seek to take away corruption in the worship of God, many cry out that they are enemies to all religion. Thus it is reported by your country people that dwell far off, as in Wales, and in other places, that the parliament are a company of vile men, that seek to take away all religion out of the kingdom. But this is so but in the understanding of a Rabshakeh, that confounds the taking away of high places with the abolition of religion.

Jehoshaphat, likewise, is commended for taking away the high places, and it is noted of him, that his heart was much lifted in the ways of God when he did it: for this sacrificing on the high places, the people were so attached to, and thought it a great thing that they should go up to a high place to offer unto the high God; therefore when Jehoshaphat took them away, the text saith, his heart was lifted up in a more than ordinary manner. So it should be with governors, when they see corruptions in God's worship, though the people stick close to them, yet they should have their hearts lifted up with courage and zeal to go on in the work. In 2 Chron. xvii. 6, "His heart was lifted up in the ways of the Lord: moreover he took away the high places and groves out of Judah." Here are two things that Israel is charged with, "the high places, and the groves;" Jehoshaphat took them away, and took them away out of Judah. He was of a lifted-up mind, and his heart took boldness for the ways of God, as the Vulgate renders it. But mark, what course did Jehoshaphat take to remove "the high places and the groves?" In the 7th verse you find this, "He sent to his princes, to teach in the cities of Judah." Mark here, princes are become preachers; "He sent to his princes to teach in the cities of Judah; and with them he sent Levites and priests. And they taught in Judah, and had the book of the law of the Lord with them, and went about throughout all the cities of Judah, and taught the people." This is the course to take them away; if he had only by an edict removed them, he could not have done so much, but he wisely sent faithful preachers throughout all the country, especially all the great cities. So that it appears it was because of the bad preachers they had before, or because they had none at all, that it was so difficult to remove the high places. How easy would it be in England at this day to make a reformation, to take away corruptions from the worship of God, if in all cities and towns there were faithful preachers! For we see evidently, that people brought up in ignorance adhere most to these things. Let a faithful minister come into a congregation, and so exert himself, that the people may see and be convinced that he is pains-taking, and let him expound the Scripture to them, and they will soon begin to confess, We get more by this than by all the mere reading of prayers; and this demands more to the minister. They would, I say, be convinced of this, if instructed. Jehoshaphat acted thus; and oh how happy were it if we took the same course! But there is something more observable; it is said in this 7th chapter, that Jehoshaphat took away the high places; but in chap. xx. 33, it is said he took them not away; but how is it? It is put upon the people; the text saith, "The high places were not taken away: for as yet the people had not prepared their hearts unto the God of their fathers." The people were the cause. Now to reconcile these two places: it seems in chap. xvii., Jehoshaphat did his utmost, therefore God accounts it as done with respect to him, but because the people were so stubborn, that they would not yield to the command of the king, therefore in this 20th chapter the blame is all laid upon them; as if God should say, They were not taken away, because the people had not prepared their hearts; but as for Jehoshaphat, his heart was right in my sight. God will accept the intention of governors; let them do what they can, and if it be not effected the fault will rest on the real cause. You may see by this, that people may hinder the work of reformation much: "their hearts were not prepared," that is, they were not fit to receive the instructions sent to them. And truly, in England many people are not yet prepared to receive the work of reformation. We never read, and that is observable, of any difficulty that any of the kings, either of Judah or Israel, met with, in introducing any false worship; but when good kings sought to bring in true worship, and to cast out false, it was too difficult a work for them. Thus men's hearts cleave more to false than they do to true worship.

But further, it is observable, with respect to the high places, that it is not only said here, that they sacrificed on the mountains, but "upon the tops of the mountains." There are two things very observable from hence.

Obs. 5. Idolatry is shameless, and loves publicity. They would not do it in a corner, but got them up to the mountains, to the top of the mountains, and were not ashamed. Oh why should we not have the true worship of God as public! It is a lamentable case when it must get into holes and corners, and dare not appear in public; and even this necessary concealment draws down persecution. Well, my brethren, let us pray, and endeavour as far as we can, to bring in the true worship in the most public manner; and let us not be ashamed of it before the world. In Rev. xiv. 6, there is mention of an angel flying in the midst of heaven, having the everlasting gospel in his hand, to preach to them that dwell on the earth: now it is usual in the Revelation to signify the ministry of the gospel by an angel, and so it is a prophecy that the ministry of the gospel shall fly in heaven, aloft, publicly, and that all the world shall see it. And mark what follows upon this; ver. 8, "And there followed another angel, saying, Babylon is fallen, is fallen." So that we may note from thence, That when the ministry of the gospel and its ordinances come to be made openly public, then is the time for Babylon to fall; and so long as Babylon stands, and antichrist stands, so long is the gospel fain to be preached in corners; but when the time of Babylon's fall comes, then shall the ministry of the gospel be publicly manifested in the eyes of all the people.

Obs. 6. They sacrificed not only upon the mountains, but "upon the tops of the mountains." Idolaters seek to rise to the greatest height, to go the greatest lengths in false worship; they content not themselves with hills and mountains, but the very uppermost part of hills and mountains; if there were any higher than other, if they could ascend to heaven, they would do it. Idolaters do not content themselves with a lower degree of false worship. How much less should we in the way of God's worship! we should not content ourselves with low attainments, but get up to the top of godliness, and labour to gain the very height of the worship of God; not content ourselves in one ordinance, but get all ordinances, and get them as far as possible in full exercise. Thus, in Eph. v. 15, "Walk accurately, circumspectly, not as fools, but as wise;" the word is ἀκριβῶς, as if he said, Walk to the top of godliness, to the height; if there be any degree higher than another, labour to attain it; as idolaters will get up to the tops of mountains. Thus for their sacrificing upon the mountains.

"Under oaks and poplars and elms." These trees are such whose leaves are broad, and did abide longest upon them. But why did they and the heathen also seek to sacrifice under trees, and such trees as these? There seem five or six reasons for it.

1. The heathens consecrated many trees to their idols; the poplar to Hercules, the vine to Bacchus, the myrtle to Venus, the bay to Phœbus. They consecrated several trees to their several gods, and sacrificed under them.

Populus Alceia
gracilissima, visis Iaccho, formosior myrtus Venere, sua laurus Phœbo.
Virg. Ecl. 7. 61.

2. They sacrificed there in imitation of the patriarchs, as I showed before. Abraham built a grove by the altar he made, and so did many of the patriarchs; and in imitation of them these here, and the heathen generally, for the devil strove much to imitate the form of the true worship of God; but now, when the ancient practice of the patriarchs was abused, God removes it.

3. They thought that places dark, by the shadiness of these trees, might strike some fear and reverence into the hearts of the worshippers. There does exist in woods, where there are high trees and shady places, a kind of solemnity, they are calculated to inspire awe; for even the heathen themselves, when they worshipped their idols, sought to have the hearts of the worshippers filled with reverence.

4. They thought that the spirits of their heroes frequented the woods and groves. This was the current tradition of the heathen, and they were taught it by their priests. Virgil, in Æn. 6. 673, makes one of them say, Nulli certa domus, lucis habitamus opacis. We have no certain habitation, but dwell in dark and shady groves.

5. They were fit places for the commission of impurity. Many of the sacrifices of the heathen were mixed with filthy and abominable uncleanness, and those places were adapted for them, and therefore the devil liked them well. So Philo; and Sozomen, in his history, mentions this reason.

6. Many of the heathens thought that it was to the dishonour of God to be worshipped in any place covered above, or circumscribed within limits. Even some of the heathens looked upon God as infinite, and for him to be worshipped within any covered place they thought a dishonour, therefore would worship him in the open fields and under trees.

"Because the shadow thereof is good." The Holy Ghost instances only this one reason; "the shadow thereof is good," that is, they pleased themselves in their own ways, they thought there was more solemnity in this than in the temple service. The shadow was good, oh it was a fine thing to go to the open fields, and more solemn to worship there than in the city. The shadow was good; they applauded and blest themselves in this way.

Obs. 8. Usually superstition thinks it has a great deal of reason for what it does; therefore it is observable of the papists, that although their form of worship is most ridiculous and absurd, yet they write whole volumes to show reason for what they do, as if theirs were a reasonable service. In Col. ii. 23, it is said of "will-worship," that it has "a show of wisdom;" λόγον σοφίας, the reason of wisdom, for so it may be rendered; and thus in Rom. iv. 18, "reasonable service," is λογικὴ λατρεία. So idolaters think that it is not only wisdom, but that they have the very reason, the very quintessence of wisdom, in their way of false worship, and that "the shadow thereof is good;" especially they think their worship is more sumptuous and more solemn than the ordinances of God.

Obs. 9. It is the pride of men's spirits to think that God's ordinances are too plain. They think they can devise a way to embellish the worship of God, they will show additional reverence and respect. But certainly, if it be not God's own ordinance, whatsoever outward respect can be given unto God in it, he regards it with abhorrence. I have read, that when a lady in Paris saw the splendour of a procession to a saint, she cried out, Oh how fine is our religion compared with that of the Huguenots! (that is, such as we in England call Puritans;) they have a poor, mean, and beggarly, but we have a sumptuous religion. So your papists, with their embellished churches and altars, their prostrations and their bowings, have a fine and showy religion, their "shadow is good," there is splendour and solemnity in it. O, take heed of thinking that any addition of man's renders God's worship more solemn and more reverend. It is the worst argument you can use, to say, Can we do things in God's worship with too great reverence? Have you warrant out of God's word for it? does God enjoin it? have you not at least some rule or ensample for it? If you think to render it by your own addition more reverend, this very argument spoils it, though it were in other respects lawful. Suppose some gesture were indifferent, yet if you think that by it you put more reverence and respect upon God's worship than there is, you thereby spoil it; upon that ground it cannot be justified. Therefore the Lord forbade his people, when they were to make an altar to him, to lift up a tool upon it, for then, saith he, you pollute it. They might have said, Lord, we would fain have thine altar not so plain, we would fain bestow carving and some cost upon it, and so show some respect to it. No, saith God, if you lift up a tool upon it, you pollute it. So if you think to put more reverence and solemnity upon God's worship by any invention of your own, you certainly defile it. That was the sin of Israel at this time, they would sacrifice here; why? because "the shadow was good." So much for their high places, and their worshipping under trees. Now follows the judgment threatened:

"Therefore your daughters shall commit whoredom, and your spouses shall commit adultery."

You commit adultery in going a whoring from me, you shall be punished in the like kind, your daughters and your spouses shall go a whoring from you.

We may regard this in two points of view:

I. As a judgment of God upon them.

II. As that of which they themselves were the cause.

I. As a judgment of God upon them. Hence,

Obs. 1. God sometimes punishes sin with sin, he punishes spiritual adultery with corporal uncleanness. Corporal pollutions are the fruit of spiritual filthiness. So Rom. i. They worshipped not God as God, but in an idolatrous way, after the similitude of an ox that eateth grass, therefore God gave them up to uncleanness. If men be not careful to maintain purity in God's worship, God cares not for their bodily chastity. If you pollute my worship, be then unclean, saith God. Not that he doth permit it as lawful, but in just judgment he gives them over to it. What care I for all your carnal defilements, if you pollute my worship. Bodily and spiritual adultery are usually conjoined. The word Roma, with the letters reversed, forms amor; and there is much impurity in Rome, as I showed before. Where there is most idolatry there is most adultery.

Obs. 2. The sin of parents is often punished in the children and in the family. Your daughters and your spouses, I will leave them, saith God, and my hand shall be upon them. When a parent or a husband sees the hand of God against his child or against his wife, he should consider, How does God meet with me in this? is it not a sign of God's displeasure against me in this particular? It is observable of the woman of Canaan, Matt. xv. 22, that when her child was vexed with an unclean spirit, she saith, "Have mercy on me, O Lord, thou Son of David, my daughter is grievously vexed with a devil;" she did not say, Lord, have mercy on my child, but, Lord, have mercy on me, for my child is vexed with an unclean spirit; as if she should say, O Lord, this unclean spirit may be the punishment of my sin, therefore, Lord, have mercy upon me, and forgive me my sin, that hath caused such a thing as this; yea, Lord, it may be, I have had an unclean spirit, and this my child imitated me in somewhat that was evil, and so thy hand is come upon it; I am the original, therefore, Lord, have mercy upon me, for my child is vexed with an unclean spirit. So should you, when you see the hand of God upon your children, cry out, Lord, pardon my sin. And does God leave your children in wickedness? do you see unclean spirits in your children, the spirit of filthiness? cry out, Lord, have mercy upon me. Perhaps it was by imitating of you that they came to have such unclean spirits.

Obs. 3. It is a great reproach to any family to have uncleanness committed in it. Fornication and adultery is a great reproach to a family, especially when the daughter or the wife is unclean. It is a reproach to a family if a servant prove naught, especially to some families more than others, as those of ministers, magistrates, or men in public place and esteem: which, by the way, should teach governors to be more careful of their families than they are, for often, through their carelessness, God sends such a judgment, puts this disgrace upon them. Many of you, for your pleasure and delight, can go to your country houses, and while you are there your servants are committing evil; but you should have an especial eye over them, lest God, as a just judgment upon you for your neglect, bring this reproach upon your families. But especially your children, your daughters, and your spouses; and above all, the children of ministers. In Lev. xxi. 9, it is said, If the daughter of a priest "profane herself by playing the whore, she shall be burnt with fire." Now, though adultery was, yet fornication was not, punished with death, in any other instance.

Obs. 4. Our unfaithfulness with God is made more sensible when those that are near unto us are unfaithful to us. Well, saith God here, you go a whoring from me, your spouses shall go a whoring from you; you have been unfaithful to me, your children shall be unfaithful to you; they shall go a whoring too, and then by that anguish and trouble that you have when you see this in your wife, or in your child, you shall be made sensible how grievous it is to my spirit, that you go a whoring from me. Many parents, if they heard that their daughters had dishonoured themselves, oh how would they beat their hands upon their breasts, and tear their hair, and in agony cry out, I am undone, I am undone! and though they had never such great estates, they would think they had no comfort in any thing, but would even look upon themselves and their family as utterly ruined. And if you should hear that your wife had played the whore, how would it be as a dagger in your hearts! Are you so sensible of this? then, by the extremity of grief you would experience in such a case, know, that God so grieves when a child of his goes a whoring from him. If his people depart from him, in ways of superstition and idolatry, yea, even in things that otherwise seem to be but small, (here but a circumstance of place is spoken of,) yet the Spirit of God grieves at it, as a husband or father over the dishonour of a wife or daughter. Oh that you would consider that there is this grief in heaven when God sees his people forsaking his true worship! We think, indeed, that murder and blasphemy are displeasing to God, but we little reflect how the corruption of his worship provokes him. Let us know, that the great provocation of the most high God is the corruption of his worship, I mean, when his people shall corrupt his worship any way.

And further, Do your children prove stubborn and rebellious to you? oh how often does the father or mother retire into their chamber and bemoan themselves, Oh what a stubborn, rebellious child have we, nothing will reform him, admonitions are vain! Well, are you so sensible of the stubbornness of your children? O consider how sensible God is if you carry yourselves so toward him. If a husband have a wife froward and troublesome, that grieves his spirit and loves him not, he laments his condition, and thinks himself one of the most miserable men on the earth. Is this so grievous to you? oh how grievous is it to Jesus Christ to have his church so to him! And have you any friend that has dealt unfaithfully with you? Such a friend, you say, has dealt unfaithfully with me; was ever any served so? O consider how you have dealt unfaithfully with God; and as your hearts are affected by the falseness of a friend, so does your unfaithfulness go to the heart of God. And thus much for the words under the first consideration, of God's retributive justice. I will make you sensible, saith God, of your dealings with me; if nothing will do it, it shall be thus, "your daughters and your spouses shall commit adultery."

II. As that of which they themselves are the cause. Now the people of Israel were the causes of the uncleanness of their daughters and wives, by this their way of false worship, in two respects.

1. By going abroad from their families to hills and mountains to worship, they afforded them opportunity meanwhile of committing adultery. Calvin observes on the place, As it is in popery when they go a pilgrimage, it is the most opportune time for impure indulgences; so here, when they went unto the hills and mountains to worship, then the unclean places were most frequented. So when husbands and parents go up and down without any lawful call, then their wives and families do oft miscarry. Therefore it should teach them to abide at home until God calls them out: if they have a lawful call, they may trust God with their families; if not, some mischief may befall them before their return.

2. By carrying them into mountains, and groves, and under trees, because (as I said before) those places were chosen on purpose, as the fittest for lewdness. It is dangerous for young women to go into such places, and parents and husbands are exceedingly to blame, and it is to be charged as a great evil upon them, when they venture so to expose their daughters or wives to temptation.

Ver. 14. I will not punish your daughters when they commit whoredom, nor your spouses when they commit adultery: for themselves are separated with whores, and they sacrifice with harlots: therefore the people that doth not understand shall fall.

This is as severe an expression as any that we have in Scripture; They shall commit whoredom and adultery, yet I will not punish them. Strange! God has threatened whoredom and adultery with death, and threatened the priests' daughters that committed fornication, with fire; and this here refers to the priests especially; yet, saith he, I will punish none of them when they commit whoredom or adultery.

These words are read by some interrogatively, "Will I not punish them?" and then they carry another sense; but I think not according to the intention of the Spirit.

Others read these words comparatively, and, I confess, with some probability: I will not punish them, that is, I will not punish them in comparison with you, for your example makes them what they are, you should restrain them; and though their sin be great, yet, in comparison of you, they shall not be punished at all. Wicked parents look upon their children, when swearers, liars, unclean, as those with whom it will go very ill. Well, it shall go ill with them indeed; but if you be so too, it shall be worse with you. Many wicked parents are loth their children should be so too; I have known some who have put their children to be educated by puritans: they are wicked themselves, yet their consciences tell them it is not good for their children to be so. But the truth is, if you be wicked and your children also, though they may perish in their sins, yet you shall perish with a sevenfold destruction.

But thirdly, it is read plainly by most thus, I will not punish them when they commit adultery, that is, I will show my wrath against you in this, that I will even give up your children and your wives, let them do what they will, I will not restrain them by any punishment. And this is often the course of God's judgment against the wicked, that he will not restrain them in their evil ways. The especial note for these words is:

Obs. 1. It is one of the most fearful judgments of God in the world, not to restrain men from sinning. Jerome, upon those words in Ezek. vii. 4, "I will not spare," saith, God does not spare, that he might spare, he has not mercy, that he might have mercy upon people; that is, when God intends any good, then he will not spare; he will afflict and chastise those that he loves, but if you be bastards and not children, he cares not for chastising you. As long as a parent regards a child, and intends he should inherit, he corrects him; but when once he has cast him off, and is fully resolved he shall never inherit, he lets him go on and take his course. So a physician will give a patient potions, and bitter potions, while there is hope; but if the disease be grown too strong, and hope depart, he lets him alone: thus God often deals with sinners in this world. Origen, in one of his sermons on Exodus, quoting this scripture, hath this expression, Will you hear the terrible voice of a provoked God! "I will not punish your daughters when they commit whoredom, nor your spouses when they commit adultery;" this is the most terrible thing, the greatest imaginable wrath and judgment; here is a terrible voice of God indeed, I will not punish you. So Luther: Woe to those men at whose sins God winketh! It is a fearful judgment to fall into the hands of the living God, but it is a more fearful judgment to fall out of the hands of the living God, in this respect. Many men bless themselves that they can go on in the world, and, although continuing in sin, still prosper and thrive: they do not pray in their families as others do, are not so scrupulous in their consciences as others are, not so strict to walk exactly, yet they thrive in their trades, they are as rich, healthful, have as fine persons and as handsome children, as others; and thereby they are hardened in their sin. O but know, though thou mayst bless thyself in this thing, yet it is the heaviest curse of God that can be on thee, unless he should send thee quick unto hell. There is no such mark of reprobation as this, for God to suffer a wicked man to prosper in his sin.

Jerome observes on these words, When thou seest a sinner flow with wealth, when thou seest him boasting of his power, when thou seest him healthy, and delighting in his wife, a number of fine children around him, then say, the threatening of God by the prophet Hosea is fulfilled upon that man.

Thy judgment is very great in this, that the less punishment thou hast now, the more thou art like to have hereafter. The less punishment, the more sin, and so the more misery. Know that justice will have somewhat, and much too, for the forbearance of her act, of her stroke; and certainly, it were better for thee who art a wicked and ungodly man, that thou shouldst beg thy bread from door to door. Perhaps now thou hast great revenues, thou liest soft and farrest daintily, while others are put to miserable extremities, and yet thou art ungodly and wicked; know, that it were better for thee, and that thou wilt one day say it, and wish it thyself, that thou hadst been as the poor beggar at thy door; and it is God's wrath upon thee, that thou art not low as miserable as they. Let us therefore stop the troubles of our thoughts with this, when we see the wicked, how they prosper in the world, and how vile men are exalted, though they undertake causes which we know are abominable in the eyes of God, and by their iniquities provoke the God of heaven. They are, indeed, ready to take this, their prosperity, as an argument that God approves of their ways, and loves them. O let us not (I say) be troubled at their prosperity, for it is so far from being an argument of God's approbation of their ways, that it is one of the greatest judgments that can possibly befall them in the world, when God shall say, Let them go on and fill up the measure of their sins; they shall have their heart's desire for a while, and so shall be fattened up to their destruction. This few but the spiritual will understand. Carnal hearts are ready to call the proud happy, and to think those to be in the best condition that are most prosperous in the world; but this text teaches us the contrary.

"For themselves are separated with whores." Here interpreters remark, that God charges the persons by way of indignation. As when one man is speaking to another and his anger rises, he turns from him and speaks to some one else; so God seems here to have his anger awakened so against his people, that he turns, as it were, from them, as if he spake to some one else, though indeed he means them; "themselves are separated," or divided themselves.

Junius reads it, they have separated; and, not improbably, interprets it, they have separated fat and plentiful things, the choicest and richest things that they had at home, and set them apart under pretence of consecration to a religious use, and then, when they went to sacrifice, they would eat them among their whores, and so deceive their spouses at home.

Others interpret it thus, they have separated themselves from their God; first in spiritual whoredom, and then from their wives in bodily uncleanness.

Or else thus: "separated;" that is, they withdraw themselves into secret, where they might not be known, as the filthiness of that sin causes men to desire concealment; and when they have got into a secret place, or separated themselves from all that know them, then they commit impurity; as many men, when they are gone abroad from their own houses, in their journeys, in their inns, that is a fit opportunity for their filthiness.

Thus God gives the reason why their daughters and their wives commit this uncleanness, because they themselves do so. Hence we may remark,

Obs. 2. When parents are filthy and unclean, what can be expected but that their children should be so too? Take it either with respect to bodily or spiritual uncleanness. In bodily, David commits adultery, and Amnon commits incest: and in spiritual, "The children gather wood, the fathers kindle the fire, and the women knead their dough, to make cakes to the queen of heaven," Jer. vii. 18. If fathers and mothers be idolaters, children will be so too: so it is at this day, the children of those who adhere to the old superstitions, are superstitious likewise; and if the parents be malignants, it is strange to hear how the children, though young, will speak. Which should be a strong caution to all parents to make them take heed what they do before their children: he that sins before a child, sins twice, for the child will do as his father does, he thinks it enough that his father said so, or his father did so. Take heed then how you sin before your children.

The word translated "whores," has a further signification than our English conveys. According to most interpreters, it presents to us those women that worshipped Baal-poor, or Priapus, that unclean god. In 1 Kings xv. 13, it is said of Asa, that he took away Manahah his mother from being queen: now it is interpreted by some, that he removed her that she might not be a special queen in the solemnity of that unclean god Baal-peor, which idol she had set up in a grove. So then these people separated themselves, not to ordinary whores, but to those that were consecrated to the service of that impure god, and in his worship committed with them uncleanness.

Quando videtur peccatorem distans abundantiam iactare se potentiam et sanitatem abundare, delectare conjugio, coronari circumdare liberorum, dic in illum complicitatem committentem compleri.

“Sacrifice with harlots.” If we were to take this merely according to our translation, “harlots,” then the observation is only this:

Obs. 3. The filthy and unclean will yet sometimes make some show of religion. Harlots, and yet sacrifice! how can these two consist? One would think harlots should cast off all sacrifice. No; often will the filthy and unclean make a show of religion, thinking to cover all their impurities with some religious action; as the “strange woman,” in Proverbs, had peace-offerings, and made them but preparations for the commission of uncleanness. What horrible wickedness is this! yet this is not unusual, for many are very devout in some religious duties, and think that thereby they have served God well, given him his portion, and so conceive they may the more indulge the flesh afterward. It is true we are sinners, and cannot serve God always, but it is an abominable thing to unite impurity and sacrifice.

But the word translated “harlots” here, conveys much more than our English can well express; הַקְרִיטוֹת “harlots,” is meant of the adultery of the priests with the consecrated ones. This the rather justifies the interpretation of the other word “whores,” for I told you by that was meant those women that worshipped Baal-peor, for there the word signifies the consecrated ones, the holy ones. You will say, How can it be translated harlots then? Yes, by antiphrasis, for so the Scripture expresses things and words, and so other languages too, as wood is called so by a name that comes from light. So there, “holy ones,” that is, as devoted to filthiness as others are consecrated to God, and therefore called holy ones by antiphrasis. And that, I think, is the meaning of this place; by the priests of Baal-peor are here meant those for whom this people did separate themselves.

Jerome upon this place remarks, that the Romans, to disgrace the French, used to separate priests of their nation for that idol, and to make them eunuchs; from whence all such priests to that their idol, which resembled the Baal-peor of the Jews, they used to call Gallos, Frenchmen, by way of ignominy upon that nation, for some especial revenge they cherished against them.

Take it thus, then, and it will afford us very profitable instruction. These people were grown so corrupt that they had forsaken the true priests of God, and the prophets of the Lord, and separated themselves from the Lord to join in sacrificing with these filthy priests of Baal-peor, that unclean idol which is termed in Scripture “that shame.”

But how can it be meant of priests, when the word in the Hebrew is in the feminine gender? We answer, because of the effeminateness of these priests, some of them eunuchs, and so sottish and filthy that they had forfeited the very name of men. Therefore Aquila renders it, with the changed, so he calls the effeminate; they were changed from men into women: and so the Scripture speaks of men that have lost their true character, calling them women, or men of womanish spirits, Isa. iii.

12. And so the heathen poet Virgil, in imitation of Homer, calls the Trojans women, not men, because in character they were rather of the feminine than the masculine gender. Therefore the priests here of that unclean idol are in like manner designated priestesses.

these priests seemed to be men, but were indeed women. So that by this text is meant persons vilely impure, that were consecrated to be as priests to the service of this unclean idol. Now then we may remark from hence, their degradation in forsaking the priests of the Lord, separating themselves from them and joining with such unclean priests as these of Baal-peor. Here were separatists indeed. Have we not many amongst us at this day as vile and wicked as these, whose hearts, being opposed to the faithful ministers of God, and the purity of God's ordinances, they separate themselves to any drunken, impure, malignant priest? It was so here, there were the true priests and ordinances of God in Judah, and yet these men, rather than join in his true service, will separate themselves to these filthy and unclean priests of Baal-peor, and think there is more to be gained by uniting with them, than with the true priests of the Most High. How has God of late discovered the filthiness and malignancy of our superstitious priests, who cared not what became of our liberty as men, or our religion as Christians, so they had their lusts gratified! yet how debased are men still, that though faithful and conscientious ministers are sent amongst them who would reveal the mind of Christ and the way of heaven, that they may now know more in one month than before they knew in many years, if they had hearts to hearken to them, yet they will separate themselves, and join rather with such as are not only malignants, but manifestly ungodly in their lives, and commend and love them. Heretofore, when they had but some Sir John, that could only read prayers, sent by the bishop, and godly ministers were thrust out, if men went from their parish church to hear a sermon, how did they immediately exclaim that they were sectaries and schismatics; but now, when men of vile and malignant spirits are by a better authority removed for their wicked lives, and godly and holy men inducted, yet these they will not hear, though it be in their own parish church; but if a malignant preacher be in the city, to him they will flock. Who is the separatist or schismatic now? They separate themselves now to such men, and think they may hear those by whom they can most profit, that is, those that preach things suitable to their own spirits and inclinations. When the case comes home, how partial are men in their judgments! I know nothing so expressive of the condition of these men as these words, though, as they are read in your books, no such thing appears, but the words, according to the original, signify, separating themselves to unclean priests.

“Therefore the people that do not understand shall fall.” Well might he say, that they are a people that understand not, indeed.

Obs. 4. Idolaters are not an understanding people, they do not understand, they are ignorant people. You will say, Ignorant? many of them are scholars, and learned. But they are ignorant of the ways of God, even their priests, and for the most part the people; and their very design is to bring ignorance into places, that their idolatrous ways may be the sooner embraced.

“The people that do not understand shall fall.” Understand what? what did not these people understand, that was the cause of their fall? They did not understand these things:

1. The design entertained by Jeroboam and those princes that followed him. Poor simple people, they were led by vain pretences. Jeroboam pleaded, that he was for the true religion, and the worship of the true God, only he would not have the people fatigued by going up thrice a year to Jerusalem, that was not so necessary. But in truth, Jeroboam, notwithstanding all his pretences of worshipping the true God, and being a friend to the true religion, designed to bring them under his own government, and to tyrannize over

Μετὶ τῶν ἑθελλαγμένων.

O vere Phœnicæ, ne-
qui enim Phœnicæ,
Eti. 9, 617.
Ἀφροδίτης οὐκ ἔσ'
ἄνθρωποι.
Hœn. II. 2, 235.

Cyril, Theophylact, and others, however, think that them. Now this people did not understand this, they were carried away with fair words; if Jeroboam made but a show of religion, and professed that he acted merely out of respect and love, and in favour to them; it was sufficient to blind them, though he designed far otherwise. They did not understand the design of Jeroboam and his princes.

2. That the acceptableness of God's worship did not depend upon its outward pomp and splendour, but upon the observation of what God required. They understood not this. They were led away merely with the fair shows and pomp of religion, but understood not that all the acceptableness of divine worship depends on its being a divine ordinance. Most people at this day understand not this, and hence great evil ensues.

3. That their safety depended more upon the true worship of God, than upon all the politic wisdom that could be. They understood not that their protection depended on God's service and worship, but thought to go politically on, to provide for their own safety, and relied on the wisdom of their wise men.

4. They did not understand, that whatsoever was commanded by their governors, or taught by their priests, yet, if it was against the mind of God, it would not excuse them from judgment and deliver them from the wrath of God, though their magistrates commanded, and their priests taught it.

They understood not these four things, and therefore they shall fall. This it was that brought down and ruined this people.

There are divers degrees of not understanding.

1. When people do not understand merely from want of the means of knowledge. This excuses not wholly, but they shall even fall though they have no means.

2. When men have means, yet, through their negligence in the use of them, they do not understand.

3. When they are not only guilty of negligence, but wickedly oppose and shut their eyes against the means of knowledge. Then they shall fall indeed.

4. When, having knowledge heretofore, they now lose it by their often resisting its injunctions, and so become dull in their understandings.

5. When they so provoke God, as that he gives them up to a sottish spirit, so that they shall not understand. Now these fall deepest. Where all these five are conjoined, as they are in many places, surely that people must needs fall. My brethren, have we not cause to fear our not understanding at this day, that in these different points of view we understand not the vain pretences of our adversaries the Cavaliers, who say,

1. That they fight for religion, and intend nothing but the liberty of the subject. Many people are led away with these pretences, and understand not that their design is to bring them under slavery, and to take away their religion: and this blindness is like to cause us to fall.

2. People understand not that the worship of God and the government of the church must be according to the word. They think what most suits with the reasons of understanding men is best.

3. People at this day think there is too much to do about religion, and desire us rather to act with policy and provide for ourselves. As for religion, why should we injure or trouble ourselves so much about it? we have done so too much already. They think not their safety is in religion, therefore they shall fall.

4. People think the authority of their ministers sufficient sanction. Is it not so with us now? Therefore we have cause to fear that the Lord intends us a grievous fall.

Yea, as those four objects, so the four degrees of want of understanding.

In many places they have no means, many towns and countries have scarce a sermon in half a year.

In many places where there are most means, there they are negligent of them, rebel and shut their eyes against them.

And others that have had knowledge heretofore, have resisted their light, and are grown sottish; yea, it is to be feared that God, in his just judgment, has delivered many amongst us over to a sottish spirit, otherwise it is impossible they should remain so ignorant. Is it not a stupid insensibility in men, that after all the oppression and misery that they have suffered, yet they will not understand, but join with their oppressors, and lay all the blame upon those that venture their lives to deliver them? That when men come and spoil them of their goods, and ravish their wives and children, that they yet rather exclaim against those that venture their lives to do them good, as if they were the cause of their misery? Surely these people do not understand, and can it be expected but that they should fall, themselves and their posterity, into the depth of the misery of perpetual bondage.

Obs. 5. Idolatrous people shall fall: "They shall fall." An angel proclaims this, "Babylon is fallen, is fallen." It is fallen already, my brethren; however idolaters seem to lift up their heads high, yet they are falling, and fall they shall, God has pronounced it, and the time is at hand; they have fallen off from God, and fall they shall by the hand of God, and the prouder they grow the nearer is their fall; pride goes before a fall: while the gospel of Christ and his pure ordinances, that are now so opposed, shall stand, all superstitious ways, and persons, shall fall. It is observable in that place before named, Rev. xiv. 6. an angel flies in the midst of heaven, and preaches the everlasting gospel; and within another verse or two, another angel cries out, "Babylon is fallen, is fallen." When Babylon with all their idolatrous ways shall be fallen, then shall the everlasting gospel be preached: the gospel and the ordinances of Christ shall be everlasting, shall continue for ever; when all superstitious vanities shall have passed away. We find it so; however they thought to give perpetuity to their superstitions by all the means that the devil or wicked men could devise, yet have we not found that God has blasted them, and many of them are fallen? and though God brings his people into affliction, yet they shall rise, the ways of God shall rise, Zion shall rise, Babylon shall fall: the people that understand not, they shall fall.

A word or two about the meaning of יִשָּׁב here rendered "shall fall." It comes from שָׁב which does not occur often in Scripture, and I find divers translations of it. Some render it, shall be beaten; others, shall be brought into captivity; and others again, and not improperly, shall be perplexed. The word signifies, to be brought into perplexity and doubt with respect to the course one ought to pursue; such is the force of the word: I say, by their hesitancy, and being perplexed in their counsels, they come to stumble and fall. This people that do not understand shall thus fall. Indeed this translation is more proper and suitable to the words before; they do not understand, therefore they must needs be perplexed in their ways, and not know which way to go, and therefore must fall: as a man in the dark stumbles; so when men have left the true light and are in the dark, they shall fall, and when fallen they shall be perplexed in the misery that ensues. From whence,

Obs. 6. It is a fearful judgment of God, and a forerunner of a grievous fall, to leave men to perplexed counsels. When men are perplexed in their counsels, utterly uncertain what measures to adopt, it is a sure forerunner of falling into grievous misery. In Isa. xix. 14, the Lord threatens Egypt that he will send a perverse spirit in the midst thereof, and they shall err in every work, as a drunken man staggereth in his vomit; they shall err in their counsels, and this from a perverse spirit. The Lord often sends a spirit of perplexity and perverseness in judgment upon men; and what ensues? they reel and stagger up and down in their counsels, first have recourse to one expedient and then another, and so bring on themselves a great deal of sorrow and trouble. The Lord grant our enemies these perplexed counsels, and deliver us from them.

Obs. 7. When the wicked are fallen, they shall be so insnared and perplexed that they shall not know what to do. Idolatrous and superstitious men, and those whom God leaves to themselves, are in miserable perplexity when fallen, they are as those poor blinded men in 2 Kings vi., whom Elisha led to Samaria instead of Dothan. What miserable perplexity were they in when they found themselves in Samaria among their enemies! So when men are left to themselves, and God has brought them into difficulties, the fruit of their own perplexed counsels, how grievous will it be! On the contrary, when a man walks according to the rule of God's word, and in the uprightness of his heart desires to be directed agreeably thereto, though such a one should meet with trouble and fall into affliction, he need not be perplexed; quietness and peace shall possess his spirit in the midst of his trials, because he has followed God, and walked according to his rule. It may be, he knows not God's end, he understands not the depth of his ways, in bringing him into affliction; yet, having endeavoured in the sincerity of his heart to walk according to God's will, he understands this much, to stay his perplexed soul on God.

Ver. 15. Though thou, Israel, play the harlot, yet let not Judah offend: and come not ye unto Gilgal, neither go ye up to Beth-aven, nor swear, The Lord liveth.

The close of this chapter is a warning to Judah to take heed that she sin not as Israel sinned, in regard of the vileness of their transgressions, the fearfulness and suddenness of their judgment.

"Though thou, Israel." Thou wretched, wicked, stubborn, stout-hearted Israel, that no means will reclaim, though thou "play the harlot, yet let not Judah offend."

The word translated "offend," is from  $\text{עָוָה}$  and signifies also to desolate, because sin brings desolation. The Hebrews have divers words to express at once sin and punishment, because they are so near akin. Israel plays the harlot, and so is like to bring desolation on herself, but let not Judah likewise offend and bring the same on herself.

The prophet Hosea was sent especially to Israel, to the ten tribes, but here we see he turns his speech to Judah.

Obs. 1. Ministers should especially look to those whom they are bound unto by office, but yet so as to labour to benefit others when occasion offers. And not only ministers, but others likewise. We should all purpose good, especially to those that are under our charge, but yet neglect no opportunity to benefit all.

Obs. 2. When we see our labour lost on those we desire most to benefit, we should try what we can do to others. If these get not good by our ministry, by our admonitions, exhortations, and counsels, yet the Lord may bless our endeavours upon those; let us try what we can do there.

"Let not Judah offend." Let not Judah do as Israel did. There was a great deal of danger that Judah should be insnared and polluted with Israel's idolatry, which is the ground of this seasonable admonition of the prophet. Though Israel do thus and thus, yet let not Judah do so; as if he should say, Judah is indeed in great danger of being defiled by Israel, and that in many respects.

1. They lived near to them; and there is a great deal of danger in living near to idolaters or wicked persons. All sin, especially idolatry, is as leaven that will spread: and you may see the danger that there was in living so near them, in Ezek. xvi. 46, where, as one special reason of the iniquity of Jerusalem, it is said, "Thine elder sister is Samaria, she and her daughters that dwell at thy left hand: and thy younger sister, that dwelleth at thy right hand, is Sodom and her daughters;" that was an especial reason of the iniquity of Jerusalem, their elder sister, Samaria, that is, the ten tribes, were on the left, and their younger sister, Sodom, on the right hand. To be near idolaters and wicked ones is very dangerous; much more to be in the same town, in the same family, where superstitious and wicked persons are, there we had need to take heed to ourselves, for there is much danger.

2. They were brethren, and so the danger of being drawn aside by them was the greater. If you have a kinsman, if you have one that is near to you, not only in place, but in nature or affection, that is superstitious, take heed of being defiled by such. Oh how many have by this means suffered shipwreck of their faith, and been drawn aside from the ways of God! Hence arises the severity that God would have used against a brother or a friend that seeks to entice us to idolatry, because the Lord sees there is so much danger in it: Deut. xiii. 6, 8, 9, "If thy brother, the son of thy mother, or thy son, or thy daughter, or the wife of thy bosom, or thy friend, which is as thine own soul, entice thee secretly, saying, Let us go and serve other gods, which thou hast not known, thou, nor thy fathers; thou shalt not consent unto him, nor hearken unto him; neither shall thine eye pity him, neither shalt thou spare, neither shalt thou conceal him: but thou shalt surely kill him; thine hand shall be first upon him to put him to death." Though he be thy brother, or the wife of thy bosom, or thy friend that is as thine own soul, thou shalt not pity him, but thou shalt seek the very death even of such a one, if he seek to draw thee into ways of idolatry. Because God saw the danger, therefore the severity of this admonition.

3. Israel was the greater number. Israel was ten tribes, but Judah and Benjamin only two, little Benjamin together with Judah were but a few in comparison of Israel. To draw others to their ways, idolaters often plead their number. The whole world admire after the beast; the world and the nations do, and that is a mighty argument to draw: the greater part of people think that this mode of worship is the best, there are but a few, and they inconsiderable, that are opposed. No question but it was their argument here, as if they should say, What! do not ten tribes know the mind of God as well as those two? Is there any reason why we should think that the ten tribes, the greater part of the children of Abraham, should not know the mind of God? It is the argument at this day, with many that are superstitious and would go on in their old idolatry, They that are against such ways are but a few, an inconsiderable party, but the greatest in number and influence of all sorts, you see, favour us. We are to take heed of this. Oh let not Judah, though Israel be the greater number, follow a multitude to do evil.

4. Israel was rich and in a flourishing estate, therefore there was danger that Judah might be carried away by them. Israel carried things before them in outward pomp and glory, and we know that men are soon brought to close with these; and the way of Israel, when Hosea prophesied, did much thrive and prosper, Israel prevailed mightily in the world. When Ephraim spake there was trembling; therefore it was a wonderful grace of God to keep Judah from following their example. We find by experience, let even a persecuted cause be but once countenanced in the world, and men will cry it up; do we not see at this day, that those things which before men would not profess, because of persecution, they now suddenly view in a different light and applaud? The very things before persecuted, if once countenanced by the great ones and by multitudes, how will men praise them! Things that their hearts opposed, and against which they argued and reasoned, yet now because they have more public countenance, their judgments are changed; and, agreeably to the deceit of men's hearts, the way that is most countenanced in the world, that way they will adopt, especially in the worship of God.

5. Israel had many colours and pretences for what they did. They did not profess themselves idolatrous and superstitious; no, they professed that they served the Lord, the true Jehovah, and the difference between them and Judah was but the circumstances of place; You must worship God at Jerusalem, and we would have you worship at Dan and Beth-el, and those images that are set up, are merely intended to remind you of the God whom you worship.

Obs. 3. The nearer a false worship approaches to a true one, the more dangerous it is. Israel came nearer to the true worship of God than the heathens: now the prophet saith not, Though the heathens be idolaters, yet let not Judah be so too; but, "Though Israel play the harlot, yet let not Judah offend." There was more danger that Judah should be drawn aside by Israel, than that they should be drawn aside by any of the heathen. And so there is more danger that we, at this day, should be drawn aside by those that join with us in many things that are right, than by papists, who are hateful to us, and whose ways we see to be abominable. There is not so much danger, especially for those that profess godliness, of being drawn aside by those who grossly violate the laws of God, as by brethren that join with us in many things that are right, and come very near to the true worship of God.

Well, Judah must not do so, though Israel did. As there were many things wherein Judah was in great danger to be drawn aside by Israel, so there were many arguments why Judah should not do as Israel did.

1. God had graciously distinguished Judah from Israel by abundance of mercy, and Judah must not now make himself like Israel in sin, seeing God had made them unlike in mercy. God had in mercy made a difference between Judah and Israel, let not then the wickedness of their hearts make them similar. God had kept Judah to the house of David and to his temple, to be his own people.

2. Judah had more means than Israel had, therefore Judah's sin would be more vile than Israel's was: for Judah had the true priests of God to teach them, had the temple and the right ordinances of his worship among them; therefore, for Judah to be drawn aside to the ways of Israel would be a greater sin in them. Whatsoever Israel does, that has in it none but superstitious, idolatrous priests, priests made of the lowest of the people, Israel, that has in it but the calves, and not the right ordinances of God, whatsoever they do, yet let not Judah, surrounded with privileges, offend. Those that enjoy God's ordinances in a true way, should take heed of doing as other people do.

3. Judah was not compelled by her governors to act as Israel, for Israel, you know, by Jeroboam and other of the princes, was compelled to adopt these measures, and they might pretend that it was for their own safety, for the preservation of their lives and their estates; but no such necessity lay on Judah, for God many times sent it godly and gracious princes, and there was not such compulsion used, they were not so necessitated (if we may speak of a necessity to embrace evil) to adopt false worship as Israel was. When God gives people liberty, that they need not (except they will) be idolaters, for them to close with ways of idolatry and superstition is more sinful. True, heretofore there might have been some excuse for us, we were forced to it, it was as much as our estates were worth, we must have been cast into prison and persecuted, and that made us do that we did. The Lord be merciful to us, for that we, rather than endure sufferings, would join in the prevalent superstitions. But now, through God's mercy, we are delivered from that bondage, and therefore our sin would be so much the greater, were our hearts to cleave still to those beggarly elements.

4. God had no other people upon the face of the earth but Judah and Israel to worship him. Well, Israel is gone from him; and will Judah go too? what will then become of the worship of God? A mighty argument to those that profess godliness, to keep them from the ways of false worship and wickedness in any kind. If you too depart from God as others do, what honour will he have in the world? what will become of his service? Is not God worthy of all honour and of all service from all his creatures? It is a pity there should be any creature in the world that do not honour and serve the blessed and infinite God; but we see the most do not, and there are but a few, a handful of people, that regard his worship; and shall this few, this handful, forsake God? Shall Judah go away too? then the Lord will have no church, no worship, no service in the world.

5. God had much mercy in store for Judah, more than for Israel, therefore "let not Judah offend;" for Christ was to come from that tribe, and the Lord promised, when he had said he would reject Israel, to show mercy unto Judah. Though Judah was carried into captivity as well as Israel, yet God was with Judah, and promised them a return; but he never promised a like return to Israel. Therefore, since God had the more mercy in store for Judah, "let not Judah offend."

Hence we should

Obs. 4. We must not do as others do, especially with respect to God's worship; we must not make the example, even of our brethren, nor of those that profess religion, nor of those that prosper in the world, precedent or rule in matters connected with God's worship. Indeed the consideration, how others sin against God, should be so far from being an argument to draw us to sin, that it ought to be the greatest to deter us. Every sin against God is a striking at God. It is true, if a common enemy come into a city or town, every one desires to have a blow at him; and when men make the example of others an argument for their sin, they deal with God as with a common enemy. When thou pleadest, that such and such sin, therefore I may sin, thou dost in reality say, Such and such strike at God, let me too have a blow at him. Oh take heed of pleading the example of others in ways of wickedness, and remember this one expression, that thou dost in effect as if thou shouldst say, Others about me strike at God, and I must have my blow at him too as well as they. In any sin we must take heed of example, but above all in matters of worship. Hence, Deut. xii. 30, "Take heed to thyself that thou be not snared by following the nations, after that they be destroyed from before thee; and that thou inquire not after their gods, saying, How did these nations serve their gods? even so will I do likewise." Take heed, saith God, thou dost not so much as inquire how these people serve their gods, and say, I will do so likewise. God would not have us use that argument. Take heed therefore of pleading thus, Other people and nations do so and so, why may not we? It is evil to plead example in matters of worship, I mean especially that worship which here Judah is forewarned of, that is, worship by institution. In any thing else there may be more plea for example than in instituted worship; and the reason is this, because that other things, as the moral law, are in some measure written in man's heart, by the law of nature; but institutions depend merely upon God's revealed will. Therefore, though we might have a plea to follow the example of others in point of morality, yet, with regard to institutions, we must be sure to keep to the rule of God's word; to look above all things to what is written, and never to plead example as a precedent.

Obs. 5. It goes nearer to the heart of God when his people offend, than when others offend. "Yet let not Judah offend." Judah was the only people of God, the only true church that remained in the world. When God's own people offend, oh that goes nearer to the heart of God than when others offend! As Christ said to his disciples, "Will ye also go away?" and as Julius Cæsar said to Brutus in the senate, when he came with a dagger to stab him, What! and thou, my son Brutus? so saith God, when those that are professors of religion, that are his own people, and near unto him, when they sin against the Lord, What! and you also? will you also come and strike me? There are many reasons for this.

1. There is more unkindness in their sins. Others provoke the Spirit of God, but God's saints grieve his Spirit; for grief proceeds from love, and the more God loves any, the more their offences grieve him. As the more you love any object, the more it goes to your heart if they do any thing to incur your just displeasure.

2. There is more unfaithfulness in their sins. They have dedicated themselves to God in a manner different from others, and the heart of God reposes more confidence in them. What! thou, my friend, that hast eat bread at my table, wilt thou lift up thy heel against me? Aud Isa. lxiii. 8, I said, "They are children that will not lie." God confideth in them, and for them to be unfaithful, for Judah to sin, this goes to the heart of God indeed.

3. God's name is more polluted by them. The wicked offend the will, but do not, so much as his own people, pollute the name, of God.

4. The excellency of their graces makes their sins worse. As spots of dirt on sackcloth is not so great an evil, as when on cambric or lawn, and some garments, as your safeguards, that you make of coarse materials, you care not so much though they be soiled and dirty: so the wicked are of a coarse thread, their spirits are little worth, therefore though they be sullied and defiled it matters little; but the spirits of the saints are renewed, they have the image of God impressed, therefore a spot on them is much worse. As a spot of dirt on an ordinary deal board is of little consequence, but if there be a curious image or picture drawn on a table, to have that besmeared is a great deal worse; so if thou art godly, thou hast the image of God drawn on thy soul, and a sin, a spot in thee, is worse than in others. Therefore, whatever others do, yet let God's people take heed to themselves that they do not offend.

Yea, the saints of God, they are the very salt of the earth, the very light of the world, they are those for whose sake God continues the world in that way he does, they are the supporters of all; and if they depart from God also, what will become of the world?

5. They go nearer to the heart of the saints than the sins of others. The sin of one saint affects the heart of another saint more than the sin of any other man doth. Offences of brethren amongst brethren are the greatest of all. As Samson said to those that came to bind him, Do not you bind me; I care not for the Philistines so much, only do not you bind me: so all the railings and persecutions of ungodly men are not so much as the unkindness of the saints. Unkindnesses from such as we look upon as godly, go nearer to the heart of the godly, than all the railing and persecutions of ungodly men. If some godly saints should suffer opposition, yea, even persecution, from such as they esteem godly, oh how would that cut their hearts! their complaints to their Father of this would be sore complaints indeed.

Now all this might be thus applied to us at this time: Though prelates, and such as were superstitious and corrupt, were bitter against and did persecute my servants, yet let not those who have professed godliness, let not those who have been painful and laborious ministers, let not those whose consciences have been heretofore in many respects tender, let not them offend by any bitterness, or any harshness against their brethren: this, beyond all, will grieve the Spirit of God, and distress the heart of the saints. All the persecutions of all the prelates and papists, and of all your popish priests, and such kind of men, would not be a thousandth part so much as any bitterness or harshness toward the saints from the spirits of those who are regarded as godly; especially such as heretofore have professed so much tenderness of conscience, and have thereby suffered so much, because they could not do what was enjoined; if they now, after having got liberty to their own consciences, should become harsh and bitter against others that are godly, oh how sad would this be to God and to his people! Oh, whatever Israel do, "let not Judah offend."

"And come not ye unto Gilgal, neither go ye up to Beth-aven."

There are two things to be inquired here.

I. What this Gilgal and Beth-aven were.

II. The reason of the prohibition, why they must not come to Gilgal, nor go up to Beth-aven.

The words are ordinarily read and passed over without any great observation, but they contain much of God's mind.

I. Gilgal was a place in the borders of Israel, famous heretofore for many things. I know no place, except Jerusalem, that there are more glorious things spoken of than of Gilgal. It was famous for these things.

1. That great circumcision after Israel came out of the wilderness, took place there, when God "rolled away" their reproach; whence the name Gilgal. For during the forty years that Israel was in the wilderness, none of their children were circumcised, God being so indulgent to his people for that time, because they were to remove up and down, they knew not how soon, according to his requirements, and if their children were circumcised they could not so readily have been carried with them. But yet it seems it was an affliction, for God saith, "I have rolled away the reproach of Egypt from off you;" and therefore commanded that they should be circumcised. Now, when they came over Jordan, as soon as they were about to set foot on the land of Canaan, then God required them to circumcise their children. And if we observe it, it was a strange command, for they were now come into the very mouth of their enemies, and all the people of Canaan, all the kings and princes of the country, were gathered together to fight against them; yet now they must circumcise all those under forty years, even their fighting men, who had been in the wilderness so long, though they were in the very mouth of their enemies; and by reason of the soreness attendant on circumcision, they would be unable to stir out against them to battle; notwithstanding all this, they must be circumcised. Thus we see God, when he pleases, will have his worship, rather than our own safety, regarded. And upon this the place was called Gilgal: "This day," saith God, "have I rolled away the reproach of Egypt from off you. Wherefore the name of the place is called Gilgal unto this day," Josh. v. 9. The word is from גִּלְגָּל, which signifies to roll; the Hebrew letter Gimel being doubled and interposed, it forms Gilgal. That is the first thing observable of this place, that there was the great circumcision.

2. The first passover kept in the land of Canaan was observed there, as appears from Josh. v. 10.

3. In Gilgal the manna ceased, and the people were fed with the bread of the wheat of the country of Canaan, Josh. v. 12; God there giving them that first possession of Canaan, to "eat of the fruit of the land," and intimating that they should not henceforth need such extraordinary providence of God to feed them by manna.

4. Joshua pitched there those twelve stones which they took out of Jordan, for a memorial and perpetual remembrance of that great deliverance given them by God, in drying up the waters of Jordan from before them until they were passed over, as appears, Josh. iv. 20.

5. Joshua himself, together with the camp, kept much in Gilgal, and that after even Jericho and Ai were taken and the five kings slain, Josh. x. 6. Yea, after the whole country was possessed, yet still he kept at Gilgal, together with the camp, as appears from Josh. xiv. 6.

6. At Gilgal the angel of God appeared to Joshua, Josh. v. 13, and told him he was captain of the host of the Lord, and bade him loose his shoes from off his feet, for the place whereon he stood was holy.

7. At Gilgal Saul was anointed king, and thither he and Samuel often repaired, 1 Sam. xi. 15.

8. Gilgal was the place for sacrificing, and the tabernacle was much there, as appears, 1 Sam. x. 8; xv. 21. And ver. 33 of the same chapter, when Samuel hewed Agag in pieces in Gilgal, the text saith, "It was before the Lord."

9. Elijah and Elisha came often to Gilgal and prophesied, as 2 Kings ii. 1; iv. 38. Thus you see how famous Gilgal was, and yet though in these nine particulars a place of such renown, God gives his people a charge, that of all places they must not come to Gilgal. I will give you the reason of the prohibition presently, but I must first tell you what Beth-aven was.

Beth-aven was no other than that town which so often in Scripture is called Beth-el, that is, "the house of God," a name given to it by Jacob, on God's appearing to him when he fled because of his brother Esau, Gen. xxviii. This place had before been called Luz, from the abundance of almond trees which were there, the word Luz signifying an almond tree; but on God's appearing to Jacob the name was changed, and it was called Beth-el, "the house of God:" and a very sweet note we may have from thence, and that is, that God's appearing to his people in any place puts more honour on it than all the pleasant fruits that can grow in it. A garden or orchard filled with almond trees, and the most pleasant fruits imaginable, yet are not, and should not be, so delightful to us, nor would they be if our hearts were right, as the house of God, where God appears. If God appear to us in any place, even a wilderness, it should be esteemed more than the most pleasant garden in the world, where we have not the like manifestation. God's appearing makes that place the house of God, and renders it far more delightful than all the beautiful and pleasant fruits in the world possibly can do. Thus you see what both places were; but now they are strictly charged not to go thither. The reason of the change of the name from Beth-el to Beth-aven I shall show you presently, in explaining why they must not come to Gilgal nor to Beth-aven.

Now the reason why they must not come thither was this, because though they were such famous places before for God's true worship, yet now they were become the chiefest places for idolatry in the whole land, therefore there is a charge here not to come to Gilgal nor to Beth-aven. So in Amos v. 5, you have the like charge almost in the same words, "Seek not Beth-el, nor enter into Gilgal;" there it is called Beth-el: Though (saith God) it takes the name from my house, and there was once a glorious manifestation of mine there, yet now do not seek to Beth-el, do not so much as enter into Gilgal.

That both these places were now very corrupt by idolatry, I will make apparent. As I have showed you how famous these places were before, so I will show you how corrupt they afterward became. As to Gilgal, it appears plainly in Hos. ix. 15, "All their iniquity is in Gilgal," above all places there is the greatest iniquity committed; and "there I hated them." It was the place where God loved his people and manifested himself to them, but now, "there I hated them," I saw so much wickedness therein. And this corruption was of early date, for in Ehud's time, the third judge from Joshua, idols were then begun to be set up in Gilgal: thus Judg. iii. 19 saith, that Ehud "turned again from the quarries that were by Gilgal;" now קְרָרִים translated "quarries," some render idols, "from the idols;" it signifies also to engrave, he came from the engravings. There were idols at Gilgal then. And the reason of this corruption there was, that Gilgal had been an eminent place, and accounted very holy, because of the great things that had been done there; upon which they set up their images in it, and regarded the place with much superstitious respect and honour. Their respect to the place arose from God's often appearing there, and the great things that had been done in it, and now they began to think the place essentially holy, and so abused it. Hence,

Obs. 6. Men are prone to abuse places, esteeming them holy, because of some special things done in them. We see papists do so at this time, regarding the sepulchre of Christ; oh what a deal of stir was there about going to visit it! And the very cross whereon Christ was crucified, what a stir was there about that! as if it were more holy than any other piece of wood; one chip of it was counted worth I know not how much. And the sepulchres of the martyrs and cells of the monks, men have gone many a sore journey to visit. This is the same will-worship as existed amongst the people of the Jews. Whereas, the truth is, that it is not the place that can sanctify a work, except it be appointed therunto by God's institution; but if there be any sanctity in a place, it is sanctified by the work, and not the work by the place; and if the work do sanctify it, it is but for the present, during the performance of the holy duties. We may say this is the house of God, where the congregation meet for performance of holy duties, but it is so only in regard of the work; when the work is done there remains no impression of holiness on the place, as if God's worship in any other place were not as acceptable. This was the vain opinion of the Jews, they therefore abused Gilgal because such great things had been done there, and God so much the more hated it; I charge you, saith he, come not to Gilgal, that superstitious place. They thought, because it was a place eminent for many manifestations of God, it was therefore the more holy; I do therefore abhor it, saith God.

The reason why they must not come to Beth-aven appears from the change of the name; it was once Beth-el, and now it is Beth-aven, and the difference betwixt these two names, Beth-el and Beth-aven, is wide and great; Beth-el is the house of God, and Beth-aven is the house of iniquity, the house of vanity, the house of labour, and the house of affliction, for it signifies all these. That which was my house, which I did once own, being corrupted, is no other but the house of iniquity and vanity, and the house that brings affliction. Beth-aven was one of the places where Jeroboam set up one of his calves, and in this he took advantage of the opinion that the people entertained of the holiness of that place, thinking thereby to prevail with the people so much the more: now God charges them that they should not come thither. There was indeed another town, as in Josh. vii., called Beth-aven, but generally that by interpreters is understood as different from Beth-el; but this town here is no other than that Beth-el of which we have such frequent mention in the Scripture. Some, as Aquila and Symmachus, render the word Beth-aven, Domus inutilis, an unprofitable place, for indeed sin and idolatry make places unprofitable. Whence,

Obs. 7. We must not approach places calculated to draw us into sin; especially to false worship. Places dangerous for bodily pollution we must shun. Prov. v. 8, "Remove thy way far from her, and come not nigh the door of her house." Do not come so much as nigh her door. Say not, Why may not I go such a way? may not I go by her house? No, you must not go by her house, nor by that way that leads to her house. This is a strange admonition, you will say. Mark the words that precede it, in the 7th verse, "Hear me now therefore, O ye children, and depart not from the words of my mouth." What are the words of his mouth? "Remove thy way far from her, and come not nigh the door of her house." Thus wisdom herself counsels us. Many, however, think they may allow themselves to come near a temptation, near to such a place, and many have come so near that they have fallen into the pit. As sometimes in your houses, when you light a candle, you see moths and flies that will flutter up and down the light, and at first they will keep at some distance, and then approach nearer, till at length they singe their wings and perish: so it is with many; at first they think they will not do such a thing, Oh! God forbid they should do so and so; but they will come nigh a temptation, and be tampering with it, till at length they are insnared by it and destroyed. It is dangerous to indulge our curiosity in visiting places of idolatry, and going to see mass, and the fashions of superstitious countries. Dinah went thus abroad, but she came home dishonoured: so there are many that will go abroad to see the fashions of countries out of mere curiosity, (I speak not of going when God calls us to it,) it is just in God that they should come home maimed and despoiled. In the Lord's prayer we pray that God would not lead us into temptation. How do men mock God when they pray to God daily, "Lead us not into temptation;" yet will venture on temptations, frequent haunts of impurity, and go to many places where they know there will be wicked company; yea, even thrust themselves into it needlessly, with this pretence alone, they will take heed to themselves, and they mean no hurt! When you are tempted to go to places of sin, to theatres, and scenes of vice, satisfy not yourselves with this plea, I mean no hurt: have you any call from God for this? can you approve it before God, and say, Lord, thou hast called me hither? I suppose you have heard of that story that Tertullian has of a Christian woman, who being at a play became possessed of a devil; and other Christians coming to cast him out, asked the evil spirit how he durst possess one that was a Christian? he answered, I found her in my own place: so if we would take heed of the devil, let us take heed of wicked places.

Obs. 8. Places corrupted lose their honour. Rome formerly was a famous church, as in Rom. i. we find that the faith of Rome was spread abroad throughout the world; and so they will yet plead for the glory of Rome, because once it was famous. But it is no matter what it has been, what is it now? suppose it has been the seat of Peter, what is it now? If once they are corrupt in themselves, they lose the honour of what once they had. Oh let us take heed to ourselves also in this. True, England has also been a place renowned for religion, and travellers that have come hither have blessed themselves, and blessed God for seeing what they have seen, they never saw so much of God as in England: but if we shall corrupt our ways and become idolatrous and superstitious, we may, by God's just judgment, be made as infamous and vile as any people on the face of the earth. And so of particular persons, that heretofore have had much honour among the saints, men of admirable parts and very useful to the church, it may be, temptation prevails so much with them, tells them, You have had such a name, you have done such and such things, and now may be quiet, you cannot but be esteemed for what you have done. But let a man in his younger days or afterward act never so worthily in the church of God, or commonwealth, if he decline afterward he loses all his honour, both with God and men, and may be as unsavoury salt, spurned out and trodden under foot of men; as Gilgal and Beth-aven, though honoured before, yet now the people are charged not to come to them. One would have blest himself to be in the company and families of some men; but now they are grown so sapless in their spirits, so carnal, so malignant, superstitious, and vain, that it is dangerous now to associate with them; we may even hear a voice from God calling to us, Go not into such a man's company, as here, Go not to Gilgal. Thus you have the mind of God in these words opened to you, "Come not ye unto Gilgal, neither go ye up to Beth-aven." There follows,

"Nor swear, The Lord liveth." Swearing in itself is lawful, yea, it is a part of the solemn worship of God, when God requires it; and it constitutes such a part of God's solemn worship, as that sometimes it is put in Scripture for the whole worship of God, Psal. lxxiii. 12; Isa. xix. 18. Therefore oaths are to be esteemed so much the more sacred: for as God puts such an honour on prayer, that sometimes the whole worship of God is called prayer, "He that calleth on the name of the Lord shall be saved;" "My house shall be called the house of prayer." So God honours oaths, that all his worship has sometimes the name of an oath. Therefore the abuse of oaths is the more vile; and when swearing is requisite, it should only be by the name of the Lord; we should swear by the Lord when it is lawful to swear, and in no other way, for by this we acknowledge the Lord to be the searcher and judge of all hearts, the all-seeing God, fit to witness to all men's ways, and to be an avenger of all their unfaithfulness. And here is the reason that we must swear by none but by God, because in swearing (I say) we acknowledge him we swear by to be the searcher of our hearts, the witness of all our secrets, and the supreme judge if we be unfaithful: now this honour, whether secret or open, is only due to God. God esteems it highly, and will not give it to another. And when we do swear by his name, the life of God is the greatest title we can give him. It is the greatest oath of all; God himself doth often swear by his life; and the angel, by the living God. God loves that his creature should acknowledge him to be the living God for ever, that is, living to reward that which is good, and to revenge that which is evil. And therefore, Jer. iv. 2, there is an injunction, "Thou shalt swear, The Lord liveth," but it must be "in truth, in righteousness, and in judgment." And indeed it is God's mercy to us, that he will grant us the use of his name, that he is willing to be called to witness to our affairs.

But then you will say, Why doth God forbid it? In that place of Jeremiah you see it is, "Thou shalt swear, The Lord liveth;" and here, "nor swear, The Lord liveth." How shall we reconcile these? Thus; that God would not have his name and this his solemn worship abused by idolaters. When they were before their idols, yet still they would make use of God's name, and would seem to honour him; Oh, Jehovah liveth, we acknowledge him, and honour him as a living God. This was the vain show of those idolaters, who, though they forsook the true worship and commandments of God, yet would seem to revere him much; "The Lord liveth," and we desire to honour this living God. Now, saith God, why do you pursue such idolatry as this, and take my name into your mouths? what have you to do to take my name into your mouths, seeing you hate to be reformed? I will have none of this honour from you, saith God, you shall not swear any more, "The Lord liveth." Many superstitious persons will make much use of the titles of God, and employ many expressions that carry a great air of devotion; they will cry out, Our blessed Saviour, Our Lord and Saviour, and, The blessed God; but God cares for none of these, while they worship him according to the traditions of men, after their own inventions: God cares not for all the seeming honour they render him, for all their lip service; let them appear to men to be never so devout, God rejects those devotions, when they reject his pure and sincere worship. God loves not to have his worship mixed. In Zeph. i. 5, God charges them with swearing by the Lord and by Malcham; what is the meaning of that? Malcham there signifies a king, for such is the meaning of the Hebrew; and it seems, that though it is true they would sometimes call their idols by the name of king, Honoris gratia, by way of respect, yet that in this place more is intended, namely, that they would worship God and worship their king too, they would swear by God and by Malcham, they made the honour paid to their king come too near the honour rendered to God; this seems here to be specially intended. It is true, both are to be honoured, but one is to be honoured more than the other, and the true distance between them is duly to be observed; we must not swear by God and swear by Malcham, much less prefer the will of our Malcham, our king, before the will of our God. God cares not for any honour given to him in common with others. It is true indeed, God rejects not the worship of his saints because of some mixtures of evil, for there are none that worship him so as not to mix some sin with it; but such as choose to themselves some way of sin, that set it up in their hearts and lives, and then think it sufficient to yield God some outward service, and expect to put him off with that, while at other times they follow their own lusts, such worship God rejects: therefore saith the Lord here to these idolaters, "You shall not swear, The Lord liveth."

Ver. 16. For Israel slideth back as a backsliding heifer: now the Lord will feed them as a lamb in a large place.

Here, first, Israel, the ten tribes, is compared to a heifer, and to "a backsliding heifer." A heifer, that noted the wantonness of Israel. And here is one argument why Judah must not offend as Israel doth; Let not Judah offend as Israel doth, for Israel is a backsliding heifer: Israel, through his sin, has brought himself to be a vile, wanton heifer; but the emblem of Judah is to be a lion: Gen. xlix. 9, "Judah is a lion's whelp: from the prey, my son, thou art gone up: he stooped down, he couched as a lion, and as an old lion; who shall rouse him up?" Judah should not refuse the yoke through wantonness and perverseness, but through a magnanimous spirit, he should not be willing to be brought under the yoke of bondage. Israel is as a heifer, that through wantonness refuses to be brought under the yoke; but let not Judah do thus, for Judah is as a lion: and although Judah be a lion, yet he should come under God's command, and be subject to him; but when it comes to be in bondage to men, and that in matters of religion, Judah should have a magnanimous, lion-like spirit, and cast off the yoke: Let not Judah be like Israel; Judah is as a lion, Israel as a heifer.

And the word כָּרָה which is translated backsliding, cometh of כָּרַר signifying perverseness, as well as backsliding. It is translated in Scripture, stubbornness, rebellion, as in Deuteronomy, about the stubborn and rebellious child; and many other scriptures might be shown how this word is understood otherwise than here. Israel is a stubborn, a rebellious, a perverse people, therefore let not Judah be so. And I find the Seventy translate it thus, εαμάλια παροτρῶσα, that is, Israel, the ten tribes, were a stung bullock, Juvenca aestro percita, as if by a kind of witchery, or by the bite of some venomous thing, they had been excited to fury or madness: such is the force of the word, according to their translation. There is a great deal of difference between the wantonness of a beast, and a beast that runs up and down in a fury and madness, as being bit with a mad dog. Thus this people was. Ephraim goes on madly: as many wicked men go on in ways apparently against light and conscience, and against the word, though they know it will prove to be their eternal ruin and destruction; conscience tells them so, yet they go violently on, in a madness and rage, even down to the pit. This was Ephraim's condition here.

And that which made Ephraim do so, was his prosperity. Ephraim was grown prosperous, and had plenty of food, was fed full and large, and that made them go on madly in the ways of wickedness and sin. That was now fulfilled of Ephraim which was prophesied of him, Deut. xxxii. 15, "Thou art waxen fat, thou art grown thick, thou art covered with fatness; then he forsook God which made him, and lightly esteemed the Rock of his salvation." Oh, when a people is waxen fat and grown prosperous, then they kick and spurn, and forsake God that made them, and lightly esteem the Rock of their salvation; God and his truth, his saints and his ordinances, are nothing to them, they lightly esteem them; why? because they are waxen fat, they are in their prosperity. Many men on their sick beds highly esteem the ministers of God, and his word and worship, and exclaim then, Oh send for such and such to come to us: but when they are in prosperity, all these are forgotten. This was the condition of Ephraim. Where have you a man almost, but grows wanton in prosperity, except God comes in with abundance of his grace? Judah was almost in the same state; though here the Lord would not have Judah to be like Ephraim, as a wanton heifer, spurning and kicking with the heel, yet it appears in Jer. ii. 24, that Judah was not much dissimilar: Judah is there compared to "a wild ass used to the wilderness, that snuffeth up the wind at her pleasure; in her occasion who can turn her away? all they that seek her will not weary themselves," to take her when she is full of spirit and strength, and there is no dealing with her; but, saith God, "in her month they shall find her," when she is more weakened, then "they shall find her:" so many men; take them when swollen with pride and prosperity, and there is no dealing with them; but when God has tamed them by affliction, then you may talk with them, and then they will hear you.

But further, the word translated "heifer" here, is in the feminine gender, though spoken of the ten tribes, because, being stubborn and raging mad in wickedness, though they seemed to themselves and others to be full of fiery courage, yet the Lord looks upon them as people base and effeminate, poor and weak. The stubborn and proud always think themselves to possess more than ordinary courage, they are the only brave spirits; but the Lord regards them as base and weak, and therefore speaks of them here in the feminine gender.

"Now the Lord will feed them as a lamb in a large place." Mercer and Vatablus would thus interpret this: Lautè ut agnus pastus, non maclatur. As a lamb when it hath large food, it is soon slain; so God threatens Ephraim here, that he will soon make an end of them, only he will let them prosper for a while, and feed them largely, but it shall be for the slaughter. Many men that are fed largely, and are in prosperity, think themselves blessed, but God intends them only for the slaughter; I think, however, that is not the meaning of the place, "they shall be fed as a lamb." But thus,

"As a lamb." They are as a heifer, raging mad, but I will make them as a lamb, I will bring such affliction upon them, that I will tame the pride of their hearts. Have you not seen instances of this kind? did you never see a blasphemous, proud, stubborn spirit, when the hand of God was upon them, tamed?

Fed as a lamb. Parce ac tenuiter, not fed as a heifer, that denoted their prosperity; but fed as a lamb, that notes their adversity; for the food of a lamb differs from the food of a heifer, that which will feed a lamb will starve a heifer. They have been proud and wanton, saith God, by their prosperity, but now they shall have spare fare, I will bring them down, I will lay them low, they shall be but as a lamb that picks up the grass in the wilderness.

"As a lamb in a large place." That is, dispersed among the countries, amongst the Assyrians and Medes in their captivity, who occupied a very large country. They would not be satisfied with Canaan, and with that sheep-fold of mine that was there; they shall have more room, saith God, they shall go into a large place, but it shall be a place of captivity.

Or rather, which I conceive to be the full scope of the passage, "I will feed them as a lamb in a large place;" that is, as a lamb that shall be alone; one lamb, he speaks of them singly, because they shall be scattered. They had society, and might have made good use of it, but they cared not to avail themselves of it, to edify each other in the fear of God, therefore they shall be scattered, one in one place, and another in another, and they shall be as a lamb alone in the wilderness, successful, helpless, surrounded by dangers, and with no eye near to pity, no hand to help it. What will become, think you, of this lamb? what an unfriendly condition is it in! So, saith God, they have been wanton heifers, but I will "feed them as a lamb in a large place;" they shall be carried into captivity, and there they shall be lamenting and mourning, and in danger of wolves, but there shall be none to regard, and none to succour them. It is a great deal safer for a lamb to be in the flock, though it be more confined, than to be thus alone in a large place. Hence,

Obs. 1. Liberty may prove to be one's misery. To keep within the compass of God's commands is the best liberty of all; as David professes, Psal. cxix., Then shall I have liberty, when I keep all thy commandments. As for all other liberty, it will certainly bring us into straitness; therefore, Rom. ii. 9, where "tribulation and anguish" is threatened to be upon the head of every one that worketh wickedness, the word translated "anguish" signifies straitness of place, they shall have straitness of place: You would be at large, and would fain get out of God's limits: though God may for a time let you have such liberty, yet the conclusion will be anguish of spirit. O my brethren, there is largeness, there is room enough in God, in him our souls may expatiate, we need go no further for liberty. If we would have liberty out of God, and out of his bounds, our liberty will prove our undoing.

Let us then value highly the society of the saints while we are not yet, through God's mercy, scattered up and down in other countries, as some of our brethren have been, though, through his mercy, some even there have met with and been kept in his own fold; but others have wandered to and fro, and have had none to help them in any strait. Our condition is not yet such; but we may meet together, we may be in God's fold and have our hearts refreshed, we may go into our families and pray together, and sing together. Let us then bless God that this judgment denounced against Israel, that they should be "as a lamb in a large place," bleating up and down and none to regard them, has not befallen us; let us, I say, bless God for this his forbearance and long-suffering.

Ver. 17. Ephraim is joined to idols: let him alone.

You have heard before, that God warns Judah to take heed of the sins of the ten tribes of Israel; and many arguments are used; some you have heard, others remain.

This 17th verse contains two principal points.

I. Ephraim engaging himself in false worship, is now so inwrapped in that sin and guilt that he cannot tell how to extricate himself; "Ephraim is joined to idols:" as it is usual with idolaters, and the effect of the curse of God upon them, that when they are once engaged in that sin, it is very hard ever to recover them out of it; so, Judah, take heed that you come not into it.

II. The Lord has given him up to his idols. The curse of God rests on him, and saith, "Let him alone." O Judah, take heed then what you do. These words are thus introduced as a twofold argument to persuade Judah not to do as Israel has done, and indeed all the remainder of this chapter has the same tendency. To speak then of these:

I. "Ephraim is joined to idols." Why Ephraim? Ephraim was dead long ago. He was the child of a patriarch, and the grandchild of Jacob, from whom he received a great blessing; Gen. xlviii. 20, "In thee shall Israel bless, saying, God make thee as Ephraim;" intimating that such special blessings would rest on him that the tribes should say, "God make thee as Ephraim;" and yet now it is said, that "Ephraim is joined to idols." Why then Ephraim?

1. The chief of the ten tribes that were now joined to idols, were the children of Ephraim, for Ephraim and Manasseh had received Joseph's inheritance in Israel, and at this time were the chief of the ten tribes. Whence,

Obs. 1. Wicked children are a great dishonour to their parents. Ephraim, who was dead long before, suffers dishonour by his children that are now joined to idols. Let children, out of reverence and respect to their parents, take heed what they do.

2. Jeroboam and the princes were all of the tribe of Ephraim, and therefore all is attributed to them. He does not say the ten tribes are joined to idols, but Ephraim is; because indeed the idolatry of all the other nine tribes sprang from the idolatry of Jeroboam, and the princes that were of the tribe of Ephraim. Whence again,

Obs. 2. Governors are usually the causes of the evils of the people. If governors be superstitious and will favour idolatry, all the people, or the generality of them, will imitate, but they contract all the guilt. Ephraim, Jeroboam and the princes of that tribe, contract all the guilt of the idolatry of all the ten tribes, therefore it is said, Ephraim, as if Ephraim only was joined to idols. Governors therefore that are superstitious and idolatrous, incur woeful guilt, and we have exceeding cause to lament their condition. We read in the second of Matthew, that the wise men who came to inquire after the King of the Jews, came from a far country, and said they had seen his star, and desired to know the place in which he should be born. Herod, and all Jerusalem with him, were troubled what this strange thing should mean, that such wise men should come from so far a country, and tell of a star that had appeared, and of a King of the Jews that should be born; and they called a council of all the chief priests and the scribes, and such as were expert in the law, to know where Christ should be born, and this council pointed out Bethlehem as the place; and upon that, the wise men, according to their direction, or according to the star, proceeded thither: but mark, you do not read of any one of all the people of Jerusalem that went with the wise men; although they were stirred at it, and thought it wonderful that a star should thus appear, and that these wise men should come and inquire for the King of the Jews, and that their own teachers should tell them that he was to be born at Bethlehem, and that thereupon they should go thither to find him, yet (I say) we do not read that any of the people went with them; no, they durst not, because of Herod. He was the prince, and it met not with his approbation, and therefore not one of the people would accompany the wise men to search after Christ. So it usually happens, that when governors discountenance the ways of God, they are followed by the people. And especially governors inclined to superstition and idolatry, and who, together with these, will indulge people in their lusts, they will indeed, as Jeroboam and the rest of the princes did, find followers in abundance. As appeared partly before, and will further appear in this prophecy, this scope and liberty given to their lusts was one special way by which they gained the hearts of the people to them in their false worship. Let any princes and governors set up and countenance any false way of worship, and together with it give liberty to the people for the satisfying of their lusts, and they will gain enow unto them; there is no cause to wonder that such princes should have so many to cleave unto them, seeing the people know that by cleaving unto them they shall have liberty to enjoy their lusts. Whence,

Obs. 3. Idolaters' hearts are strongly attached to their idolatrous ways. "Ephraim is joined to idols." The word is הקשר and signifies in the participle, incantatus, such a kind of joining as that whereby your enchanters in their conjurations join their unclean spirits to them: so Ephraim is joined to his idols, cleaveth to his idols, or (as some render it) is glued to his idols, and that unclean spirit which carries him on to the ways of idolatry is become incorporated with him. As it is said of believers, that they are joined to the Lord Christ, and so they are one spirit; so idolaters are joined to the devil, and are become as one spirit with him. So Jer. viii. 5, "They hold fast deceit;" they will not easily be taken off. And Jer. ii. 10, 11, "Pass over the isles of Chittim, and see; and send unto Kedar, and consider diligently, and see if there be such a thing. Hath a nation changed their gods, which are yet no gods?" Kedar was one of the vilest places: Woe is me, saith David, that I have my habitation in the tents of Kedar! yet, saith God, go thither, and see whether they have changed their gods. The most vile idolaters will not yet change their gods, their hearts are joined to them; let their hearts be never so base, and their gods never so vile: as the Egyptians would worship leaves, and garlick, and cats, and would listen to no admonitions against their idolatrous ways. I have read, too, of a people in India, in the isle Zolon, that worshipped an ape's tooth; and when it was taken from them, they offered an inconceivable sum of treasure to regain that their idol again: so attached are idolaters to "their gods, which are yet no gods." And especially if they have outward prosperity, to be as the glue and cement to join their hearts to their false worship, then they are joined indeed. If men that are superstitious prosper in their ways, this, their prosperity, is the glue and cement to join their hearts strongly to those ways, there is no alienating them from them. And long continuance in false worship makes them not like it a whit the worse. I beseech you, observe this, that antiquity will make false worship venerable, and they will plead for it on account of its antiquity, and say, it is thus and thus ancient, and was the religion of their forefathers. Of the true worship of God men are quickly weary, and because they have had it a great while they desire some change, some novelty. Many people are much affected with the truth when first revealed to them, and their hearts are much taken with sermons, but within a while they loathe and forsake this manna. Such is the wickedness of the hearts of men.

But will idolaters thus adhere to their idols? will their hearts be united to them? are they willing to be one spirit with them? Oh how much more should we join to the Lord our God, join to Jesus Christ, to be as one spirit with him! That exhortation of Barnabas, Acts xi. 23, that with full "purpose of heart they should cleave unto the Lord," is seasonable even at all times. O let us cleave to God and his worship, so that whatever arguments are used, yet our hearts may never be taken off from the love of the truth; but let us say as once that martyr did, Though you may pluck my heart out of my bowels, yet you shall never pluck the truth out of my heart. And the less there is between God and our hearts, the more firmly shall we be joined to him. The godly and gracious need not the cement of outward prosperity to join their hearts to God, the very sweetness that they find in God alone is enough to unite their hearts to him, even in an everlasting covenant. Those who seem to be joined to God and his worship, yet if united merely by the cement of outward respects, they will quickly fall off; but those that are immediately joined to God will for ever keep to him, when there is nothing but God and their hearts together, nothing between God and them.

"Ephraim is joined to idols." The word עָקַבִּים translated idols, is by some rendered, and justly, dolore afficere, pains or troubles. For this latter signification there are two reasons.

1. Because that idolaters were willing to endure much pain and trouble in the worshipping of their idols; which should teach us not to account the worship of God tedious, though it be somewhat hard to the flesh.

2. Such worship will bring pain and trouble to them in the end.

This however is not the principal thing intended here, but the force of the argument is, "Ephraim is joined to idols," therefore meddle not with him, do not you do as they do. So that when we see people set up false ways of worship in any place, and they are resolute for them, we must take heed of communicating with them in these their idolatries; but to enter on this would occupy too much time.

II. The Lord has given him up to his idols.

"Let him alone;" Demitte eum, Let him go, saith God, he is joined to his idols, let him go. This admits of three expositions.

1. As addressed to Judah. Let Ephraim go, saith God to Judah. Ephraim, they indeed are the ten tribes, the greater part of the Jews, but yet seeing they set up false worship, let them go, have nothing to do with them, do not converse with them. Here,

Obs. 4. It is a heavy judgment of God upon a people when the saints withdraw from them. If God had any saints in the world they were in Judah, and saith God to these saints of his, Let Israel alone and withdraw from them, have nothing to do with them, though they be your brethren and countrymen, yet, let them alone. Many wicked men make nothing of this, and when the most strict, and holy, and gracious people of God withdraw from them, and, as heretofore, forsake the land because they see it so defiled with superstitious vanities, they say, Let them all go, we are well rid of them: and who knows but you may be thus spoken of before you die? that you may have many that will be willing to be rid of those that are most godly and gracious? Well, whatever men think and say, let them know it is a dreadful curse of God on a nation, for the saints of God to withdraw and go from them; for such is the import of God's command here, Judah, let them alone, have nothing to do with them: so when God commands his saints to withdraw from others of their brethren, it is one of his most dreadful judgments on a people, whatever they think of it. You know that expression, conveying the most fearful curse of God on the wicked, which you have, 1 Cor. xvi. 22, "If any man love not the Lord Jesus Christ, let him be Anathema Maran-atha." "Anathema," let him be accursed; but the meaning of "Maran-atha" is, the Lord cometh: Maran signifies the Lord, in the Chaldee and Syriac; and is so used by Daniel, who lived in Chaldea. Thus Dan. iv. 19; v. 23, "My lord, the dream be to them that hate thee," and, "Thou hast lifted up thyself against the Lord of heaven;" the word מָרַן whence Maran in the Syriac, is there translated Lord; and atha signifies to come; as in Deut. xxxiii. 2, The Lord cometh with thousands of his saints, the word in the original is מָרַן so that you have in Scripture these two words Maran and atha. What then is the meaning of that, "Let him be Anathema Maran-atha?" This simply; when men shall forsake Christ and the ways of his worship, after means have been used with them, then "Anathema Maran-atha," that is, let all the saints of God leave them to the coming of Jesus Christ; let them alone, do not meddle with them; when you have used all means you can, then withdraw yourselves from them, and leave them to the coming of Christ, and Christ will deal with them: let them not only be excommunicated, but so excommunicated that they be let alone to the coming of Christ. So when the godly shall first labour by admonition, and persuasion, and counsel, with the ungodly and sinners, and they shall be refractory, and stout, and stubborn, and be as swine to trample under feet those pearls, or as dogs to turn again and rend them, they are then to let them alone, that is, to let them alone to the coming of Jesus Christ; and even in their own hearts say, Well, we see no means can do them any good, "Maran-atha," the Lord cometh, and he shall deal with them himself when he cometh.

2. The Lord speaks here to the prophet, as if he should say, Hosea, you can do no good to them, it is in vain for you to meddle with Ephraim. Just as Christ directed his disciples when he sent them forth to preach the gospel, that if any place rejected them, they should go away and shake the dust off their feet, as a testimony against them; so saith God here to the prophet, Let them alone, spend not your strength any more upon them. The exhortations which come from the saints, but especially from sincere ministers of the gospel, be they what they may, are pearls and precious things, and God will not have them despised, he will not have them spent in vain; therefore there is a time even for the ministers of God to let people alone. In Exod. xxxiii. 7, we read, that when the people had notoriously sinned against God, Moses took the tabernacle of the congregation, and pitched it without the camp, and went away from the people, and would not come amongst them, till they repented: so there is a time even for the ministers of God to hold their peace and let people alone. Many think they are troubled with ministers, and they could wish they would let them alone; Why do they trouble us? we were quiet enough before they came; we would they would let us alone. And there are many guilty consciences, that cannot come to a powerful ministry but they find that the minister has in every sermon to do with them, and that he will not let them alone in their wickedness, and this troubles them, and they had rather be let alone. Had you so? It is one of the most dreadful judgments in the world for God to say, Let such a ministry let a man alone. It may be, some of you may be weary of the faithful ministers of God; you may get rid of them perhaps, God may take them away, and you may be let alone; but yet know, in this rests on you the brand of God's wrath.

3. It shows that God himself would let them alone too, it is an evidence of his rejection of this people. It is as if a father, that had used means to reclaim a rebellious child, would at length, when he disregarded all his admonitions, exclaim, Let him alone. What do you think would the father mean? it is as if he should say, I have done with him, I will own him no more, I will meddle no more with him. If a servant should be stubborn and rebellious, and all the many means used to reclaim him should fail; the master saith, Let him alone, let him take his own course, I will have no more to do with him. So here, when God saith, Let them alone, it is as if he should say, Let them take their own ways, let them have their lusts to the full, let them join themselves to their idols, and satisfy themselves with their own devices, let them alone. Hence arise two profitable observations.

Obs. 5. God has a time to give men over to themselves, to say that his Spirit shall no longer strive with them. Oh, many a man has felt the Spirit of God working, struggling, striving with him to draw him from such and such wickedness; he has felt (I say) God's Spirit mighty and strong, pleading, Will you still go on in this way of wickedness, uncleanness, drunkenness, oppression, injustice, profanation, hypocrisy, self-seeking, and the like? but he has been striving against, and his lusts have even gotten the victory over, the Spirit, so that God saith, "My Spirit shall no longer strive," I will not struggle in vain, but let him go on and be filled with his own devices. Oh, it is dreadful when the Lord saith of a drunkard, of an unclean person, of a hypocrite, I have been struggling so long with them, but yet their hearts have been opposed to me; let them alone, let them go on and satisfy themselves in their iniquities. Psal. lxxxi. 11, 12, They "would none of me," saith God, they would none of my ways, "so I gave them up to their own counsels." Oh, this is a dreadful gift! Many men will set their counsels against God's counsels, and will do it so long, that God at length gives them up to their own counsels: You will set your thoughts against my truth, your counsels against mine; well, take your own counsels, satisfy yourselves in your own ways. And you know that place in the latter end of the Revelation, "He which is filthy, let him be filthy still." Let him alone, saith God: will you be filthy? be filthy then. And that in Ezek. xxiv. 13, "Because I have purged thee, and thou wast not purged, thou shalt not be purged from thy filthiness any more." I will let them alone, saith the Lord, I will never seek, either by my word, or by my works, to do them any further good, they shall be purged no more. And the reasons are,

1. Because God has no need of men. God does this to show that he has no need of you. Indeed he seeks by his word to draw you to obedience to his service, and you stand off, and draw from him, and will not come in: at length God will manifest that he has no need of your service, he can honour himself without you, though you perish everlastingly.

2. He knows how to fetch out glory to his own name from their sins. You will continue in your wicked ways, you will be stubborn and stout, saith God; do you think so to hinder me of my glory? well, take your fill of your lusts, I know how to glorify myself out of that sin whereby you offend so much against my glory, therefore be ye filled with your own devices.

Obs. 6. It is the most woeful judgment of God upon any people, or person, when he saith in his wrath, "Let him alone." The words are לֹא-תִרְחַם and is equivalent to, Let him be quiet: that quiet will prove a dreadful storm. You know what the wise man saith, "Woe to him that is alone!" Oh, woe to him, of whom God saith, "Let him alone," that is thus alone! Many men bless themselves when they are let alone, and desire it; Let us alone, say they. Oh, but when God shall say, Let them alone, this is a most dreadful thing indeed. It proved to be a fearful evil to Adam in Paradise, when God let him alone: when he left Adam to himself what became of him? As far as he could, he undid himself and all his posterity, when left to his natural abilities. Yea, and when God but leaves his own saints, that have grace in them, for a little while to themselves, oh what mischief ensues! As in 2 Chron. xxxii. 31, when God did but for a little leave Hezekiah to himself, to try what was in his heart, what a deal of misery did he bring on himself! What! do such evil consequences attend on Adam left alone in Paradise, and the saints left alone here? oh what a dreadful thing must it be, then, when God shall leave a sinner alone! I mean one that has nothing else but sin in him, one wholly destitute of grace. This is a most grievous judgment for many reasons.

1. It is a testimony of very great disregard for God his creatures, in this, that he accounts them not worthy of any further meddling with, he loves them not so well as to interpose any further on their account; it is a sign, I say, of great disregard on the part of God for them; it is as if he should say, There are others indeed that are wicked, that are very great sinners; but I have mercy for them, I intend to draw them to myself, I intend to show them the evil of their ways, and to turn them to me that they may be saved; but as for these, I have nothing to do with them, saith God, I have no mercy for them, let them alone.

2. Because those let alone are going apace to misery. To let a man alone when he is at home in his house and all things convenient about him, matters not; but if you were to see one madly rushing to water, or into fire, to destroy himself, no one then would hesitate to interpose; to let him alone were a great judgment. But now the Lord sees sinners running headlong into misery, into the bottomless pit, and even then God saith, Let them alone.

3. They were in the midst of abundance of dangers. When a man is in safety among his friends, and you let him alone, it matters not; but suppose you knew of one environed with adversaries, or around whom were wild beasts ready to devour, and this message were brought to you, Oh there is such a friend of ours in great danger, and you should say, What if he be, let him alone, let him shift as well as he can; it would be a grievous judgment: yet all sinners that are going on in their evil ways are in woeful danger on every hand, and the Lord sees and takes notice that they are in the midst of dangers, yet saith God, Let them alone, they shall not have my protection and help. And this is a just punishment of God on sinners that will go on in their wickedness.

4. God intends by this to make way for some fearful wrath that is to come upon them. Let my mercy and goodness let them alone, but it is that they may fall into my wrath; and that will not let them alone, that will trouble them. They cannot endure to be troubled by my word, by my messengers, by my Spirit; but my wrath shall trouble them afterward, that shall not let them alone: as in that place of Ezekiel before quoted, "Thou shalt not be purged from thy filthiness any more, till I have caused my fury to rest upon thee," chap. xxiv. 13; they shall have no outward means to trouble them for a while, but at length my fury shall rest upon them. When the Lord seems to be quiet toward men and lets them alone, it is but to make way for fearful wrath that is coming upon them.

5. God will not, after the infliction of this judgment, vouchsafe to hear them speak unto him any more. If once the Lord shall say, They would not hear me, they shall never hear me more, let them alone; God will then likewise say, I will not hear them; let them cry in the anguish of their spirits, I will let them alone. It seems evident, that when God shall let sinners alone with respect to his mercy, when the greatest wrath shall be upon them he will let them alone also. As thus; when they shall come into the greatest afflictions, the most dreadful miseries and torments in this world and eternally in the world to come, when they shall then be crying out in the anguish of their spirits unto God, Oh that God would now have mercy upon us! God will let them even then alone: I will bring them into the fire, saith God, and then I will leave them there. Oh think of this, when you feel that there was a time when God was stirring and striving with your hearts, and implore of him to recover you out of the snares of the devil.

6. It is a dreadful sign of reprobation: and we shall briefly consider what reprobation is, and in what respect this is a sign of it.

1. What is reprobation? Reprobation certainly means not that God decrees to damn men, that is not the first act of God upon any man; but that God decrees, whereas there are some that he has set his heart upon, is resolved to do them good, there are others, whom he does not presently decree to damn, but he determines to leave to themselves, that what they earn they may have, and no more; he will deal with them according to their works; he will do them no wrong, will not be unjust to them, he will not condemn them but for their sin: he never decrees to damn any but for sin; but he decrees this, I will give them what is fit for them to have in creation, I will make such a covenant with them, and then I will leave them to themselves, and in course of justice, what they work for, that they shall have. For God to decree to leave a man to himself when he had no sin in him, as God did not make man with sin at first, were an act of reprobation: suppose you were now made according to the image of God, without sin, yet if God should decree to leave you fully and eternally to yourself, you were but a reprobate: but there is a second and more dreadful reprobation, when God sees a man in the gall of bitterness and in the bond of iniquity, and leaves him to himself.

2. Wherein the reprobation here consists. That God now doth manifest that he intends to fetch his glory from this sinner out of his ruin. Certainly God will have glory from every creature; however they may resist, God will have it, he will fetch it out from you. God would have his glory from his creature in the ways of obedience and service; but they deny him this, they will not give him this glory, they will have their own will, and set up themselves in God's throne. Well, saith God, I have used such and such means to draw their hearts from those ways to myself, but they stand out, let them be now: as if he should say, I have thought now of another way to fetch out my glory from them. As he in the Gospel reasoned, when he could not provide for himself one way, I know what I will do, saith he: so saith God, I am denied my glory one way, I will adopt other means, that is, I will glorify my infinite justice and the power of my infinite wrath; they have refused to give me glory by obedience and submission to me, I will not have my glory that way, but now I will rather choose to have my glory from them in their everlasting misery; they shall be spectacles of my wrath and justice, and it shall be known to angels and men to all eternity, what my infinite justice and power is able to do; therefore let them alone, saith God.

7. It is greater than all earthly judgments. Too many of you are afraid of sickness, of being spoiled of your goods, afraid that God should let the enemy in upon you, and all should be taken from you; and this were a great judgment, but the judgment in the text is far greater. If you were stripped of all the comforts in the world, and brought into the most miserable condition with respect to outward circumstances, yet you were not under such a dreadful judgment as this, for God to say, Let them alone. Better any judgments than spiritual judgments. As the spiritual blessings of God bestowed on the saints are the greatest blessings, "Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, who hath blessed us with all spiritual blessings in heavenly places in Christ," Eph. i. 3: so the spiritual judgments of God are his most dreadful judgments on the children of men. Oh that we could have our hearts possessed with a fear of those spiritual judgments more than all the judgments in the world!

8. It is worse than to be given up to the devil. If God should give up any man to the devil, and say, Take him, possess him, (as once he possessed many in Christ's time,) it were not such a fearful judgment as this, to say, Let lusts take him and rule him, let him be given up to his own heart's lusts, let him alone to them. And this is apparent from that place where the apostle directs the incestuous person to be given over to Satan, for the destruction of the flesh, that his soul might be saved: when one is given up to the devil in excommunication, or any other way, it may prove the salvation of his soul; but this judgment of God, saying, Let a man alone, is for the destruction of his soul, not of the flesh; it tends directly to the destruction of the soul, though, it may be, in the mean while the flesh may be saved. It is so with many; there are many whom God lets alone, and that proves the destruction of the soul, but perhaps the saving of the flesh: as thus, perhaps many that went on in wickedness, God was chastising and afflicting, and this tended to the destruction of the flesh, though to the saving of their soul; but they would rather live in prosperity and ease, and indulge their sin; Well, saith God, you shall do so, you shall have ease and prosperity, and have your sin; that is, your flesh shall here be saved, but your soul shall eternally be destroyed. Therefore it is worse than to be given up to the devil.

9. It is worse than to be sent down to hell presently; for when one is left alone to himself, he will increase his sin most dreadfully throughout his life-time, and as his sin increases, so his torment: therefore it is a most dreadful thing to be let alone.

10. Though he be without grace, he must answer for it as though he had it; there lies the further evil of it. When God leaves a man alone, he must not think he is not to answer still for the motions of God's Spirit though he has them not, and for the means of grace though he enjoy them not, for he has deprived himself of them; for look, what means of grace we, through sin, have deprived ourselves of, we must answer for them. And there is none of you but may be convinced of this. I will give you a plain instance. Suppose you send your servant to market to buy a commodity, and give him money wherewith he may do it, but he goes into an alehouse or tavern and drinks it away; he cannot bring you what you sent him for but you may justly require it, and punish him for not doing of it: he may say, Would you have me do that I cannot? I cannot bring it to you without money: yea, but you may reply, I gave you money, it is your fault you have embezzled it. So God may justly require of these men all that they might have done by all the means of grace they should have had: God gave you that means, you have embezzled it by your sin.

11. Now all the means of grace are made unprofitable to him, yea, cursed to him, and they have quite a contrary effect; for the word will work one way or other, either to be the savour of life unto life, or of death unto death; and so the sacrament, either to be the seal of salvation, or the seal of damnation. Now all those means that do other souls good, are to him unprofitable. It may, be the poor child of a wicked parent comes to the word, and there finds God revealing himself to him, and the Spirit of God drawing his heart to himself; but there is his parent, of whom God has said, Let him alone, he sits under the means and gets no good: so perhaps the master is one on whom this judgment is past, Let him alone; and he sits under the means without benefit, whilst his poor servant comes, and his soul is enlightened, his heart is enlarged.

O my brethren, upon this (because the point is of so great consequence I could not pass by it lightly) you may learn from hence,

1. What poor creatures we all are. God need not say, Let my power, and wrath, and justice come upon them, to make them miserable; if God but say, Let them alone, we are presently miserable, we are lost and undone. As in nature, if God should say to any of you as soon as born, Let this creature alone, and let none help him, how miserable were our condition! So with respect to our souls, take one that has the most excellent gifts in all this congregation, yea, take one that has the most excellent graces, if God should but say, Let him alone, he would quickly bring himself to misery. It is through the strength of that grace in the covenant that God will never say to those that are members of his Son, Let them alone for ever.

2. To fear and tremble at this judgment. Especially let them deeply consider this, who have felt the Spirit of God stirring in their hearts, and the word coming to their consciences, yet have gone on, directly against God's word and the motions of his Spirit. Oh that this day the fear of this great God may fall upon them, lest God should say, Let them alone! Perhaps God has not said so yet, but who knows but that upon the next wilful sin thou committest, God may say concerning thee, Let him alone? and then thou art undone for ever. Oh, fear and tremble.

Perhaps some of you may say, God has surely said this of me already, I should not else be so unprofitable under the means, I should not hear such powerful sermons and get so little good, I should not have such and such corruptions prevailing over me; I am afraid this is pronounced already against me.

I am loth when I speak of this dreadful judgment (which is indeed the most dreadful in all the book of God) to let any poor soul go that has need of comfort, without receiving what is due to him.

To answer thee, then:

1. It is a good sign that God has not let thee alone, when thou art troubled with such a fear. Commonly, those whom God has left alone go on and are quiet, and are never troubled about it, but please themselves in their own hearts' lusts.

2. It is a good means to keep thee from being let alone. Those that are afraid lest God should leave them alone, and upon that can say in the uprightness of their hearts, Oh I tremble under this judgment, I had rather God should give me up to all the Cavaliers, to all the devils in hell, than to my own heart's lusts, it is a sign that this judgment is not upon thee, and it is a means to keep it from thee.

3. If thou hast not a heart to let God alone, God has not a heart to let thee alone. So long as thy heart keeps close to God that thou wilt not let him alone, (you know it is the Scripture phrase, used when Moses was so earnestly seeking God in prayer,) and though thou findest not him coming to thee as thou dost desire, yet thou attendest him in the word, in reading, in meditation, and in all the means thou knowest, and, notwithstanding thou dost not find God, thou art not weary of his service, but art resolved thou wilt not let him alone, and that if thou perish thy last breath will be crying to God; peace be to such a one, God has not let thee alone so long as this frame of heart abides in thee. Those of whom God saith, Let them alone, usually begin to be more sluggish in prayer than before, to discontinue it in their families, in their closets, and then perhaps to raise objections against it, Why, what is there to prove such things must be done? and so by degrees they will come to have no heart for any holy duty; but if thy heart be kept in quickness, and activity, and life, to seek God and to resolve not to let him alone, surely God will not let thee alone. Learn hence,

1. To bless God if thou dost find that he has not inflicted this judgment upon thee. Though perhaps thou hast many outward judgments in the world, it may be some of you are spoiled of all your goods, and have great afflictions on you, yet let this be a means to quiet your hearts, that though God has taken from you many comforts in this world, yet, blessed be his name, he has not left me alone; I yet find his Spirit within me, I find his grace within me, and his word working in my heart: there are many others who have outward comforts, fair houses, great possessions and lands, but the Lord has let them alone; though I have afflictions upon me, yet, blessed be God, he has not inflicted this judgment upon me, he has not let me alone.

2. To bless God that he has not inflicted this judgment on the kingdom. Surely the ways of God toward this land are such that we have reason to hope that God has not pronounced this judgment upon it. God might have said, England "is joined to idols, let him alone." One would have thought that a little more than three years ago we were in a condition fit to be let alone; but since, the Lord has so worked for England that it may appear evidently that God will not let us alone; and blessed be God that he will not, that he will scourge and afflict us sorely, rather than not purge out our idols. And that people, and that soul, which had rather have God purge them soundly than let them go on in any sin, surely God does not let that people and soul alone. It is true, indeed, great chastisements are upon us, but still they all hitherto tend to our purging, not our ruin, and originate in this, that the Lord will not let us alone. It may be, many think it would be better if it were with us now as it was four years since, then we had no such noise and rumours of war, no such spoiling and killing, as now. What, I ask, is their real meaning? It was well with us when we were going on in superstitious and idolatrous ways, going to Rome so fast, that God might have said then, Let England alone: if God had said, Let them go to Rome, let idolatry be set up there, this would have been a greater judgment than all the present bloodshed in England: but in that the Lord is yet striving with us, though we be struggling against him, let us bless his name.

Ver. 18. Their drink is sour: they have committed whoredom continually: her rulers with shame do love, Give ye.

"Their drink is sour." I find some interpret this word, as if it noted their excess in drunkenness and luxury, as if they poured down drink till it soured in them, and then vomited it up. Luther translates the words, sadè crapulantur, and on the place observes, Idolaters love to pamper the flesh, they drink even to vomiting again, but for the true worshipping of God, that they curtail in outward things, it is hungry and cold. We find that the false prophets were pampered at Jezebel's table, when poor Micaiah was fain to be fed with the bread and water of affliction. Thus Luther and many others interpret the word. But I think there is more in it.

The word כַּמְחָם here translated "drink," refers to their festival meetings, and imports that their feasts and their meetings were as wine that is sour, and has lost its spirit and savour. By "drink," then, we understand their drinkings, that is, the comforts that they have in this world; as your superstitious, idolatrous people always seek to pamper their appetites, and to secure outward comforts: now, saith he, all this is sour. And indeed all the comfort of this world when God is forsaken, it is but as sour drink; the sweetness, and quickness, and life of all is taken away, when God and his worship are forsaken: so you may take their drink, by a synecdoche, for all the comforts of this world. even all those carnal things wherewith they seek to satisfy their flesh, it is all sour, for God is gone when his worship is gone. Perhaps if you had had superstition and idolatry set up amongst you in England, you might have had your drink and wine at your tables more plentifully; but if God and his worship had been gone, all, notwithstanding, had been sour and ungrateful. I appeal to those who have apostatized to enjoy comforts to the flesh, how sour and unsavoury have these proved! whereas let a people keep close to God and his worship, and then their drink, if it be but water, will be sweet to them: as in Acts ii., the saints that believed "did eat their meat with gladness and singleness of heart." We were wont to say, Brown bread and the gospel is good cheer: let us have but bread and water with the gospel and the ordinances and the worship of God, and it will be sweet to us; but let us have wine and all manner of drink at our tables, if we have not the ordinances and worship of God, all will prove sour to us. The ten tribes had as good drink as Judah, yet all the drink of the ten tribes was sour. But further, the meaning may be,

Their society is unsavoury and sour, for so their convivia, their meetings together for feasting and drinking, is taken often for closeness of communion, as they were a means to maintain their mutual converse and familiarity: so the meaning is, what relish can any gracious heart take in their converse one with another, when they meet together at one another's tables and drink together? You may observe how unsavoury the superstitious people that have heretofore lived amongst you, have been in their converse; perhaps, before they were forward in the ways of religion, and if then conversed with, there were some life and quickness in them, but when they have once yielded to superstitious vanity, all this is gone. It would have been so with you if these times had not come, you might perhaps have met and caroused together; but the truth is, all your merry meetings would have been sour and sapsless, there would have been no sweetness in your converse, and those of your brethren that had been gone from you into the howling wilderness, would have found more savour in the water there, than you could have had in all the drinks your ingenuity could have devised.

"Their drink is sour." That is, all their worship and their sacrifices, for so "their drink" is taken by others, for all their drink-offerings: they were wont to have feasts in their sacrifices, but now, saith God, all their offerings are sour, the savour, and sap, and life of them is gone. These are the four interpretations offered, which may enable us to understand what is meant in these words, "Their drink is sour."

"They have committed whoredom continually." They are unwearied in their wickedness, continually they go on in their whoredom, both bodily, but now especially spiritual; that is, when they are worshipping of their idols they are never weary, "they commit whoredom continually." Oh what a shame it is that the godly should be weary of the service of God, when idolaters are not weary of the service of their idols! What rebuke is this to you who are weary under a sermon, if the glass be but run out a little; but if you were to sit up all night in company, in a tavern, you would not be weary at all! "They commit whoredom continually;" at the service of their idols and the satisfying of their lusts they are never weary, but they are soon weary of my service.

But I think there is somewhat further meant: fornicantur in fornicando, in committing fornication they commit fornication, that is the force of the Hebrew; that which they do they do it intensively, in doing they do it. As the apostle saith of Elijah's prayer, James v., In praying he prayed, that is, he prayed intensively, he prayed powerfully, with his whole strength put forth: so the words are here, in committing fornication they committed fornication, that is, they give up their strength to their idols, they are mightily intent on their idols. And therefore have nothing to do with them, (still the argument goes on,) Have nothing to do with them, lest that fearful judgment befall you before spoken of: have nothing to do with them, because their society and converse are unsavoury: have nothing to do with them, because they give up themselves to their lusts. How should we give up ourselves to the service of God, pray in praying, hear in hearing, &c., seeing idolaters are devoted in their service!

"Their rulers." The word translated "rulers" is מגידים their shields, that is, their protectors, so the word in the Hebrew signifies. And there is a very special note to be learned from hence.

Obs. 1. Rulers should be shields to the people where they live; and so they are called, Psal. xlvii. 9, "The princes of the people are gathered together, even the people of the God of Abraham, for the shields of the earth belong unto God." That is, the governors and rulers of the earth, so I find interpreters understand it, belong unto God; they are in God's stead, and they govern in God's name. Rulers, governors, are to be the shields of the people, for they are to be willing to put themselves forward to ward off all the dangers about to come on the people. Have not our worthies in parliament shown themselves to be shields in this respect? Have not they put themselves between us and our dangers? And do you not think that if the adversary prevail they will first swallow up them, I mean those of them that are faithful? Whereas those that before regarded it as an honour to be parliament men, and when there was no danger made such brave speeches, but when they saw things approaching a crisis, and that there were darts shot against the people, and that they must be the shields to keep them off, forsook us; they were showy in appearance, like fine golden or enameled shields, but fit for no service. We are therefore to honour these that still stay, and though they are not perhaps so showy and gilded as those, yet they are proved to be shields of good metal, that will not break, but will keep off the darts shot against the people. And indeed rulers and governors should be men of good metal, willing to bear off much hardship from the people; and they should not think to be honoured only, but should take their honour as a burden also. We are not therefore to regard our rulers as too much honoured, when we consider the danger connected with it. So it is true the governors in armies have pay more than others, but if they be faithful they hazard their lives more, and are the shields of the people. It is an evil thing when a commonwealth have none but wicked magistrates; in such a case they are as if they had nothing to defend them but shields of rotten wood.

"With shame do love, Give ye;" so it is in your books: but I find it rendered אתם דברו by some, They love to bring shame, they love not to say, Bring ye, but they love to bring shame; and you can translate it thus by merely altering the points in the Hebrew; and the meaning is, they, being of vile spirits themselves, do not care what becomes of the people, let them perish as dogs, and let them do that which shall be a perpetual reproach to them to all posterity, so they may have their lusts satisfied.

Others translate the words thus; With shame they call, Bring ye; that is, with shame they call for pleasure to the flesh: so Arias Montanus, Let us have our pleasure, our tables furnished, our honours, and it matters little what becomes of the people. Such rulers and governors had the ten tribes when they were such idolaters; and it is just with God, when people forsake the true worship of God, that he should send them such governors.

But I rather understand the passage as a rebuke to them for their bribery, "They with shame do love, Give ye." They will not only indulge this propensity in private, but they are grown so impudent that they will sell all the good of a kingdom, and the liberty of the subject, for their own gain. They say "with shame, Give ye." It is a great judgment of God on a people when magistrates and governors are given to bribery, to regard gifts and the increase of their estates more than the public good. "A wicked man taketh a gift out of the bosom to pervert the ways of judgment," Prov. xvii. 23. It is a sign of a wicked man to take a gift, though it be but secretly, out of the bosom; but if he take it openly, it evinces more impudence. A wicked man takes a gift out of the bosom, is loth to be seen at first, and he does it to pervert judgment; these men, that should be as shields to the people, for base ends will betray them. What! to subject such a glorious thing as justice to base ends? Justice, which is the glory of God, the glory of a kingdom, and the glory of a man, which he should be clothed with as a robe, as a diadem, to subject it to base ends, for gain to say, Give ye; this is abominable! For a justice of peace to be struck dumb at the appearance of angels, is surely an evil thing: for justices to be bound to the peace by a gift in a basket, is surely most abominable. Exod. xxiii. 8, "A gift blindeth the wise, and perverteth the words of the righteous." Though men are of excellent understanding, and eloquent, yea, though they seemed heretofore very honest and just in their ways, yet when they come to high places, a gift will blind, or, as some render it, pluck out their eyes, irradiate their eyes, that they cannot see. Auro lo- Gregor. Naz. in quente, iners omnis oratio, saith an ancient distichis. Let gold but speak, and all other speeches are to little purpose. Therefore magistrates, of all men, should be without covetousness, fearing the Lord. So God himself characterizes them, as men "fearing God, and hating covetousness." In 2 Chron. xix. 6. 7, "Take heed what ye do: for ye judge not for man, but for the Lord, who is with you in the judgment. Wherefore now let the fear of the Lord be upon you; take heed and do it: for there is no iniquity with the Lord our God, nor respect of persons, nor taking of gifts." Justice must run down as a river, not be paled in as a pond for private advantages. Magistrates must shake their hands from bribery, and despise the gain of oppressors, Isa. xxxiii. 15. As we read of Paul, that when a viper came on his hand, he shook his hand and the viper fell into the fire; so should magistrates, when one brings them a gift to pervert justice, regard it as a viper, and shake their hands of it and let it fall even into the fire, and say as Peter to Simon Magus, "Thy money perish with thee." They should look upon such as bring them gifts with indignation, and even say, Thy money perish with thee in this wicked enterprise. Even Cicero, a heathen, in an epistle to Quintus his brother, a magistrate in Asia, saith, That he should not only show himself an enemy to them that received gifts, but to them that gave them; he should account them his enemies. And Isa. v. 23, "Woe to them which justify the wicked for reward, and take away the righteousness of the righteous from him!" Many righteous men come before some of you, and their cause is true and good, but you will speak bitterly against them to gratify others from whom you expect a reward. Deut. xxvii. 25, saith, There shall be a curse pronounced against such as take gifts, "and all the people shall say, Amen." If any magistrate love to take gifts, the curse of the people is upon him, and God requires that all the people should say, Amen. And I have read, that among the Romans, if it could be proved against any magistrate that he had taken bribes, he was to be punished with death, without any deliverance. And Psalm xv., in answer to that question, "Who shall abide in thy tabernacle?" it is said, "He that taketh not a reward against the innocent." If you would ever dwell with God, either here in his church, or in heaven hereafter, you must not take bribes against the innocent. I have read in the life of that saint which you call St. Edmund, that he was wont to say, There is little difference between these two words, to take, and to hang, the words are almost alike in Latin, prendere and pendere, signifying thereby, that those that would take gifts showed what they deserved. Prov. v. 27, "He that is greedy of gain troubleth his own house; but he that hateth gifts shall live." It is not enough for a magistrate not to take gifts, but he must hate gifts, for "he that is greedy of gain," though he think it not, "troubleth his own house."

Ver. 19. The wind hath bound her up in her wings, and they shall be ashamed because of their sacrifices.

The word נפח here translated "wind," signifies also a spirit, and so I find Jerome takes the meaning of the words to be, that the evil spirit hurries them up and down, and carries them on violently in their wickedness. As in Deut. xxxii. 11, God is said to carry his people on his wings; so the devil here carries idolaters, who are set upon their wicked ways, as it were on his wings, with impetuous violence.

But we are rather inclined to understand the expression metaphorically, to signify the power, the suddenness, the violence, and swiftness of God's judgments, carrying them into captivity and into misery. "The wind hath bound" the people of Israel, the ten tribes, "up in her wings;" that is, the judgments of the Lord shall come upon them with sudden and overwhelming violence, and take them away from their own country, and carry them into captivity and misery. The power and violence of the judgments of God are often expressed in Scripture by the wind, by storms and tempest. There is a mighty power in the wind: 1 Kings xix. 11. "A great and strong wind rent the mountains, and brake in pieces the rocks." Job xxviii. 9, "That overturneth the mountains by the roots." The winds are the voice of the Lord, that breaks the cedars, even the cedars of Lebanon, and shakes the wilderness, Psal. xxix. Sabelieus tells us of Cambyses, that his soldiers being in a wilderness, in a sandy place, suddenly a violent wind came and drove the sand with such force that thousands of them were buried in it. And here, by the way, we may have hinted unto us a very profitable meditation. How great is the glory and power of the infinite God! For the wind, what is it but a vapour? and what more weak than a vapour? We are wont to say, As weak as water: but many drops together will make the waters terrible, and the seas are called the mighty waters; but vapour is weaker than water, and yet the winds are nothing but a number of vapours joined together, and then what a mighty power have they to rend the rocks and turn up the mountains by the roots! Oh, then, what is the power of the mighty God! for in him there is nothing but infinity, and to him nothing can be added. If a weak vapour being multiplied have such strength, what power then is there in the infinite God, to whom, as having all fulness dwelling in him, nothing can be added!

